As might naturally be expected, in an age when the great mass of the people were immersed in gross ignorance, superstitious notions and usages were widely prevalent in Scotland at this period. The virtue of the mass,† and of the relics of saints, the adoration of images and of the cross, the efficacy of indulgences and the importance of confession, of processions, and of pilgrimages, were zealously inculcated by the priests, and credulously believed by the people.

Immense numbers of pilgrims travelled to the various shrines of saints and martyrs, not only in Scotland and England, but even on the continent. If, however, we may credit the statements of contemporary writers, the extreme frequency of these pilgrimages did not originate wholly in religious zeal. A graphic description of what the fashionable pilgrimages of the time really were, is given by William Thorpe, one of the early followers of Wycliffe, in his defence before Archbishop Arundel:—"Examine," he says, "whosoever will, twenty of these pilgrims, and he shall not find the man or woman that knows surely a commandment of God, nor can say their Pater-noster and Ave-Maria, nor their creeds readily in any language." "The cause," he affirms, "why that many men and women go hither and thither now on pilgrimages, is more for the health of their bodies than of their souls, more to have riches and prosperity of this world than to be enriched with virtues in their souls, more to have here worldly and fleshly friendship than to have friendship of God and of his saints in heaven." Such persons as thus spend much money in seeking and visiting the bones of this or that saint, do that, he contends, which is in direct disobedience to the command of God, inasmuch as they waste their goods partly upon hostellers (or inn-keepers) many of whom are women of profligate conduct, partly upon rich priests that already have much more than they need. "Also," he concludes, "I know well, that when divers men and women will go thus after their own wills, and finding out one pilgrimage, they will ordain with them (arrange with one another) before to have with them both men and women that can well sing wanton songs, and some other pilgrims will have with them bagpipes; so that every town they come through, what with the noise of their singing, with the sound of their piping, with the jangling of their Canterbury bells, and with the barking out of dogs after them, they make more noise than if the king came there-away with all his clarions and many other minstrels. And if these men and women be a month in their pilgrimage many of them shall be an half-year after janglers, tale-tellers, and liars."* The most noted Scottish pilgrimage appears to have been Whithern, in Galloway, and great numbers of pilgrims resorted to this shrine from England, and even from foreign countries. Rabelais mentions the frequent pilgrimages to St. Triegnan, which is supposed to be a corruption of St. Ninian, the founder of the bishopric of Whithern.†

It was at this period that the doctrines of Wycliffe appeared for the first time in Scotland. The disciples of this great reformer had already become very numerous in England, where they had undergone a fierce persecution at the hands of the Romish hierarchy. Great numbers were condemned to the stake, and others suffered prolonged imprisonment, whipping, and similar punishments. Some of these zealous opponents of papal errors soon penetrated into the northern division of the island, either in search of a refuge from the persecution of their enemies, or, more probably, from an ardent desire to propagate the truth. They were usually termed Lollards, probably from the German reformer, Walter Lollhard, who was burnt at Cologne, in 1322, for his preaching against the mass, extreme unction, the efficacy of penance, and the authority assumed by the pope. The English and Scottish Lollards were the zealous opponents of the pretensions of the Romish hierarchy, and appear to have held nearly the same doctrines with Luther and his followers in the next century. A very distinct account of their creed is given in a petition which they presented to the House of Commons in 1395, in which

Opinions held they maintain, that "the possession of temporalities by the clergy is contrary to the law of Christianity, and destructive of faith, hope, and charity; that the Romish priesthood is not that established by Christ; that outward rites of worship have no warrant in Scripture, and are of little or no importance; that the celibacy of the clergy is the occasion of scandalous irregularities in the whole church; that the pretended miracle of transubstantiation tends to make people idolatrous; that exorcisms and benedictions pronounced over wine, bread, water, oil, salt, &c., have more in them of necromancy than of religion; that the clergy, by accepting secular places under the government, become hermaphrodites, attempting at the same time to serve both God and Mammon; that prayers made for the dead are more likely to be displeasing than otherwise to the Almighty, inasmuch as for one among other reasons, they are probably, in most cases, offered for persons (more especially the founders of monasteries and other such pernicious endowments) who have already been consigned to punishment for their evil lives, and are beyond the reach of mercy; that pilgrimages and prayers made to images, are nearly akin to idolatry; that auricular confession is a highly objectionable practice; that priests have no power of absolution for sin; that to take away the life of man, either in war or by sentence of a court of justice, is expressly contrary to the spirit and precepts of Christianity; and, lastly, that certain trades ought to be put down, as both unnecessary and the occasion of a great deal of sin, especially those of the goldsmith and the sword-cutler, both of which, though they might be tolerated under the Mosaic dispensation, were not lawful under that of the New Testament."*

It was not at all unnatural that the clergy should regard with the greatest alarm the spread of doctrines like these, which struck at the very root of the papal system; but the measures which they adopted for their suppression were in the highest degree unjustifiable and impolitic. In the year

1407, John Resby, an English priest, of the school of Wycliffe, who had preached the tenets of

prehended on a charge of heresy, and brought before a clerical council, presided over by Laurence of Lindores, an eminent doctor of theology. He was charged with no fewer than forty heretical opinions, the principal of which were, that penance and auricular confession are of no avail; that the pope is not the vicar of Christ; and that he was not to be esteemed pope if he was a man of wicked life. Resby made a courageous and eloquent defence; but, as was to be expected, he failed to convince his ecclesiastical judges, by whom he was found guilty, and barbarously condemned to the flames. This intrepid witness for the truth was accordingly burnt at Perth along with his books and writings.* The conduct of the clergy, in thus kindling the flames of religious persecution, was abetted, if not instigated, by Albany, whose zeal for the purity of the Romish faith, and hatred of Lollards and heretics, are gratefully commemorated by Wyntown.† The execution of Resby is the first example of persecution for religious opinions which is recorded in Scottish history, and, as has invariably been the case, this cruel attempt to quench the doctrines of the reformers served only to strengthen their hold on the popular mind. The blood of the martyr proved the seed of the church. His little treatises, explaining and —spread of his defending the opinions for which doctrines.

he suffered, were carefully preserved by his disciples, who held secret meetings for the discussion of those doctrines which they had been taught by their instructor, and which they resolutely maintained, although they were afraid openly to avow them. Bower tells us, that there were still in his day some unhappy persons, instigated by the devil, by whom the writings of Resby were carefully preserved, and their pernicious heresies cherished, in accordance with the scriptural text, that "stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant." It is certain that the new opinions continued steadily to gain ground Statute against the Lollards. for their suppression by the parliament which assembled at Perth in 1424, after the return of James I. from England. This statute directed that the bishops should make strict inquisition within their respective dioceses for all Lollards and other heretics, in order that they might be punished according to the laws of the holy church; and that, if necessary, the civil power should be called in for that purpose, in aid of the ecclesiastical.‡

It does not appear, however, that any person was brought to the stake in Scotland, for heresy, after the death of Resby, till the year 1433, when Paul Crawler, a Bohemian, was burnt at St. Andrews, on the 23rd of July. Crawler, who is admitted by his enemies to have been a person of great learning and of remarkable acuteness and dexterity in argument, had been sent by the reformers of Prague to open a communication with their brethren in Scotland. He was a physician by profession, and his recommendatory letters spoke highly of his eminence in the healing art; but he appears to have followed this profession principally for the purpose of obtaining a favourable opportunity to disseminate his religious opinions. There can be no doubt that he made many converts, and that the disciples of Wycliffe in Scotland had by this time greatly increased in number, for, in the account given of the trial of the Bohemian, he is spoken of as an emissary to a numerous body sharing the sentiments of himself and his countrymen. The zeal and success with which he propagated his doctrinal views excited the alarm and indignation of the clergy, and he was seized and brought before Laurence of Lindores, the same cruel and bigoted inquisitor who sat in judgment upon Resby. From the exposition of his opinions given by Bower, it is evident that —his doctrines. Crawar held, on most points, the tenets of Wycliffe, Huss, and Jerome of Prague. He affirmed that purgatory was a cunningly-devised fable, the efficacy of pilgrimages an imposition, and that the doctrines of transubstantiation, the power of the "keys," and priestly absolution, were vain devices of human invention. He strenuously asserted the right of the laity to the free perusal of the Holy Scriptures; and, what was probably regarded as the most obnoxious of all his heretical opinions, he asserted, that, in temporal matters, the spiritual should be subordinate to the civil, and that magistrates had a right to try and punish ecclesiastics who had been guilty of criminal offences. In the celebration of the Lord's Supper, Crawar and his followers rejected the unauthorized rites of the Romish church, and closely followed the example of the primitive Christians. They commenced the service by the Lord's Prayer, after which they read the history of the institution of the ordinance, as contained in the New Testament, and then proceeded to distribute the elements, using common bread, and a common drinking cup or goblet.* When brought before the ecclesiastical court, the Bohemian reformer courageously avowed the opinions which he held, and supported them by the most cogent arguments, and by apposite quotations from the sacred volume. But his powerful reasoning and profound knowledge of the Holy Scriptures availed him nothing in his contest with his remorseless persecutors. He was condemned to the stake, and underwent the cruel sentence with a courage and composure which had a powerful influence on the minds of the people. The perpetrators of this atrocious act, and their apologists, have endeavoured to blacken the memory of their victim by imputing to him a denial of the resurrection of the dead, and affirming that his followers recommended a community of goods, and lived gross and licentious lives,—the very calumnious accusation which the heathen writers brought against the disciples of Christ in the early ages of Christianity.

It may excite surprise that a sovereign so sagacious and enlightened as James, Policy of the king— should have countenanced or permitted these cruel proceedings; but the clergy were his most powerful auxiliaries in his deadly struggle with the feudal aristocracy, and he had been trained in a bad school for the acquirement of correct opinions respecting religious freedom and toleration. The sanguinary persecutions of the Lollards, which took place in England during the reigns of Henry IV. and his son,* who scrupled at nothing to gain the favour of the clergy, must have exercised a most injurious influence on the mind of the youthful monarch, accustoming him to witness scenes of suffering and cruelty, and to see human lives sacrificed without scruple, for the accomplishment of selfish objects. Accordingly, on his return to his own country, he appears to have adopted the policy of his instructors without any misgiving, and to have unhesitatingly lent himself to the support of the clergy in their unscrupulous attempt to exterminate the doctrines of the reformers. In other respects, James's love for the church was shown in a way more in accordance with his general character. Though he is said to have gruded the liberal donations which his predecessor David I.,—that "sore saint for the crown,"—bestowed upon the church, and his own income, in consequence of the dilapidation of the royal revenues during his captivity was too limited to permit him to become the founder or benefactor of religious houses, he clearly perceived that, amid prevailing ignorance and barbarism, the clergy were the best instruments he could

—his encourage-employ in promoting the education ment of the and civilization of the people. He clergy—therefore sought to cultivate their friendship, and availed himself of their great influence in the prosecution of his plans for the diminution of the power of the nobility and the general improvement of the country. Immediately after his return from England, with the view of conciliating the clergy, an enactment was passed by the parliament, commanding all men to honour the church, declaring that the clergy should enjoy in all things their ancient freedom and established privileges, and strictly prohibiting any interference with their granting leases of their lands or tithes. In the following year (1425) James issued a commission to the primate, Henry Wardlaw, Bishop of St. Andrews, authorizing him to resume all the church lands which had been alienated during the regency of Albany; orders were given to the justiciars of the realm to assist in the recovery of the lost property, and the bishop was commissioned to pronounce the sentence of excommunication on all who should offer any resistance.* James also revived the custom of holding general councils, which had fallen into desuetude. He exercised a watchful control over the various religious establishments throughout the country, and the manners and morals of their inmates, and finding that the Benedictine and Augustine monks had become relaxed in their discipline, he wrote to them an affectionate letter of admonition and reproof.† James was

* Great numbers suffered for their religious opinions under these monarchs, who were determined persecutors, sparing no rank or age. Holinshed mentions a most shocking example of the cruelty of Henry V. while Prince of Wales. He was present at the execution of one Badby, who was burnt for his denial of transubstantiation. "When the fire was kindled, hearing him make a roaring noise very pitifully, the prince caused the fire to be plucked back, and offered him his life and a pension if he would recant." But the intrepid martyr refused, choosing to die rather than to forsake his opinions. "Whereupon the prince commanded that he should be put into the tun again, from thenceforth not to have any favour or pardon at all; and so it was done, and the fire put to him again, and he consumed to ashes."

—and zeal in repressing ecclesiastical abuses which had crept into the ecclesiastical state of the country, from the purchase of pensions from the pope, and of the presentations to benefices and important clerical offices. Stringent enactments were passed, forbidding these disgraceful practices under heavy penalties; and with the view of preventing them, no clerk was allowed to pass beyond seas without an express licence from the king, and it was made incumbent on him, first to show good cause for his expedition, and to give security that he should not be guilty of any kind of simony or “barratry.”‡

It is gratifying to be able to turn for relief from the melancholy scenes of intestine feud and religious persecution, of St. Andrews— to the pleasing spectacle of the establishment of the University of St. Andrews, which was founded in the year 1410, under the auspices of Henry Wardlaw, the bishop of that see.§ Before the foundation of this institution, the Scottish youth were obliged to resort to the English and Continental universities for the opportunities of prosecuting their studies in the higher branches of education. In the year 1282, Devorguilla, the daughter of Alan, Lord of Galloway, and wife of John Baliol,¶ established Baliol College in Oxford, which was no doubt intended for the reception of Scottish students; and in 1326, the Scotch College of Paris was founded by the liberality of David, Bishop of Moray. But to Bishop Wardlaw belongs the honour of erecting a temple to learning at home, and thus rendering it unnecessary for the Scottish youth to resort to other lands in pursuit of knowledge. In the papal bull which sanctioned the new seminary, it is declared that the bishop and his associates had been stirred up to the undertaking by the consideration of the many dangers and inconveniences to which the clergy of Scotland, who desired to be instructed in theology, the canon and civil laws, medicine, and the liberal arts, were exposed from wars and other impediments in their journeys to foreign studia generalia, in consequence of there being no such institution to which they might resort in their own country. The origin of the new seminary was sufficiently simple. A few men of letters in the city of St. Andrews formed themselves into an association, under the auspices of the bishop, for the purpose of giving instruction in the higher branches of science and philosophy to all who chose to attend their lectures. Their names, as recorded by Fordun, were Laurence Lindores, an eminent doctor of theology, who undertook to explain —its first professors—

the fourth book of the Sentences of Peter Lombard; Richard Cornel, Archdeacon of Lothian; John Litster, Canon of St. Andrews; John Shevez, Official of St. Andrews; William Stephen, afterwards Bishop of Dunblane, who lectured on the civil and canon laws; and John Gyll, William Foulis, and William Crosier, who taught logic and philosophy. The public lectures commenced in the year 1410, and in the charter or grant of privileges, which is dated 27th February, 1411, and addressed to the venerable doctors, masters, bachelors, and scholars dwelling in the city of St. Andrews, by whom the institution had been so laudably begun, the bishop formally endows the new seminary with all the rights and privileges of a university, in so far as his jurisdiction extended. But it was not until after the lapse of two years and a half that the establishment was sanctioned by the papal authority.

At this period there were no fewer than three rival popes, each claiming to be the head of the church. The king— it is sanctioned by the papal authority— of Scotland adhered to Benedict XII.; from him, therefore, the bulls of confirmation were obtained. These bulls, which are six in number, all dated the same day, the 25th of August, 1413, at Paniscola, in Arragon, where Benedict kept his court, profess to be granted at the request of the Scottish king, and of the bishop, prior, and chapter of St. Andrews, whose project of establishing a university or studium generale in that city is expressly stated to have been formed with the counsel, consent, and common participation of the three Estates of the realm of Scotland.* On the 3rd of February, 1414, the papal bulls, which endowed the infant seminary with all the privileges of a university, were brought to St. Andrews by Henry Ogilvy, master of arts, and their arrival was welcomed by processions and the ringing of bells, and every demonstration of public joy. On the following day, which was Sunday, the clergy assembled in solemn convocation in the refectory, and heard the papal bulls read in the presence of the bishop, the chancellor of the university. They then walked in procession to the high altar, where Te Deum was sung by the whole of the vast assembly, consisting of the dignitaries of the church, arrayed in their richest robes, and of four hundred clerks, besides novices and lay-brothers, and an immense multitude of spectators. High mass was then celebrated, and after the conclusion of the service, the remainder of the day was spent in joyous festivity.*

§ This enlightened prelate was as highly celebrated for his munificence as for his love of learning. The story is told of him, that when the managers of his household complained to him of his unbounded hospitality, and proposed that he should draw out a scheme for its regulation and retrenchment, he called his secretary, and named as the first guests whom he would have always welcome, Pife and Angus—the two counties principally forming his diocese. “His servants,” adds Archbishop Spottiswoode, “hearing this, gave over their purpose of retrenching his family, for they saw he would have no man refused that came to his house.” History of the Church of Scotland, p. 67.

"The University of St. Andrews was formed on Constitution of the model of those of Paris and the University—Bologna, and enjoyed the same privileges. All its members, or supposts, as they are called, including the students who had attained the degree of bachelor, as well as the masters, were divided into nations, according to the places from which they came. At a congregation, or general meeting, they elected four procurators, who had a right to act for them in all causes in which their interests were concerned; and four intrants, or electors, by whom the rector was chosen. The rector was the chief magistrate, and had authority to judge and pronounce sentence, with the advice and consent of his assessors, in all causes, civil and criminal, relating to members of the university, with the exception of crimes which incurred the highest punishment. He had a right to repledge any member of the university who might be called before any other judge, civil or ecclesiastical; and in certain cases, those who did not belong to the university might be called before the rector's court, upon the complaint of a master or student. It is natural to suppose, that the exercise of these powers would give occasion to a collision of authorities; and accordingly, a concordat was entered into at an early period between the university and the magistrates of the city, by which the limits of their jurisdictions were defined and adjusted. The university had the right of purchasing victuals free from custom within the city and the regality of the abbey. It was also exempted from paying all other imposts and taxes, even those levied by the Estates, with the exception of what is called the great custom. Its members enjoyed immunity from the duties exacted for confirming testaments; and such of them as were clergymen, and possessed benefices, with cure, were liberated by the papal bull from obligation to personal residence, as long as they taught in the university. Besides its civil and criminal jurisdiction, the university possessed ecclesiastical powers, in the exercise of which it sometimes proceeded to excommunication. It may be mentioned, as an evidence of the respect paid to literature, that in consequence of a dispute which had arisen, it was determined that the rector of the university should take precedence of the prior of the abbey in all public processions.

For the direction of its literary affairs, the members of the university were divided into faculties, according to the sciences that were taught. At the head of these was a dean, who presided at the meetings of the masters of his faculty, for regulating the mode of study, and for examinations. The chancellor presided at meetings of the university for the conferring of degrees. It was long before medicine was taught as a separate science in our universities; and it does not appear that they were accustomed anciently to confer degrees in law. The branches taught were the arts, or philosophy, canon law, and divinity.

However limited this course of education was, and however rude and imperfect the mode in which it was conducted, such an institution could not fail to produce effects favourable to the progress of knowledge. The erection of the University of St. Andrews may be regarded as marking the first dawn of learning in Scotland. Attracted by novelty, or animated by that thirst for knowledge which has always characterized Scotchmen, students came to St. Andrews from every part of the kingdom.

When King James returned from England, in 1424, he found the university —its privileges still flourishing under the protection of its venerable founder, James I. —his own early instructor. Besides granting it a charter, dated at Perth, 3rd March, 1432, confirming all its privileges and immunities, James assembled the most distinguished of the professors and students, and, after conversing familiarly with them, and applauding their exertions, rewarded them, according to their merit, with offices in the state or benefices in the church. According to Boece, the institution enjoyed such prosperity under his patronage, that it soon numbered among its teachers no fewer than thirteen doctors of divinity and eight doctors of laws, whose lectures were attended by a prodigious multitude of students.

CHAPTER XVII.

CONDITION OF THE PEOPLE.

THE long wars with England, and the fierce domestic feuds of the nobles, not only retarded the social progress of Scotland, but threw it back a century in the career of civilization. There can be no doubt that the agriculture, trade, and commerce of the country were in a much more flourishing state, and that the inhabitants possessed a larger share of necessaries and comforts of life during the reign of Alexander III. than at the accession of James I. The social habits of the Scottish people in these unfavourable circumstances inevitably acquired a rudeness and ferocity corresponding to their external condition. According to Froissart, (whose visit to Scotland, about the year 1360, forms an epoch in the history of the national manners;) the French auxiliaries, who came over in the year 1385, shuddered at the penury and barbarism of the country. The city of Edinburgh, he tells us, was at this time not so large as Valenciennes or Tournay, and though it

Dwellings of the people— contained four thousand houses, these were merely small wooden cottages, covered with straw, which their owners abandoned and set on fire with little reluctance, whenever an enemy appeared.* Even so late as the reign of James I., we are informed by Æneas Sylvius, (afterwards Pope Pius II.,) that the houses in the towns of Scotland, when constructed of stone at all, were built without lime, and in the villages they were roofed with turf, while a cow-hide supplied the place of a door.† Froissart states that the houses of the borderers, and those who inhabited the districts which were exposed to the incursions of the enemy, were of a still more wretched description, consisting merely of four or five poles, to support the turf walls and a roof of boughs, so that a man could erect a dwelling of this kind in three days. On the approach of the English they unroofed these temporary structures, and carrying off their flocks and herds and household stuff, retired into the mountain fastnesses and recesses of the forests, where they remained in security till the enemy was compelled to retreat in order to escape starvation, when the inhabitants emerged from their retreats, and with a few stakes and wattles rebuilt their ruined habitations. The indoor accommodations of such a people must have been of the most miserable kind. Æneas Sylvius mentions that the common people were poor and uneducated, and though they had abundance of flesh and fish, yet bread was regarded as an absolute dainty among them. The men, he adds, are small in stature, but bold; the women fair and comely.‡ Another contemporary author states that Scotland is rich in fish, flesh, and milk, but the country is mountainous and strange, and the people rough and savage; and Froissart informs us that the French knights, who came over under John de Viemie, in the reign of Robert II., could obtain no wine in Scotland but at a great price, while the ale was weak and thin, and the bread made of barley or oats.* The state of the people "in the region where agriculture was not used" was still more wretched than that of their fellow countrymen in the "cultivated lowlands." The wild Scots, who speak a different language, we are told, were sometimes reduced to eat the bark of trees. Milk in its various modes of preparation formed a principal article of food among the common people. Meat boiled with oatmeal, or fish, formed their meals on more important occasions. Bread and vegetables were little used—a circumstance which may, probably, account for the prevalence of the cutaneous disease called leprosy.† Great quantities of salmon and other fish were taken in the rivers, and formed an important article both of diet and of export.

The immense forests which at one time covered the face of the country were now Dilapidation of the forests.
 greatly dilapidated. Æneas Syl-vius says, he found the country generally devoid of trees, but there was a sulphureous stone dug up which was used for firing: and again, that coals were given to the poor at the church-doors by way of alms, the country being denuded of wood.‡ The statement of this author is incidentally corroborated by the statute enacted by the parliament in 1424, regarding those defaulters who steal green wood, or strip the trees of their bark, under cover of the night. Unfortunately this decay of the forests was not owing to the progress of agriculture. On the contrary, there is reason to believe that many districts which had at one time been brought under cultivation were allowed to return to a state of nature, in consequence State of agriculture—of the unsettled condition of the country. The evils resulting from this neglect of agricultural operations, attracted the attention of James I. immediately on his return to his own kingdom; and various enactments were passed by the legislature for the protection and encouragement of husbandry. It was ordained, that every man of such a condition in life as made it proper that he should be a labourer or husbandman, should either become the half-proprietor of an ox and a plough, or dig every day a portion of land seven feet in length, and six feet in breadth. —enactments for its encouragement.
 It was also declared, that every farmer and husbandman who possessed a plough and eight oxen, should sow annually a firlof, or four Scottish pecks of wheat, half a firlof of pease, and forty beans, under a penalty of ten shillings, to be paid to the baron of the land; while the baron himself was commanded to sow the same quantity within his own demesnes under the penalty of forty shillings, to be paid to the king for each infringement of the law.* It has been justly remarked, that the small quantity of beans here mentioned renders it probable that this is the era of their earliest introduction into Scotland. Oats and barley, indeed, were almost the sole crops raised at this period in Scotland, and pease-bannocks were long esteemed by the Scottish peasantry a dainty little inferior to wheaten bread. The statutes concerning the destruction of rooks, because of the mischief which they occasioned to the corn;† the extirpation of wolves, and the burning of heath while the crops were on the ground, have been already referred to, and indicate the watchful care with which James sought to promote the improvement of the country.

The commerce of Scotland, like its agriculture, had suffered severely at this period from foreign war and internal dissensions, but, after the death of Edward III., and the abandonment of the designs which the English monarch had entertained upon the independence of the kingdom, it began slowly to revive and to return to its former channels. The greater part of the foreign trade of the country was confined to the Netherlands, though voyages were occasionally undertaken to Norway, Denmark, and the Hanse Towns, and to France for wine.‡ A considerable trade appears to have been also carried on with the Lombards, who were at this time reckoned among the most wealthy and enterprising merchants in Europe.§ It is difficult to give anything like an accurate or satisfactory account of the imports of Scotland at this period, as they appear to have been of the most miscellaneous character, and to have included most articles of necessity and convenience. The exports, according to Æneas Sylvius, consisted of hides, wool, salt fish, and pearls. In addition to these, the statutes make mention of horses, cattle, and sheep; the skins of martins, fumarts, rabbits, does, roes, otters, foxes, harts, and hinds; woollen cloths; and herrings, salted and cured. The numerous enactments framed by the legislature for the regulation of the fisheries, show that salmon constituted an important article of commerce. The customs on imports and exports amounted to about two shillings in the pound; but it is impossible now to ascertain the extent of the trade. Stow mentions, that Sir Robert Umfraville, the English Vice-Admiral, in an expedition to Scotland in 1410, besides plundering the country on both coasts of the Frith of Forth, carried off as prizes fourteen "good ships" laden with woollen and linen cloth; pitch, tar; woad; meal, wheat and rye; in addition to many which he burned. It is probable, however, that some of the vessels taken by Umfraville might belong to foreigners. Domestic traffic was chiefly carried on at fairs, which were usually held on the day of the saint to whom the parish church was dedicated. Thither the merchant brought his goods, and the farmer and the husbandmen the produce of their lands; receiving in return the necessaries or luxuries imported from the continent. We learn incidentally, that at this period the richer nobles and gentry, and the higher clergy, and even the sovereign himself, not infrequently engaged in mercantile adventures. The Duke of Albany, for example, was the proprietor of a vessel which carried six hundred quarters of malt, and was navigated by a master and twenty-four sailors. In the year 1404, a richly-laden vessel, belonging to Henry Wardlaw, Bishop of St. Andrews, was taken by the English. About the same time, the Earl of Douglas freighted a vessel to trade in Normandy and Rochelle; and at a later period, a ship named the Mary of Leith, belonging to King James I., obtained a safe conduct from the English monarch to unship her cargo in the port of London, and expose the merchandise for sale.* About the same time James imported from London the following articles, which it may, therefore, be presumed he either could not procure at home, or not of so good a quality: twenty tons of wine; twelve bows; four dozen yards of cloth, of different colours; twelve yards of scarlet; twenty yards of red worsted; eight dozen pewter vessels; twelve hundred wooden bowls, packed in four barrels; three dozen coversals; a basin and font; two summer saddles; one hackney saddle; a woman's saddle, with furniture; two portmanteaus; four yards of motley; five yards of morrey; five yards of black cloth of lyre; twelve yards of kersey, and twelve skins of red leather. These goods were shipped for Scotland, in a vessel belonging to London, accompanied by an order of king Henry, securing them from molestation by English cruisers.†

It appears that the merchants of Scotland frequently went abroad with their cargoes; but, in the mistaken spirit which characterized the commercial legislation of the age, it was enacted by the parliament in 1424, that no merchant was to be permitted to pass the sea for the purposes of trade, unless he possessed in property, or at least in commission, the value of three serplaiths of wool, each serplait being eighty stone weight, or about two sacks. The whole of the statutes, indeed, enacted during the reign of James I., for the regulation of the commerce of the country, while they evince the unwearied attention of the king to the welfare of his dominions, are pervaded by the same unenlightened policy. The restrictions imposed upon the transportation of gold and silver out of the country, and on the sale and exportation of oxen, sheep, and horses, of skins and tallow; the compulsory regulations promulgated against merchant-strangers, by which they were compelled to lay out the money received for their goods in the purchase of Scottish merchandise; and the injunction to the exporters of wool, hides, and other articles, to bring home a certain quantity of bullion in exchange for their goods; the prohibition against the purchase of English cloth by Scottish merchants; and the repeated attempts made to fix the prices of the various kinds of manufactured articles, and the wages of the artificers, though, doubtless, intended to encourage, were in reality calculated seriously to impede and injure the trade and commerce of the country. This mistaken policy was evidently borrowed from the commercial regulations of the English monarchs, under whom James had received his legislative training; for, in the sister-country, almost every department of industry was impeded and fettered by legislative interference.

† The trees in which the rooks were suffered to build were forfeited to the king. Æneas Sylvius, who mentions this law, erroneously infers from it that rooks had been recently introduced into Scotland.

‡ The usual staple of the Scottish continental commerce was at Bruges, where James I. founded a Scottish chapel, to be supported by some duties on the ships belonging to his subjects. Campvere became the staple port, after the marriage of its lord to a daughter of James.

As might have been expected in these troublous times, the defence of the country occupied a large share of the attention of the king and parliament, and reiterated enactments were passed, enjoining the sheriffs and magistrates of burghs to hold "weapon-sehawings," or musters of all the fighting men in the country, four times in the year, for the inspection of their weapons, and the practice of their military exercises. In one of these statutes we have a minute account of the various kinds of armour and arms worn by the different classes of the community. All persons who were possessed of land yielding an annual rent of twenty pounds, or of moveable property to the value of a hundred pounds, were to be well mounted and armed, "from head to heel," doubtless in the plate armour which had now superseded the chain-mail formerly worn by knights and esquires. Their offensive weapons were the battle-axe, the two-handed sword, the iron-mace, or the spear. Persons of inferior rank, worth only ten pounds of yearly rent, or fifty pounds in goods, were commanded to provide themselves with a helmet and gorget, a rere-brace, vambrace, breastplate, and greaves, with plates to cover the front of the thighs and legs, and iron gauntlets, or gloves. Every yeoman possessing property amounting to twenty pounds in goods, was bound to arm himself with a habergeon, an iron hat, a bow and sheaf of arrows, a sword-buckler, and dagger. The yeoman with ten pounds in property, was to provide himself with a bow and sheaf of arrows, a sword-buckler, and dagger; while the lowest class were to have an iron hat, a doublet of fence, with sword and buckler, and an axe, or at least a staff pointed with iron. Every burghs worth fifty pounds in goods was bound to arm himself in the same manner as a gentleman; while the burghs or citizen possessing property to the value of twenty pounds, was enjoined to provide a doublet and habergeon, with a sword and buckler, a bow and sheaf of arrows, and a knife or dagger.* It appears that the greater part of the armour and weapons employed by the Scots at this period, was imported from the continent; for it was enacted by the parliament in 1425, that all merchants of the realm passing beyond seas should, along with their usual cargoes, bring home such a supply of harness and armour as could be stowed in the vessel, besides spears, spear-shafts, bows, and bow-strings.

The spear was the favourite weapon of the Scottish spearmen, and all attempts to supersede it by the bow completely failed, although the superiority of the latter, in the hands of the English, was manifested in many a bloody field. The few archers to be found in the ranks of the Scottish army were chiefly Highlanders and Islesmen, who were greatly inferior to the English bowmen, both in the size of their weapons and in their mode of handling them. The importance of training his subjects to the use of the long-bow, appears to have been deeply impressed on the mind of James I.; and in his first parliament, held immediately after his return from captivity, it was enacted, that all males above twelve years of age should provide themselves with the usual arms of an archer, that they might be taught the use of the bow. It was also required that butts should be erected upon every ten-pound land, especially in the vicinity of the parish churches, where every man was to shoot at least thrice about; while a fine of a wedder was to be paid to the lord of the land by those who failed to comply with this injunction. For the purpose of constraining the common people to devote the whole of their leisure time to the practice of archery, James prohibited, under a severe penalty, the pastimes of football and of golf, which appear to have been the favourite games of the Scots at that period, as they still continue to be at the present day.† Similar enactments were repeated at intervals throughout the reign of this wise and energetic sovereign; and, not satisfied with these legislative efforts to induce his subjects to cultivate this warlike accomplishment, he sought to enforce his orders by a little wholesome raillery on their unskilfulness in the use of the bow. In the poem called "Christ's Kirk on the Green," he ridicules, with much humour, the unskilfulness of the Scottish bowmen. One man draws his string with such fury that the bow breaks in shivers; a second shoots his arrow a whole acre's breadth wide of the mark; a third hits the man's body at whom he took aim, but with so little effect that he cannot pierce his leathern doublet; and a fourth, who discharges his arrow he knows not where, is persuaded that it has slaughtered a priest, "a mile beyond a mire," upon which, in a panic, he throws down his artillery and forthwith flies the country. But neither the shafts of ridicule nor the enactments of the legislature availed to change the national habits; and Bower informs us, that after the death of James, among a hundred followers of a baron scarcely six archers could be found, the remainder being armed, as before, with their long spears and heavy battle-axes.*

Cannon began now to be employed in the attack and defence of fortified places, instead of the battering ram, the sower, the balista, and other warlike engines of a similar description; but the Scots never attained to any great proficiency in the use of artillery. As heretofore, the chief force of the Scottish army consisted in infantry; but on the march they were nearly all mounted on small, hardy horses, for the sake of celerity and to save fatigue. In this way they often marched twenty or even twenty-four miles in a single day and night. Each soldier was required to bring with him provisions for forty days; consisting, however, merely of a small bag of oatmeal, trussed behind him on the saddle. The enemy's country supplied them with abundance of meat.†

Considerable light is thrown on the constitution of a Scottish army at this period, and on the military customs of the times, by the articles of agreement, drawn up in the year 1385, by the Earl of Carriek (afterwards Robert III.) and other nobles, and the Admiral of France and his knights, for the regulation of the combined movements of the Scottish forces, and their French allies, during their expedition into England. Pillage was forbidden during their march to the borders, under pain of death; the victuallers who resorted to the camp to sell provisions were to be protected, and to receive prompt payment; any soldier who killed another was to be instantly executed; if any common soldier struck a gentleman he was to lose his hand or ears; and if any gentleman defied another, he was to be put under arrest, and justice done by the officers. In the case of any riot arising between the French and Scots, the offenders were to be seized by the bystanders, and, if knights, they were to be deprived of their horses and armour,—if common soldiers, they were to be punished by the loss of a hand or ear. Whoever succeeded in unhorsing an Englishman was to have half his ransom; and a prisoner was to be the property of the captor who first received his plighted hand. The burning of churches, ravishing and slaughter of women and children, were forbidden under severe penalties; and every French and Scottish soldier was to wear a white St. Andrew's cross on his back and breast, which, if his surcoat was white, was to be brodered on a square or a circle of black cloth.‡

With regard to the military tactics of the Scots, it is well known that the infantry ^{Military tactics of the Scots.} were drawn up in deep battalions, which were usually square, though they sometimes fought in an eschele, or circle, which they termed a schiltrum. Of this impenetrable phalanx of spearmen it is said, by an English historian, "that sooner shall a bare finger pierce through the skin of an angry hedgehog, than any one encounter the brunt of their pikes." The command of the national array belonged to the king, and the most eminent or warlike of the nobles present were appointed to lead the grand divisions or battles of the army, usually four in number,—the right and left wings, the centre, and the reserve. Under these leaders, the smaller barons acted as inferior officers, and frequently held their offices by hereditary right. The soldiers were the vassals of their respective chiefs, and not of the sovereign; hence the strange anomaly, that the royal authority was diminished in war and augmented in peace; and it is well known that some of the most daring acts of interference with the prerogative of the monarch took place on the muster of the military array of the kingdom.

The weakness of the executive, indeed, and the exorbitant power of the feudal aristocracy, were the principal causes ^{Exorbitant power of the barons—} of all the miseries which Scotland suffered during this era. These haughty and turbulent barons assumed the state of independent kings,—made war upon each other at their pleasure,—oppressed the people,—trampled upon all law and order,—and, surrounded by their bands of retainers, who acknowledged no law but their masters' will, they laughed to scorn the mandates of a sovereign so lately their equal, and who had no standing army to enforce his impotent decrees. The powerful Earl of Douglas seldom went abroad with fewer than twelve hundred well armed horsemen; and the other nobles had followers in proportion to their rank and estates. The royal authority repeatedly endeavoured, though at no small hazard, to remedy this evil. In the reign of Robert III. it was ^{—abortive attempts to restrain their excesses—} enacted, that, in order to prevent the great and horrible ravages, depredations, fires and homicides which were daily committed in every part of the kingdom, no person in riding through the country should be attended by more persons than those for whom he makes full payment, under the penalty of loss of life and property.* It would appear from this singular statute, that many of these armed followers were not really the vassals of the baron in whose train they rode, but had merely assumed his livery in order that they might, with the greater impunity, rob and murder the defenceless inhabitants. It is evident that this judicious enactment had little or no effect in abating the evils which it was intended to remedy, for, twenty-three years later, on the return of king James from England, it was found necessary to discharge all barons, under the highest penalties of the law, from "moving or making war against each other; from riding through the country with a more numerous following of horse than properly belonged to their estate, or for which, in their progress, due payment was not made to the king's lieges and hostlers."* But it was much easier to pass acts of parliament than to carry them into execution; and though for a time the vigour and resolution of James compelled the nobles to abridge their feudal state, and to yield obedience to the laws, no sooner was his hand withdrawn than they relapsed into their former state of lawlessness and insubordination.

The legislative enactments of this period bring to light various other modes of oppression on the part of the barons. It appears to have been customary, in these unquiet times, for the landlords, upon the most frivolous pretences, to dispossess the poor tenants of their farms, and to turn the labourers out of their cottages, whenever they thought fit to lease the lands to some more favoured tenant, or to dispose of them to a new proprietor. The legislature in vain sought to redress this gross abuse, which destroyed all security of property, by declaring, in the year 1401, that all such "gratuitous resumptions of lands by any over-lord were of none effect, unless due and lawful cause could be assigned for such having taken place."† But this benevolent attempt to protect the rights of the poor completely failed; and, nearly thirty years later, all that the wise and energetic James I. could do, to ameliorate the condition of the dispossessed tenants and labourers, was to make it a request to his prelates and barons that they would not summarily and suddenly remove the husbandmen from any lands of which they had granted new leases, for the space of a year after such a transaction, unless when the baron to whom the estate belonged proposed to occupy the lands himself, and keep them for his own private use.‡ To add to the hardships thus inflicted on the poor, it seems to have been a common practice for the landlord to take the execution of the law into his own hands, and by his own power and authority to expel a vassal from his farm. It appears, too, that in the event of a baron having a claim of debt against any unfortunate individual, it was customary for the creditor to proceed to the house or lands of his debtor and to appropriate whatever he thought proper, as payment of his claim. This practice was declared illegal by the parliament, "unless the seizure be made within his own dominions and for his own proper debt;"§ an exception, it has been justly said, proving the extreme feebleness of the government, and amounting almost to a total annulment of the law. It is not to be wondered at, that in such a state of society the possession of property should have been in the highest degree precarious; that, to use the expressive language of the record itself, "divers and sundrie our soverane lordis lieges should be many ways unjustly troubled and vexed in their lands and heritage;" or that the weak and unprotected should have been trampled down by the strong, as is clearly shown by the decree—that all widows, who after the death of their husbands had been violently expelled from their dower lands, should be restored to their possession; and the strict injunction to the king's judges—that they should be bound and obliged to hear the complaints of all churchmen, widows, pupils, and orphans, regarding whatever injuries may have been committed against them, and that justice should be done to them speedily and without taking from them any pledges and securities.* These and other similar enactments, passed from time to time by the legislature, were in themselves wise and salutary, and well fitted to promote the peace and prosperity of the kingdom; but they remained on the statute-book a mere dead letter—a proof of the intelligence of the monarch and his advisers, rather than of the progress of the country. And the frequent repetition of the same laws affords convincing evidence, as Pinkerton remarks, that the statutes serve rather to indicate the existence of great evils in the country than to provide a remedy for them. In these days of violence, indeed, when "strongest might made strongest right," laws were binding only on the helpless. The royal authority was too feeble to compel the great feudal barons to submit to the restraints of the statutes which they had assisted to frame; and, instead of being the guardians of the laws and the protectors of the rights of the people, they were, in most cases, their worst oppressors, setting at defiance both the mandates of the crown and the enactments of the legislature.

A striking example of the utter impotence of the law to restrain or redress the acts of oppression and robbery perpetrated by the aristocracy at this period, is recorded in the proceedings of the parliament held at Edinburgh in the year 1385. It appears from a complaint made to the national council by William de Fenton, that the Baron of Dirleton, a member of the powerful Norman family of De Vaux, had deprived this unfortunate person of his manor of Fenton, by an unjust decree pronounced in his own feudal court. The case was brought by appeal before the Sheriff of Edinburgh, who reversed the judgment and restored Fenton to his estate, from which, however, he was again violently expelled. He then brought his cause before the privy council, who gave a decision in his favour, and ordered his lands to be once more restored to him. But Dirleton paid as little respect to this solemn award as he had done to that of the inferior court, and, in defiance of the king and his council, he retained possession of the property which by this flagrant act of oppression he had wrested from the rightful owner.*

The condition of the Highlands at this period appears to have been much more rude and uncivilized than that of the lowland districts of the country. The nobles of Norman and Saxon origin, who had settled in these remote provinces, were almost entirely independent of the authority both of the sovereign and the law, and waged incessant warfare with each other, and with the native chiefs, by whom they were regarded with the bitterest animosity as aliens in blood, in manners, and in language. The spoliations, ravages, and murders which were the result of these feuds, reduced the country to such a state of anarchy, that when James I. passed a law, making provision for the pardon of any injury committed upon person or property, where the offender had made reparation or "assythment" to the injured party, he found it necessary to exempt the Highlands or northern division of the country from the operation of this rule, because, as the statute expressly bears, the inhabitants of these wild districts had been so accustomed to rob and murder each other, that it was found impossible to ascertain correctly the extent of the loss, or the amount which should be paid as reparation.†

A curious feature in the manners of Scotland at this period, is exhibited by the laws against sturdy beggars—statutes enacted in the reign of James I. against sorners, or able-bodied mendicants. It appears that troops of these stout and idle vagabonds, who possessed the ability, but not the inclination to work for their living, roamed through the country, extorting charity from those who were not strong enough to refuse it, and living at free quarters in the abbeys or in the granges of the farmers. Some of these mendicants, possessing or pretending to gentle birth, are said to have followed their calling, not in poverty and rags, but with horses, hounds, and attendants. Peremptory injunctions were issued to these sturdy beggars, that they should betake themselves to some honest trade and no longer trouble and devour the country, under the penalty of burning on the cheek and banishment from the kingdom. But the operation of this law against "sorning and masterful beggary," was suspended in behalf of a privileged class called "royal beggars," who were directed to wear a certain token or badge, to be furnished them by the sheriff or magistrates of the burghs, as evidence that they were incapacitated from labour, and were duly authorized to support themselves by begging. "It is curious," says Mr. Tytler, "to discern in this primitive legislative enactment, the first institution of the king's blue coats or bedesmen, a venerable order of privileged mendicants, whose existence has only expired within these few years."‡

In all probability, the erection of inns in burghs and on highways, enjoined by repeated enactments of the legislature, was intended to save the monasteries from the intrusion and oppressive exactions of unwelcome guests, as well as to provide accommodation for travellers. But so great was the voluntary hospitality of the period, that the hostellers received very inadequate support, and grievous complaints were made to the king by the hostellers or innkeepers against a villanous practice of the lieges, who, on their journeys, were in the habit of lodging with their acquaintances and friends, instead of repairing to the regular hostellers and inns. To remedy this grievance, all travellers on foot or horseback were prohibited from taking up their residence in any house except the established hostelry of the burgh or village; and all burgesses and villagers were interdicted from entertaining wayfarers, under the penalty of forty shillings. An exception, however, was made in favour of the nobles and gentry, who were accustomed to travel with a numerous retinue; they were permitted to repair to the houses of their friends, on condition that they sent their followers to lodge in the common inn.*

Previous to the War of Independence, the castles of the Scottish nobility were little, if at all, inferior to the baronial residences of the English. The strong and stately structures of Dunbar, Loelmaben, Caerlaverock, and other feudal fortresses which reared their formidable towers in every part of the kingdom, closely resembled, both in their dimensions and in the style of their architecture, the Norman castles on the other side of the border. The inner ward, called the donjon or keep, was invariably the strongest part of the fortress, and consisted of a large square tower, with walls of tremendous thickness, situated in the centre of the other buildings, from which, however, it was usually detached. The lower story was employed as a dungeon for the prisoners, and a receptacle for the stores; the second floor contained the guard-rooms for the garrison; and, on the third, were the great hall and other apartments which formed the residence of the baron or castellan and his family. In the uppermost rooms were deposited the warlike engines required for the defence of the castle during a siege. For the sake of security, the principal entrance to the keep was generally placed pretty far up the wall, and was protected by a strong gate of thick oak with iron knobs, a portcullis or grating usually composed of iron, and a drawbridge. The other defences consisted of one or two strong exterior walls with flanking towers; and beyond the outer wall was a broad breast-work or barbican, and a moat which encircled the whole building. But, during the protracted warfare with England, the greater part of these baronial castles were patriotically destroyed by the Scots themselves, in order that they might not be permanently garrisoned by the enemy. According to Fordun, within six years of the death of Edward I. a hundred and thirty-seven castles, fortalices, and towers, were taken and cast down by King Robert Bruce, who taught the Scottish people to regard the woods and hills of their country as their safest bulwarks. From this cause, as well as from the unsettled state of the country, the baronial residences erected in Scotland during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries were greatly inferior, both in extent and in architectural design, to those of an earlier date.

—and of the inferior barons— The inferior barons usually occupied a large square battlemented tower, called a peel, protected by an outer wall and some light fortifications. The walls of these fortalices, however, were of immense thickness, and, as the rooms were vaulted, and each story formed a separate lodgment, they were capable of making a considerable resistance to an enemy. But their greatest security was afforded by their situation, which was commonly on a precipice, or on the banks of a torrent, or in the midst of almost impassable morasses. In such structures as these, the Scottish chieftain exercised rude but abundant hospitality, and entertained his kinsmen, vassals, and followers in the best style his resources permit-

—their style of living— The higher nobility, however, endeavoured to add something of magnificence to their rude cheer, and the entertainments given by them on festive occasions were frequently on a large scale, and exceedingly extravagant and expensive. Several of the great Earls of Douglas, who rivalled their sovereigns in splendour, dined amidst the sounding of timbrels and trumpets. These feudal —amusements. banquets were also enlivened by the lays of the harpers and minstrels, and the jests of the fool with his cap, bells, and bauble; and occasionally, by the feats of agility and sleight of hand performed by tumblers and jugglers. To these sources of amusement we may add, the reading of romances, the games of tables or draughts, and chess, and paume or tennis, which was a favourite pastime of James I. and his courtiers. The coffie or parting cup was the signal of retiring to rest.*

Hunting and hawking continued to be the favourite out-of-door amusements; and a proof of the interest taken in these sports is afforded by the punishments inflicted on deer-stealers, and the heavy penalties denounced against those who should slay partridges, plovers, blackcocks, gray hens, and snipe, by any kind of instrument or contrivance, between "lentryn and August;" or who should destroy hares during the time of snow. The Scottish knights enjoyed a high reputation for skill in the splendid exercises of chivalry, and in their thirst for renown they frequently repaired, during the intervals of peace or truce, to the tilts and tournaments of England, where their gallant

The sketch which is given by Lord Lindsay of the ordinary life of the Earls of Crawford in the fifteenth century, may be regarded as equally descriptive of the state maintained by all the great barons of Scotland during the times of feudalism.

The principal residence of this powerful family was at Finhaven, a stately structure situated in Angus, at the entrance of the great valley of Strathmore; but "at certain seasons this country residence was exchanged for the 'Palatium Comitatus,' the 'Earl's Palace,' in the provincial capital, Dundee. A chapel or oratory, dedicated to St. Michael the archangel, was attached to the palace, and served for the daily devotions of the family; but on great church festivals, and the anniversaries of their ancestors, when mass was celebrated for their souls at the altars founded by themselves or their children, they attended in the parish church of St. Mary, where Earl David had founded several chantries; or otherwise in that of the Franciscan convent, commonly called the 'Grey Friars,' where generation after generation of the Earls of Crawford were finally laid to rest, and where their tombs were still to be seen in Gothic magnificence, till the destruction both of convent and church at the Reformation.

"The inner life of the family, especially at Finhaven, was of an uniform but enjoyable character. Martial exercises, the chase, and the baronial banquet, enlivened by the songs of the minstrel, and the quips of the jester occupied the day; and the evening was whiled away in 'the playing of the chess, at the tables, in reading of romances, in singing and piping, in harping, and in other honest solaces of great pleasure and disport,'†—the ladies mingling in the scene throughout, whether in the sports and festivities of the morning, or the pastimes of the evening, though a portion of the day was always spent in their 'bowers,' with their attendant maidens, spinning or weaving tapestry. Occasionally, indeed, a higher responsibility devolved upon them,—during the absence of the earl, whether in attendance on the parliament, or in warfare, public or private, his wife became the châtelaine or keeper of his castle, with full authority to rule his vassals, guide his affairs, and defend his stronghold if attacked at disadvantage during his absence.‡

"The society of the castle consisted of the earl and his immediate family—any guests that might be resident with him—the ladies attendant upon his

‡ No importance comparable to this, no position equally calculated to call forth the human faculties, had fallen to the lot of woman before, nor, it may be added, since. wife and daughters—the pages of noble or gentle birth, trained up in the castle under his eye as aspirants for chivalry—his own domestic officers, most of them gentlemen of quality, the chaplain, the secretary, chamberlain, chief marshall, ‘familiar squire,’ armour-bearer, the last of which offices was hereditary, besides numerous attendant gentlemen cadets, generally of the younger branches of the family, who had attached themselves to him as ‘servitors’ or feudal followers.

“The property that supported this hospitality was extensive. The Earls of Crawford possessed above twenty great baronies and lordships, besides other lands of minor importance, in Forfarshire, Angus, Perthshire, the Mearns, Fife, Aberdeenshire, and the more distant sheriffdoms of Inverness, Banff, Lanark, Wigton, Dumfries, and the Stewartry of Kirkeudbright—those in Forfarshire alone extending over two-thirds of the county—besides hereditary revenues from the Great Customs of Dundee, Montrose, Forfar, Crail, Aberdeen, and Banff, amounting to above three hundred marks annually, equivalent to two thousand pounds sterling in the present day. Of these baronies, some were held in their own hands, others by the immediate cadets of the family, or by families of alien blood, not unfrequently of much older standing in the district, holding as vassals of the earldom; all or most of them were fortified by strong castles; and over those included in the family entails, as the ‘Comitatus,’ or ‘Earldom,’ of Crawford, the earl possessed rights of regality, which ensured him, in the words of a recent historian, ‘at least as many of the privileges of an independent prince, as a Margrave or Pfalzgrave. His courts were competent to try all questions, civil or criminal; that of high treason against the sovereign alone excepted. He appointed judges and executive officers, who had no responsibility to the imperial authority. He had within his territory a series of municipal systems, corporations with their municipal officers, privileged markets, harbours, and mills, with internally administered regulations of police, applicable to weights and measures, fishing privileges, and other like useful institutions. He could build prisons and coin money. When any of his subjects were put on trial before the king’s courts, he could “repledge” the accused to his own court, only finding recognizances to execute justice in the matter.’ He was thus a governor under the sovereign, and not a mere judge like a sheriff; while that nothing should be wanting to the feudal power of the family, the Earls of Crawford acquired, early in the fifteenth century, the sheriffdom of Aberdeenshire in hereditary right, and soon after the middle of the century that of Forfarshire, as the Lindsays of the Byres, the most powerful cadets of the house, did that of Fifeshire, after a long struggle with the Leslies, in the following century.

“The earldom of Crawford, therefore, like those of Douglas, of Moray, Ross, March, and others, of the earlier times of feudalism, formed a petty principality, an ‘imperium in imperio.’ The earls affected a royal state, held their courts, had their heralds or pursuivants, and occasionally assumed the style of princes in the numeration of their ancestors and themselves, as David I., David II., Alexander I., Alexander II., of the name, Earls of Crawford, after a fashion more frequent on the continent than in Britain. They had also a ‘concilium,’ or petty parliament, consisting of the great vassals of the earldom, with whose advice they acted on great and important occasions.*

“Thus far the picture I have drawn bears a close resemblance to the feudalism of the continent. But, owing to the mixture of Celtic and Norman blood, a peculiar element mingled from the first in the feudality of Scotland, and has left its indelible impress on the manners and habits of thought of the country. Differently from what was the case in England, the Scoto-Norman races were peculiarly prolific, and population was encouraged as much as possible. The earl or baron bestowed a fief, for example, on each of his four sons, who paid him tribute in rent and service; each son subdivided his fief again among his own children, and they again among theirs, till the blood of the highest noble in the land was flowing in that of the working peasant at no remote interval. This was a subject of pride, not shame, in Scotland. Within three or four centuries after their settlement in the north, above one hundred different minor houses or families of Lindsays were flourishing in Scotland, many of them powerful, independent barons, holding, in capite, of the crown; many more vassals of the house of Crawford; the greater number settled in Angus, and the surrounding counties, yet others in districts more remote, and in the extremity of the kingdom, all of them, however, acknowledging the Earls of Crawford as the chiefs of their blood, and maintaining constant intercourse with them, either by assistance in their feuds, or by sending their sons to seek service either with them or their more powerful kinsmen; the whole clan thus forming collectively, more particularly during the fifteenth century, a great barrier and breakwater between the fertile eastern Lowlands and the lawless clans of the Highlands. This is no imaginary sketch. The charter of the Earls of Crawford, and of their principal cadets, through several centuries, bear witness to the constant intercourse maintained, even with branches settled for generations, in districts far removed from Angus, but whose claims of kindred were never forgotten by themselves, or overlooked by their chiefs, while a constant preference was given to priests, notaries, pedagogues, tradesmen, and even domestic servants, of the name and blood of Lindsay. A principle of union and attachment thus reigned throughout the whole race; the tie of consanguinity was carefully acknowledged in each ascending stage; the meanest felt himself akin to the highest; the feudal bond was sweetened by blood, and the duty to the chief became the paramount principle of action; and it is to this mixture of feudalism and patriarchism, the result of the mingling of races above alluded to, and reigning throughout the whole social system, that much of that good faith, which a celebrated historian of France has recognized as the distinguishing and redeeming feature of feudal times in Scotland—passion and conviction bearing ever a stronger sway than selfish interest—is attributable.*

* “The Earls of Ross, Lords of the Isles,” says Mr. Riddell, “and perhaps one or two of our highest and noblest magnates—such as the Douglasses in the heyday of their glory, &c., especially when the right of a regality was annexed to their lands—had a ‘council,’ who advised and assisted the chief and over-lord in his deliberations, and gave their consent to the marriages and political alliances of the family, as can be proved by our records. The feudal system, as regarded the higher fields, involved a kind of ‘dominium in dominio,’ and hence induced something analogous to a parliament, or public council.”

The sports of the common people of Scotland

Sports of the common people. were all of a manly and martial character. Wrestling and running, leaping and feneing, throwing the hammer, and "putting the stane," football, and golf, formed their favourite amusements. In the humorous poems ascribed to James I., there are some amusing and curious delineations of the games and manners of the people at this time. The poem called "Peables to the Play," describes what was probably an annual festival in honour of the saint to whom the church was dedicated, and which, beginning in humour and jollity, terminates in tumult and uproar. Mention is made of the music of the bagpipe, of the kerchiefs, hoods, and tippets of the women, and the hats of interwoven birch-twigs worn by the men; of a tavern with fair table-linen, and a regular score on the wall; of the reckoning which amounted to twopence-halfpenny each, and was collected in a wooden trencher. Notice is also taken of the cadger, or itinerant huckster, who carried fish and other articles through the country, on his little horse; of the salmon-dance, which required great exertion in leaping, and various other incidents illustrative of popular manners.†

The dress of the common people at this period

consisted chiefly of a doublet and cloak, and a kind of short trews; the head was covered with a hat of basket-work, or felt, or with a flat woollen bonnet, while the feet and legs remained bare, a practice which appears to have been prevalent even among the common people of England at this period.

With regard to the dress of the upper classes, it was composed of a doublet or vest, with long and jagged sleeves; the jacket or the gown, which supplied the place of the modern coat; the hose, or breeches, and stockings, in one piece; shoes of Spanish leather, with long peaks, fastened to the knees with chains of gold or silver; and the hood or the silken or velvet cap ornamented with jewels. The belt, or girdle, formed also a necessary article of dress; and the linen shirt began now to be used. The chaperon, or hood, now formed a sort of turban, called the roundlet, having a sort of "tippet," as it was called, which hung from one side of it, and was either tucked into the girdle, or wrapped round the neck, as circumstances required. The gown was generally made of silk velvet, or cloth of gold, adorned with costly furs, and embroidered with gold and pearls. Other articles of dress are mentioned in the Contemporary Account of the death of James I., where it is stated, that when the conspirators broke in upon him, he was "standing in his night-gown all undressed, save his shirt, his cap, his comb, his coverchief, his furred pynysons, or slippers, upon the form and the footsheer." The hair was usually worn long, or in natural curls, but for a short time, at the commencement of the fifteenth century, it was cropped quite close.

The female costume of this period consisted of the kirtle, or close gown and petticoat in one piece, and the mantle, the wyliecoat, or under-petticoat; the shift of fine linen from the Netherlands; hose, or high stockings, of linen or woollen cloth; high-laced shoes, of Morocco or Spanish leather; the girdle and the brooch, which fastened the mantle. The sleeves of the ladies' gowns, like those of the men, were preposterously long, and often trailed on the ground. The head-dress had undergone a great change; and the simple caul, and the elegant chaplet, of natural or artificial flowers, or of imitative goldsmith's work, were superseded by elaborate and fantastic monstrosities, termed the horned, the steeple, and the heart-shaped head-dresses, of which no description can give an adequate idea. Considerable light is thrown upon the costume and manners of this period by a sumptuary law of James I., enacted in 1429.* It appears, that the increasing wealth of the commercial classes had stimulated them to vie with the nobles in the magnificence of their habiliments, and strict injunctions were issued, that clothes made of silk, or adorned with the finer furs, or with gold and pearls, should not be worn by any person under the rank of a knight, or whose annual income was less than two hundred marks. Aldermen, bailies, and town councillors, were permitted to wear furred gowns, while all other persons were enjoined to array themselves in such grave apparel as befitted their station; that is to say, in "serpis, beltis, uches and chenzies." The apparel of the women was also regulated by this statute, and merchants are enjoined to make their wives to be habited in a manner corresponding to their station; that is to say, on their head short "curehes," with little hoods, such as arc used in Flanders; England, and other countries; and gowns without purfed sleeves, or long trains, or fur-trimmings, except on holidays: all gentlemen's wives are also directed to take especial care that their array did not exceed the personal estate of their husband.

CHAPTER XVIII.

LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE DURING THE THIRTEENTH, FOURTEENTH, AND FIFTEENTH CENTURIES.

THAT the Gaelic was the language of the ancient Scots, is a fact resting on incontrovertible evidence; but there is great diversity of opinion respecting the manner in which the Saxon or English language was introduced into Scotland. The supporters of the theory that the Picts were a Gothic tribe who spoke a dialect of the Teutonic, different from the Anglo-Saxon, and apparently more allied to the Belgic, affirm that the Scottish language is not the daughter of the Anglo-Saxon, but is "an independent stream, derived from the great fountain of the ancient Gothic, and coming to us in Scotland through purer channels than those wherein it flowed into England." On the other hand, those who maintain that the Picts were a tribe of Celtic origin, account for the general introduction of the Saxon language into the lowland districts of Scotland, from the conquest of the Lothians and Berwickshire, and ultimately, of the kingdom of Strathelyd by the Saxons; the extensive influx of Saxon and Norman nobles to the Scottish court after the marriage of Malcolm Canmore with a Saxon princess, and the multitude of English captives taken in war during the reign of that monarch.

In whatever way the fact may be accounted for, there can be no doubt that, as early as the commencement of the twelfth century, throughout the lowland districts of Scotland, the Saxon language had gradually displaced the ancient Celtic tongue, and was spoken by the king and nobles, and the more civilized portion of the people. It is, no doubt, true that Norman-French was also understood and spoken at the Scottish court, while Latin was the language of the clergy, and was employed in theological and scientific treatises, and in all civil and ecclesiastical contracts and legal proceedings; but Saxon, or English, was the ordinary language of the court and of the people, and was used by the minstrels and bards in the composition of their romances and legendary tales.

In the southern division of the island, the language now called English was formed under very different circumstances. "In England," says Sir Walter Scott, "it is now generally admitted, that after the Norman Conquest, while the Saxon language was abandoned to the lowest of the people, and while their conquerors only deigned to employ their native French, the mixed language now called English existed only as a kind of lingua Franca to conduct the necessary intercourse between the victors and the vanquished. It was not till the reign of Henry the Third that this dialect had assumed a shape fit for the purposes of the poet, and even then, it is most probable, that English poetry, if any such existed, was abandoned to the peasants and menials; while all who aspired above the vulgar, listened to the lays of Marie, the romances of Chretien de Troyes, or the interesting faubliaux of the Anglo-Norman trouveurs. The only persons who ventured to use the native language of the country, in literary compositions, were certain monkish annalists, who usually think it necessary to inform us that they descended to so degrading a task out of pure charity, lowliness of spirit, and love to the 'lewed men,' meaning the lower classes, who could not understand the Latin of the cloister, or the Anglo-Norman of the court. Even when the language was gradually polished, and became fit for the purposes of the minstrels, the indolence or taste of that race of poets induced them to prefer translating the Anglo-Norman and French romances, which had stood the test of years, to the more precarious and laborious task of original composition. It is the united opinion of Wharton, Tyrwhytt, and Ritson, that there exists no English romance prior to the days of Chaucer, which is not a translation of some earlier French one. From these statements it follows, that while the king and nobles of England were amused by tales of chivalry composed in the French or Romance language, those which were chanted in the court of Scotland must have been written originally in 'Inglis.' The English did not begin to translate these French poems till about 1300, nor to compose original romances in their own language until or near a century later. But there is satisfactory evidence, that long before this period, several poets had already flourished in the court of Scotland.*

The peculiar circumstances under which the English language was formed in the Lowlands of Scotland and north of England, as Sir Walter remarks, may account for the superiority of the early Scottish over the early English poets, excepting always the unrivalled Chaucer, as well as for the remarkable excellence of the harpers and minstrels of the "North Countree," and the flow of romantic and poetical tradition which has distinguished the borders of Scotland almost down to the present time.

The earliest composition in the Scottish or "quaint Inglis" language which has survived to our day, is the romance of Sir Tristrem, by the celebrated Thomas the Rhymer, or Thomas of Erildoune. The precise date of the birth of this venerable bard is unknown; but he was alive, and in the height of his reputation, at the death of Alexander III., in 1285. He is supposed to have received the appellation of Rhymer from his poetical works; while his territorial designation was derived from the village of Erildoune or Earlston, in Berwickshire, where, after the lapse of seven centuries, the ruins of the tower which formed the residence of the earliest Scottish poet, are still shown. There is satisfactory evidence that Thomas of Ereildoune was a man of considerable rank, and enjoyed the intimate acquaintance of the great and noble of the time in —his reputation which he lived. He appears to as a prophet. have acquired, at a very early period, the reputation of a prophet, for in those days and many curious notices of his predictions are scattered through the works of our ancient writers. In Barbour's "Bruce," composed about 1375, there is a reference to a prophecy of Thomas, concerning the exploits and succession of Robert the First. After Bruce had slain Cumyn, in Dumfries, in 1300, Lamberton, Bishop of St. Andrews, is introduced, saying :—

"I hope Thomas' prophecy
Of Heralldowne veredyf be
In him; for sa our Lord help me,
I have great hope he shall be king,
And have this land all in leading."

Wyntown, who died about 1420, also refers to the prophetic fame of the Rhymer. His words are these :—

"Of this fight whilum spak Thomas
Of Ereildoune, that sayd in derne,
Thare should meet stalwartly, stark, and sterne.
He sayd it in his prophecie,
But how he wist it was ferly" (a marvel).†

Bower, who flourished about the year 1430, has given a circumstantial account of the celebrated prediction of the Rhymer, respecting the untimely and disastrous fate of Alexander III.‡

Henry the Minstrel, who is supposed to have written his metrical life of Wallace in the early part of the fifteenth century, represents Thomas the Rhymer as alive in 1296, the year in which Wallace took up arms, and as predicting that, before the decease of the Scottish hero,

"Many thousand on field shall make their end,
Of this region he shall the Southron send;
And Scotland thris he shall bryng to the peuce,
So gud of hand agayne shall never be kend."§

Some metrical prophecies, vulgarly ascribed to Thomas of Ereildoune, seem to have been very current in the reigns of James V., Queen Mary, and James VI., and were collected and published, both in Latin and English. The authenticity of "The Prophecies of Thomas Learmount, yet extant in Scottish Rhyme," was firmly believed by Archbishop Spottiswoode, who gravely says, "whence or how he had this knowledge can hardly be affirmed, but sure it is, that he did divine and answer truly of many things to come."¶ We are informed by Birrel, that, at the period of the union with England, a time of great excitement in the northern kingdom, "all the haill commons of Scotland that had red or understanding wer daylie speiking and exponeing of Thomas Rhymer, hes prophesie, and of uther prophesies quihlk wer prophesied in auld tymes." And even at the present day many rhymes ascribed to Thomas of Ereildoune are current among the country people, especially in the border-districts of Scotland.†

It is the opinion of the great writer to whom we owe the publication of the Tale of Origin of the Tristrem, that this celebrated ro-Tale of Tristrem. mance was not invented by Thomas of Ereildoune, but owes its origin to the same source as those legendary tales which commemorate the famous exploits of Arthur and his knights, and the struggles of the aboriginal Britons against the Saxon invaders. Tristrem, as he observes, is uniformly represented as a native of the little kingdom of Cornwall, which was one of the last points of refuge to the indigenous natives of Britain;—the scene of the story is laid either in Cornwall or in the countries of Wales, Ireland, and Brittain, all inhabited by the Celtic race; and the names of all the important personages in the romance are of genuine British origin. He therefore concludes, on apparently valid grounds, that in Tristrem himself we are to recognise an actual British warrior who flourished during the stormy independence of Cornwall, and experienced some of those adventures which have been so long the subject of the bard and the minstrel.

The testimony of a contemporary writer, Robert of Brunne, establishes at once the fact, that Thomas of Ereildoune was the author of Sir Tristrem, and the high reputation which the romance had attained. This ancient author avers, that "it is the best geste ever was or ever would be made, if minstrels could recite as Thomas had composed it." But Style and language of the poem.
He adds, it is written in such "quaint Inglis," that those who repeated it were hardly able to understand it, or to make it intelligible to their hearers. He complains also that the author had employed such an intricate and complicated stanza, that it was difficult for the reciters to recollect the poem; and he avers that he never heard a perfect recital, because of some one "coppie," or stanza, a part was always omitted. But, while he argues that he himself, writing not for the minstrel or harper, but solely to instruct the does well in choosing a simple structure of verse, which they could easily understand and remember, he excuses Thomas of Ereildoune, and another poet, whom he calls Kendal, for using a more ambitious and ornate kind of poetry, because "they wrote for pride (fame), and for nobles, not such as these my ignorant hearers." It is evident from the testimony of this ancient writer, that "while the English minstrels had hardly ventured on the drudgery of translating the French romances, or, if they did so, were only listened to by the lowest of the people, our northern poets were writing original gests, 'for pride and nobleyc,' in a high style and complicated stanza, which the southern harpers marred in repeating, and which their plebeian audience were unable to comprehend.

The modern copy of "Sir Tristrem" corresponds, both in diction and in structure, with the description of Robert de Brunne. The style of the composition is exceedingly brief, elliptical, and concise, even to obscurity, presenting a striking contrast to the circumstantial, diffuse, and prolix descriptions of later minstrels. The structure of the stanza in "Sir Tristrem" is also very peculiar and intricate, and the rhymes are multiplied and complicated to a most unusual extent; but it contains some natural touches of great beauty, as well as many curious and interesting pictures of ancient manners. As a specimen of the structure and language of this celebrated romance, we may take the description of the meeting of Sir Tristrem with a party of hunters.†

"The forest was fair and wide,
With wild bestes y sprad;
The court was ner beside,
The palmers thither him lad;
Tristrem hunters seigh † ride,
Les of houndes § thai ledde;
Thai token in that tide
Of fatte hartes y fedde,
In feld:
In blehand || s he cledde;
The hunters him beheld."

Tristrem is scandalized at the awkward and unsportsmanlike manner in which they break up the stags which they have slain, and expostulates with them:—

"Up stood a serjant ¶ bold,
And spak Tristrem oayn,
—'We and our elders old
Thus then have we sain;
Others thou hast ous told;
Yond lith a beast unfain;
Atire ++ it as thou wold,
And we wil se full fain
In feld;
In lede †† is nought to lain,§§—
The hunters him beheld."

A minute account is then given of the scientific mode in which Tristrem breaks up the stag; how he gave the left shoulder to the forester as his rights, the numbles or inwards to the hunters and spectators, the quarré to the hounds, and the corbin bone to the raven, who sat expectant on the forked tree, and how he tied up the paunch with the grease, as also the gurgiloun, and lastly, recited the appropriate rhyme, and blew the tokening or death-note. The whole description is exceedingly curious, and shows the great importance attached to the "art of venery" in those early ages. ||

|| Sir Tristrem, a Metrical Romance of the Thirteenth Century, with Introduction and Notes by Sir Walter Scott. Lives of the Scottish Poets, by Dr. Irving, vol. i. pp. 225—249.

Besides "Sir Tristrem," there exist two other Scottish romances, entitled "Gawen and Gologras," and "Galoran of Galoway," which Sir Walter Scott supposes were composed long before the conclusion of the thirteenth century. This opinion is founded upon their extreme rudeness and unintelligibility; the comparative absence of French words and French phraseology, so fashionable in Scotland after the time of Robert Bruce, when the intercourse of the countries became more intimate; and, above all, the evident allusions to the possession of part of Scotland by the British tribes.*

An interesting specimen of the Scottish language, at this period, is given in the following little song, or monody, composed on the death of Alexander III., in the year 1285, and fortunately preserved by Wyntown in his Chronicle.† It is probable, however, that the orthography may have undergone considerable alterations during the century and a half which elapsed between the death of Alexander and the time of Wyntown.

"Quhen Alysandr oure kyng wes dede,
That Scotland led in lawe and le,
Away wes sons of ale and brede,
Of wyne and wax, of gamyn and gle;
Oure gold wes changyd in-to lede.
Cryst borne into virgynyté;
Succour Scotland and remede,
That stad is in perplexyte."‡

Mention is also made by Wyntown of a poet called "Huchown of the Awle Ryall," or "Hugh of the Royal Hall or Palace," who appears to have flourished about this period. Besides his great historical work, described as the "Gest Hystoryale," there are specified, among his writings, the "Gret Gest of Arthure," the "Pystyl of Swete Susan," and the "Awntere of Gawane." A poem in alliterative verse, founded on the story of "Susannah and the Elders," and supposed to be the "Pystyl" ascribed to Huchown, is still preserved; and the "Gret Gest of Arthure,"—in which he treats of the doughty deeds of that hero, of his worship and prowess, his conquests and royal estate, his round table and twelve peers,—was discovered a few years ago, by Sir Frederick Madden, among the ancient manuscripts in the Cottonian Library. Wyntown eulogizes Huchown as a poet who "was cunning in literature, curious in his style, eloquent and subtle, and who clothed his composition in appropriate metre, so as always to raise delyte and pleasure."§ But the specimens of his writing which have reached our times by no means bear out this high commendation.

By far the most celebrated Scottish writer of this age is JOHN BARBOUR, Archdeacon of Aberdeen, the author of John Barbour. the metrical history of Robert Bruce. This delightful old author is supposed to have been born about the year 1316; but nothing is known of his family, or of the place of his birth or education. It appears, from safe-conducts granted to him by the English monarch, on the special request of David II., that he prosecuted his studies both at Oxford and in France, even after he had attained to mature years. He was promoted to the office of Archdeacon of Aberdeen about 1356; and in the following year the bishop of the diocese nominated him one of the commissioners who were to meet at Edinburgh to deliberate about the ransom of David II. About ten years later he was engaged in the composition of the great national poem which has perpetuated his name. He was rewarded by a pension from Robert II.,—which is expressly stated to have been bestowed as a reward for the compiling "The Book of the Deeds of Robert I."—and died, at an advanced age, in 1396.

The chronicles of this period were, for the most part, concealed from the unlearned part of the community, under the veil of a dead or a foreign language;* but it is to the honour of Barbour that he renounced this fatal practice, and boldly composed his patriotic and spirit-stirring strains in his own native tongue,—

"Till ilke man's undyrstanding."

His language has been pronounced, by a competent judge, remarkably good for the time, and far superior, in neatness and elegance, even to that of Gawin Douglas, who wrote more than a century after.

Barbour was the author of a metrical history or genealogy of the Kings of Scotland, entitled "The Brute," of which no manuscript is known to exist. But his reputation as a historian and poet rests upon his celebrated history of King Robert Bruce. The value of this noble work, both as a faithful narrative of the exploits of the great deliverer of Scotland, and a graphic delineation of the manners of his age, is very great. Wyntown, himself a historian of no mean value, speaks of Barbour as writing and the continuator of Fordun's "Scotichronicon" passed over the memorable events of the war of independence, because they had been already elegantly and copiously narrated by Barbour. The poetical historian has, indeed, given a spirit-stirring detail of the gallant exploits and dreadful sufferings of the noble patriots who fought, against all odds, in the high and holy cause of their country's freedom; and his narrative is equally valuable for its authenticity and its fresh and graphic descriptions. He delineates the nicer shades of character with great delicacy and discrimination; his portraits of Randolph and Douglas, of King Robert and his brave but rash and impetuous brother, are traced with the hand of a master; and he gives us charming pictures of these noble manners and modes of thinking of these noble patriots, under all the varieties of their romantic fortunes. Barbour's learning must have been great for the time; and he was evidently well read, both in the classical and in the romantic literature of the day. His descriptive powers were of a high order; and, in the opinion of a most competent judge, "he has adorned the English language by a strain of versification, expression, and poetical images far superior to the age."* His impassioned eulogium upon freedom shows, that the heart of a patriot and a soldier beat beneath the churchman's gown; and the manner in which he celebrates the feats of individual prowess and daring, on the part of the Scottish hero and his friends, leaves no doubt, that if he had lived a few years earlier he would not have hesitated to buckle on his armour and fight for the liberty and independence of his country.

"In metre far mair vertuously Than I can think by my study:"

The exordium explains the object of the poetical historian in clear and forcible language—

"Stories to read are delitabill,
Suppose that thai be nought but fabill:
Then suld stories that suthfast + were,
An thai were said on gud maner,
Have doubill plesance in hearing.
The first plesance is the carpyng; †
And the tothir the suthfastness §
That shews the thing rycht as it was
And such things that are lykand,
Till mans hearing are plesand.
Thairfor, I wald fain set my thairill,

Sa that na tyme of length it let,
Nor ger it haly ¶ be forget.
For auld stories that men redys
Represents to thaim the dedys
Of stalwart folk that lywyt are,
Rycht as thai then in presence were."

Tried by his own test, it must be admitted that Barbour has admirably succeeded in composing a poem, which is at once true or suthfast in its statements, and delectable in the perusal. His chronicle is valuable not only for the accuracy of its details, but for the remarkable freshness and vividness of its descriptions, both of natural scenery and of battles and sieges. To use his own expressive words, it represents the deeds of 'stalwart folk who are long since dead, who led their life in great travel, and oft in hard stour or tumult of battle, truly as if we were in their very presence:—King Robert of Scotland, that was hardy of heart and hand—the good Sir James of Douglas, who was so worthy in his time that his high price and bounty made his name renowned in foreign lands—the fiery, rash, and headstrong Edward, and the sagacious Randolph, whose 'trusty heart and loyal service were enhanced by his courteous and debonayr manners, and shone out in his fair, pleasant and broad countenance.' Of these noble patriots and their worthy compeers he says—

* It is hardly established was the custom of writing in Latin, that the David Lindsay, a century after Barbour, thought it necessary to apologize, in the beginning of his "History" for writing in his native language, by producing the examples of Moses, Aristotle, Plato, Virgil, Cicero, &c., who all wrote in their own language.

"I think this book to ma,
Now God give grace that I may saw Tret it and bring it till ending
That I say nocht but suthfast thing."

The first seven of the twenty books into which this historical poem has been divided by Dr. Jamieson, its latest editor, are occupied with the early adventures of King Robert Bruce, from the murder of Comyn down to the convention between Edward Bruce and Sir Philip Mowbray, the Governor of Stirling castle; and the various reverses of fortune in the eventful life of the Scottish monarch,—his defeat at Methven, and subsequent dangers and privations among the fastnesses of Argyle, his encounter with Lorn, and his devoted clansmen, his retreat to the isle of Rachrin, his return to the mainland, his romantic exploits among the mountains of Galloway and Carriek, and his victories over the English invaders, and their gradual expulsion from the country, are all narrated with great spirit, and in strains which came warm from the heart of the patriotic poet. The eighth and ninth books are devoted to an account of the memorable conflict which finally secured the independence of Scotland; and here the author puts forth the whole strength of his genius. After enumerating, with much skill, all the host which Edward assembled from England, Wales, and Ireland, and from his continental dominions in Gascony, Poitou, Provence, and Languedoc; and describing the mighty army divided into ten battles, and with its immense array of baggage-waggons and attendants, overspreading all the land far and wide, and forming a magnificent spectacle of martial pomp and splendour; he says, that on their march from Berwick—

"Baith hills and vallyes helyt thai (they hid)
As the battails that were braid
Departit, over the feldis raid,
The sone was brycht and shyning cler,
And armouris that burnyst wer,
Sa blomit with the sunnis beme,
That all the land was in a leme (blaze);
Banners rycht fairly flaming,
And pensils to the wind waving,
Sa fell ther wer of ser quentis,
(So many there were of great quaintness,
That it were gret slycht to devise."

On the other hand, Bruce reviews his troops, assigns to their leaders their different parts, explains to them his tactics, and finding his men "of hardy countenance," he who "knew him well" in such matters, rejoiced in their gallant bearing—

"And thought that men of sa gret will,
Giff thai wald set their will thartil,
Suld be full hard to win per-fay.
And as he met them in the way,
He welcumit thaim with gladsum fare,

For to mayteynie his honour."

Bruce then explains to his men the plan he had formed for the battle, arranges them in their order, assigns to the leaders their several parts, and makes all necessary preparations for the reception of the enemy. On Sunday morning, soon after sun-rise, they heard mass, and many of them were shrived "full devoutly."

"That thought to die in that mellé,
Or then to mak their cuntre free;

Bot for the vigil of Sanct John Thai fastit water and breid upon."

The poet then proceeds to narrate, in appropriate strains, a number of spirit-stirring incidents, which served as a fitting prelude to the great battle;—the defeat of Clifford by Randolph; the chivalrous conduct of Douglas in hastening to the rescue of his friend when outnumbered and apparently overmatched by the enemy, but stopping when he saw him likely to discomfit his enemies by his own might, lest he should deprive him of some part of his well-merited praise; the encounter between King Robert Bruce and Sir Henry de Bohun; the crowding of the Scottish leaders around Randolph on his return from his successful conflict with Clifford, to gaze on him and do him honour "for his high worschip and gret valour;" the animating address of Bruce to his barons and knights, and their courageous response; the kneeling of the Scottish army as the conflict was about to begin; and the different inferences of the English monarch and his veteran attendant Sir Ingram de Umfraville—

"The Scottis men commounaly, Knelyt all doune to God to pray;
And a short prayer thar made they
To God to help them in that fycht.
And when the Inglis king had sycht
Of thaim kneeling he said in hy (haste),
'Yon folk kneel to ask mercy.'
Sir Ingraham said 'Ye say suth now,
Thai ask mercy, but name at you;
For their trespes to God thai cry.
I tell you a thing sekyrly (surely),
That yon men will all wyn or die."

After this solemn note of preparation the opposing hosts join battle, and the poet describes with great power the impetuous assault of the English cavalry upon the dense ranks of the Scottish spearmen—the comparatively small body of the Scots lost amid the multitude of the English, as if they had been plunged into the sea—the din of blows—the clang of arms—the shoutings of the war-cries—the crash of lances—the flight of arrows darkening the light—horses, maddened by their wounds, running masterless—the alternate sinking and rising of the banners—the grass red with blood, and covered with shreds of armour and broken weapons—the confusion and slaughter, the panic and the flight. The conduct of Edward, who, according to Barbour, with a company of five hundred men,

"armed all at rycht,
In till a frusch all took the fycht," is skilfully contrasted with the chivalry of Sir Giles de Argentine, who "chose rather to stay and die than to live shamefully and flee," and shouting his war-cry, "Do Argenté," met his death by the Scottish spears.

But, perhaps, the most interesting portions of this "fine old Scotch Odyssey" are the delightful sketches which it contains of manners and customs, and the striking pictures of the confidence and affection that existed between King Robert and his followers. After the fatal defeat at Methven, Bruce and his little band of faithful friends were driven to take refuge in the fastnesses of the mountains, where they were joined by their ladies—

"That for leal luff and lawtē Wald partneris of thair painis be."

During their wanderings among the hills of Breadalbane they were reduced to the greatest privations from the want of the necessaries of life; and Barbour describes "the worthy James of Douglas" as very active in procuring food for the ladies, sometimes venison, sometimes "geddis (pikes), salmonys, and troutis," which he caught with "gynnes," and sometimes making a foray into the low country for cattle.

"And the kyng oft comfort was Through his wyt and his besynes" (cheerfulness),

The personal character of Bruce himself shines out with peculiar lustre in the adverse tide of his fortunes; and many traits of his gentle and affectionate disposition are recorded by his biographer. He strove to sustain the courage of his followers by the example of his own patience and indomitable resolution, and to cheer their sinking spirits with stories from history and romance.

"And fained to mak better cheer,
Than he had matter to, by far
For his cause gæd fra ill to war" (worse).

At length, on the approach of winter, the Earl of Athole's heart began to fail,

"With canil, and hungir, and wakin," and he requested the king to leave him to his fate. It became necessary also to provide for the safety of the ladies, who were no longer able to bear the privations and dangers of a wandering life amid these barren wilds; and it was resolved to send them to Kildrumny castle under the charge of the Earl of Athole and Nigel Bruce. The king gave up all the horses of his party for the service of the ladies and their escort, and resolved that he and his followers should henceforth "tak on foot balth weill and wae."

"The quene and all hyr company
Lap on thair horse and furth thair fare.
Men mycht have sene wha had bene there
At leve takyng the ladyis grette (weep)
And mak thair face with tears wet;
And knightis for thair luffis sake
Hath sigh and weep, and murning make;
Thai kisit thair luffis at thair partyng."

The poet then proceeds to describe the tedious and perilous passage of the king and his followers across Loch Lomond, in a little boat, fit to carry only three at a time; and tells us, that during the time which was consumed in crossing the lake, Bruce entertained those who had passed over, by relating to them the romance of Ferembrace,* who was overcome by the "rycht douchty Oliver," together with an account of the siege of the "Douse pairs," in the tower of Egrymor, by King Lawyn.

"The gud king upon this maner Comfortit thaim that war him ner,
And maid thaim gamyn and solace Till that his folk all passit was."

While the fugitives were traversing the hills and woods in search of food, they were joined by the Earl of Lennox, who was also under hiding, and had received no tidings of the fate of his royal master since the disastrous defeat at Methven.

"The king him welcomit rycht blythly,
And askyt him full tendyrly;
And all the lordis that war there
Rycht joyful of thair meeting wer,
And kyssit him in gret dayntē.
It was gret pitē for till se
How thai for joy and pitē gret,
When that thai with thair fellow met,
That thai wend (thought) had been dede: forthi
Thai welcomit him mar hartfully;
And he for pitē gret agayn,
That never of meeting was sa fayne."

With such touches of gentleness and tender affection does the old chronicler relieve his stern story of hardship and battle. So also in noticing the death of Sir Walter Ross.

"That Sir Edward, the king's brother,
Luffit and had in sic dayntē,
That as himself him luffit he.
And when he wyst that he was ded,
He was sa wa and will of reide,
That he said, makand evil cher,
That him war rather that jonrnay wer
Undone, than he sa ded had bene.
Out-taken him men has nocht sene,
When he for ony man maid moanyng."

Such are some of the nicer traits of character which ordinary historians are too much in the habit of overlooking.

The story of King Robert and the lavender (or laundress), though better known, deserves to be quoted as an example, both of the thoughtful kindness and humanity of the monarch, and of the manner of his affectionate biographer. The Scottish army was about to commence its march from Limerick.

"And when that thai all redy wer,
The king has hard a woman cry:
He askit what that was in hy.
'It is the lavender, Sir,' said a ne,
'That her chyld-ill rycht now has tane,
And mon leve now behind us here;
Tharfor she makis yone evil cher.'
The king said, 'Certis it wer pitē
That she in that poynt left suld be;
For certis, I trow thar is na man
That he ne will rew a woman than.
His host all than arrestit he,
And gert a tent soon stentit be,
And gert her gang in hastily,
And othyr women to be hyr by;
Till she was delivered he badē (stayed),
And syne furth on his wayis raid."

* See Appendix, Note xiv.

And how she furth suld caried be,
Or iver he furth fur orlanyt he.
This was a full gret curtesy,
That sic a king, and sa mychlyt,
Gert his men dwell on this maner
But for a poor lavender."

As a specimen of Barbour's descriptive powers we may give the following verses on Spring, which, as Dr. Irving justly observes, suffer little in comparison even with Chaucer's description of the same sweet season:—

"This was in Ver, when wynter tide,
With his blasts hidyous to bide,
Was our drywyn,* and birllys small
As turturis,+ and the nychtyngeale,
Began rycht sariely to syng,
And for to mak in thair singyng
Swete notis and soandis ser,
And melodys pleasand to her.
And the treis began to ma †
Burgeans,§ and brycht blomis alswa,
To win the helyng of thair bewid,
That wykkit winter had thaim revid,
And all grassys began to spryng."

It is a proud thing, it has been justly said, to have given a subject for such an Odyssey, and to have had a poet worthy to celebrate it.

Another of the metrical histories of this age is Wyntown's the "Orygynale Cronykil of Scotland," composed by Andrew Wyntown, Prior of St. Serf's monastery, situated on an island in Lochleven. || The precise date of his birth is unknown; but he held the office of Prior in 1395; and his life must, at least, have been prolonged till 1420, for, at the close of his work, he mentions the death of Robert, Duke of Albany, which took place in the course of that year, and offers up a prayer for the prosperity of his children. He was, therefore, a contemporary of Barbour, to whose merit as an accurate historian he has, on various occasions, paid a just tribute. His chronicle, which he tells us was undertaken at the request of Sir John Wemyss, ¶ the ancestor of the present noble family of that name, is valuable both as a picture of ancient manners and as a repository of historical anecdotes. Like other chroniclers of his age, Wyntown commences his work with a general history of the world, and treats of the nature of angels; the creation of the world; the death of Abel; the generations of Cain and Seth; the primeval race of giants; the ark of Noah and the deluge; the situation of India, Egypt, Africa, Europe, Britain, and Ireland; the confusion of tongues; the origin of poetry and of Mahometanism; the lives of the patriarchs; the siege of Troy; the Judges of Israel, and the arrival of Brutus in Britain. Of the nine books into which his chronicle is divided,

"In honoure of the ordyrs nyne Of holy angelys,"

five are almost entirely occupied with these heterogeneous topics, till at length, in the commencement of the sixth book, he comes to speak of the "War betwen the Scottis and the Pechtis," and gradually limits his dissertations to his own proper subject. "Perhaps," says Mr. Ellis, "the ablest modern versifier who should undertake to enumerate in metre the years of our Lord in only one century, would feel some respect for the ingenuity with which Wyntown has contrived to vary his rhymes throughout such a formidable chronological series as he has ventured to encounter. His genius is certainly inferior to that of his predecessor, Barbour; but, at least, his versification is easy, his language pure, and his style often animated. As a historian he is highly valuable."* While Wyntown was engaged in the composition of his work, some person of kindred taste and pursuits, whose name he has unfortunately neglected to mention, sent him a narrative of affairs in Scotland from the birth of David II. to the death of Robert II., which he has incorporated into his own work. He has also included in his chronicle, about three hundred verses of Barbour's "Life of Bruce," as well as various fragments of a Latin elegiac chronicle. The composition of the "Orygynale Cronykil," though unpolished, is often spirited; but the descriptions are not unfrequently unnecessarily minute and diffuse. It must be admitted, however, that the digressions in which the work abounds, are exceedingly valuable and interesting, in consequence of the light which they cast upon the state of society at that early period. Wyntown was inferior to Barbour, not only in genius, but in sound judgment. He was a zealous churchman, and avails himself of every opportunity to advance the power and dignity of the clergy, and to maintain that superiority over the civil power which they claimed as a divine right. He was much more under the influence of superstitious feeling than his predecessor, and his chronicle contains a considerable number of fabulous legends, which convey a curious idea of the credulity of the age. The following specimen of these monastic tales may serve to show the orthography and style of the venerable chronicler:—

ST. SERF'S RAM.

"This holy man had a ram
That he had fed up of a lam,
And oysit him til folow ay,
Quhervir he passit in his way.
A theyf this scheppe in Achren stal,
And et him up in pecis smalle.
Quhen Sanct Serf his ram had myst,
Quha that it stal was few that wist:
On presumpcion nevirtheles
He that it stal areyst was:
And til Sanct Serf syne was he brought:
That scheippe, he said, that he stal noucht,

|| St. Serf's priory was originally a religious house belonging to the Culdees. David I. bestowed it upon the Canons Regular of St. Andrews.

¶ Sir John Wemyss was the proprietor of Reres and Kincaldrum in Fife. He lived under the reigns of Robert II. and III. and James I., and was employed as ambassador to treat concerning the release of this monarch from his captivity in England. "He was," says Wyntown, "an honest knight and of good fame, and had a full claim to my service."

And tharfor for to swer ane athe,
He said that he wald nocht be laythe.
Nes sone he worthit rede for schayme,
The scheype thar bletyt in his wayne!
Swa was he taincyt schamfully,
And at Sanct Serf askyt mercy."

The reputation of Wyntown as an accurate historian stands deservedly high, and his simple and unadorned and trustworthy narrative of events presents a striking contrast to the preposterous fictions of Hector Boece and his followers. "In Wyntown's Chronicle," says Mr. Macpherson, "the historian may find what for want of more ancient records, which have long ago perished, we must now consider the original accounts of many transactions, and also many events related from his own knowledge, or the reports of eye-witnesses. His faithful adherence to his authorities appears from comparing his accounts with unquestionable vouchers such as the Fœdera Angliæ, and the existing remains of the Register of the Priory of St. Andrews, that venerable monument of ancient Scottish history and antiquities, generally coeval with the facts recorded in it, whence he has given large extracts, almost literally translated."* Historical records, however, were at this period exceedingly scanty, as Wyntown himself informs us in the introduction to his Chronicle, when he bespeaks the reader's indulgence for his work. "For," says he, "I found few writings at hand that I could draw to my warand. I had part, indeed, of the book which Peter Comestor compiled in his day, the Chronicle also of Orasius and of Frère Martyne, besides English and Scottish stories, and various other incidents which I deemed accordant to my matter. When these were exhausted I found my wit grown dry, and without either flower or fruit; yet not the less for this do I pursue my purpose, seeking the savour of that rose which spreads its full-blown flowers, and for ever springs for the pleasure of the King of kings."†

The account of the return of David II. from his captivity in England, may be taken as a fair example of Wyntown's mode of narration, and affords a curious illustration of the manners of the age. The historian, it will be observed, justifies the manner in which the king sought to repress the troublesome and intrusive loyalty of his people. The original spelling of this extract has been modernized.

The pages of Wyntown abound in fresh and curious pictures of the manners and superstitious of the age; and throw much light upon the progress of the country in agriculture, manufactures, and commerce. It has been objected to him, indeed, to use the words of his learned editor, that he sometimes runs into descriptions more minute and diffuse than are consistent with the rules of writing history; in answer to which, it is sufficient to say, that these rules were unknown in his age. Such descriptions were the defect, perhaps, more properly speaking, the beauty of several early historians: by them Snorro, the venerable Herodotus of the north, and Froissart, the history-painter of France, England, and Scotland, who, like our own Wyntown, had the courage to write history in their native languages, bring us home to the scenes they describe, and make us take an interest in the characters they draw. If the succession of kings and the relation of their battles be the body of history, the progress of the human mind in arts and knowledge, and a true delineation of manners, unquestionably constitute the very soul of it.*

The materials which Wyntown has collected are indeed of the most heterogeneous character, and comprehend all classes of subjects, from the barbarous bead-roll of Pictish monarchs to the spirit-stirring description of "a heady fight, or the moving picture of a tournament or a hunting party." His chronicle, therefore, bears no resemblance to the historical works of modern times. To use the felicitous comparison of Mr. Tytler, "We have, instead of a building of correct taste and Grecian proportion, an extraordinary and rambling edifice, somewhat resembling the ancient castles or picturesque monasteries of the times in which the author lived, where, in defiance of all rules and orders, a chamber or a chapter was added according to the exigency or the fancy of the moment. The language, too, or materials with which his work is constructed, is as rude and venerable as the ivy-covered walls or weather-beaten pinnacles upon which the waves of successive centuries have left the traces of their progress. Yet what spectator of taste has not often preferred the ancient castle, with all its romantic disproportion, to the symmetrical beauty of the modern edifice? And where is the student, who is an enthusiast in the history and antiquities of his country, who would not rather read the quaint and homely descriptions of the Prior of Locheven, than the pages of modern writers, where vigour, freshness, and originality are so often sacrificed to insipid elegance?"

The chronicle must have been completed between the 3rd of September, 1420, and the return of King James from England in 1424; and it is probable that the author did not long survive the conclusion of his work, for in the prologue of his last book he mentions that increasing years and infirmities warned him that he "must shortly put off this tabernacle;" and he represents age or eld as daily sending him many painful "brevis" or letters, admonishing him to be looking for a speedy conclusion of his mortal term, when the debt which all must discharge would be claimed on short delay.

"Oft I find impediment,
With sudane and fierce maladis,
That me cumbris on mony wis,
And elde me masteris with hir brevis,
Ilke day me sare aggrevis;
She has me maid monition
To see for a conclusion
The quhilk behovis to be of debt,
Quhat term or tyne of that be set
I can wyt it be na way,
But weil I wate on short delay
At a court I mon appear,
Fell accusations thare til heir,
Quhare na help thare is but grace." †

The oldest prose history of Scotland is the Scotch chronicon, written in Latin, the joint production of two ecclesiastical The Scotch chronicon. ties, JOHN FORDUN and WALTER BOWER, to whose praiseworthy industry succeeding historians are deeply indebted. Fordun, who is supposed to have derived his surname from the place of his nativity, a small village in Mearns,* held the office of Canon of Aberdeen. The precise date of his birth is unknown; but he appears to have flourished about the year 1380. Fordun—according to his continuator, Bower, was a simple man, who never graduated in the schools; but he is understood to have derived the materials for his chronicle from the celebrated Wisheart, Bishop of Glasgow, who acted so conspicuous a part in the war of independence.† The first five books of the Scotch chronicon, and twenty-three chapters of the sixth book are the composition of the venerable canon; the remainder of the work, which extends in all to sixteen books, was compiled by Walter Bower, or Bowermaker, principally from the materials collected by his predecessor. Bower was a native of Haddington, and was born in the year 1385. Like many other Scottish youths of that age, after completing his philosophical and theological studies in the schools of his native country, he visited Paris, in order to study the laws. On his return to Scotland, in the year 1418, he was elected Abbot of St. Colm, a religious house, erected by Alexander I., on Inch-Colm, a small island in the Frith of Forth, and dedicated to St. Columba.‡ In this secluded retreat Bower occupied his leisure in transcribing the Chronicle of Fordun, which, up to this date, was little known; and, besides enlarging the work, he brought down the narrative to the death of James I.

Like Wyntown, the authors of the Scotch chronicon laboured under great disadvantages in the composition of their work, from the want of written materials. The ancient chronicles of the kingdom were, for the most part, the production of the monkish annalists of the age, and were usually deposited in the religious houses to which these clerical students belonged. But many of the histories and chronicles must have perished during the frequent incursions of the Norwegian or Danish pirates, by whom the Scottish monasteries were repeatedly plundered. The monastery of Icolmkill, where, previously to the union of the Scottish and Pictish kingdoms, the sovereigns of Scotland were solemnly crowned and interred, was burnt and ravaged by these marauders no less than six times during the course of the tenth century, and the gesta and annals of the Scots and Picts, and other important records, deposited in that venerable establishment, * Lord Monbodo, one of the judges of the Court of Session, and the eccentric author of some writings on metaphysics and the origin and progress of language, was a native of the parish of Fordoun, (see Boswell's Journal of his Tour to the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, chap. iv.;) and Dr. Beattie, the author of "The Minstrel" and other works, was at one time its schoolmaster.

must, in all probability, have perished at the same time. But the ambition of Edward I. proved a more formidable enemy to the ancient historical records of Scotland, than either the ravages of the Danes, or the corroding tooth of time. Under the pretext of deciding the competition for the crown between Bruce and Baliol, in accordance with the precedents of former reigns, and the ancient laws and usages of Scotland, Edward collected from the libraries of the monasteries and the repositories of the public records, the chronicles, charters, writs, and other documents, which treated of the ancient history of Scotland, and either destroyed or carried them into England.* Attempts have been made of late to call in question this statement, but the most satisfactory evidence of its truth is to be found in the celebrated document presented in the name of the Estates of Scotland to Pope Boniface VIII., in the year 1301:—"As to all these points," it is said, "and with regard to the other defences which may be brought forward, or the liberties which may be claimed, or the rights which may be found existing in the kingdom of Scotland, the King of England has abstracted the existing muniments and the public records from the treasury, which could have illustrated them: and when he had the custody of this kingdom, he, by force and fear, caused the same, along with many other bulls, charters, and muniments which confirmed the liberties of the same kingdom, to be abstracted from the treasury, and carried with him into England."† This explicit statement is completely corroborated by the testimony of the English historian, Knighton,‡ and of the author of the Preface to the ancient Chronicle of Cupar; and especially by a precept or order which still remains addressed by Edward I. to the keepers of Edinburgh castle, enjoining them to deliver up all the charters, and other documents in their possession, which concerned the rights of the competitors for the Scottish crown, or related in any way to the kingdom of Scotland, to be carried off, and placed wherever the king should appoint.§

It is highly to the credit of Fordun, that, in spite of these disadvantages, he undertook the compilation of a chronicle of Scottish affairs; and he appears to have spared neither expense nor labour in the prosecution of his praiseworthy design. The extraordinary exertions which he made to collect materials for his history, are commemorated by the author of the Preface to the ancient Chronicle of Cupar, in the following quaint and bombastic terms:—"After the loss of these chronicles (the national monuments destroyed and carried off by Edward I.) a venerable Scottish priest, by name John Fordun, arose, and feeling his heart titillated and effervescent with patriotic zeal, he applied his hand boldly to the work; nor did he desist from his undertaking until, by the most laborious study and perseverance, traversing England and the adjacent provinces of his own country, he had recovered so much of the lost materials as enabled him to compose five volumes of the delectable gests of the Scots, which he drew up in a sufficiently chronicle-like style, as they are to be found in the great volume entitled the 'Scotichronicon.' In this undertaking, it is impossible to refrain from bestowing great praise on the industry of the author. For, advertent to the fact, that to commit all the record of past ages to the memory is the attribute of God, rather than man, he upon this consideration travelled on foot, like an unwearied and investigating bee, through the flowery meadow of Britain, and into the oracular recesses of Ireland; taking his way through provinces and towns, through universities and colleges, through churches and monasteries, entering into conversation, and not unfrequently sharing at bed and board with historians and chronologists; turning over their books, debating and disputing with them, and pricking down, or intitulating in his descriptive tablets all that most pleased him: in this manner, and by pursuing such indefatigable investigation, he became possessed of the knowledge which was before unknown to him, and, collecting it with studious care in the revolving sinuosities of his parchment code, like rich honeycombs in a historical hive, he, as I have already premised, divided them into five books of elegant composition, which brought down the history to the death of the sainted King David."*

Like the other monkish annalists, Fordun endeavours to trace the origin of his own people to a period of the most remote antiquity; and he has embodied in his history all the preposterous fictions respecting the rise of the Scots, which were current in Scotland at the time when he began his collections. The first of the five books into which he has divided his work, includes a period of eleven hundred and seventy-five years, from the first emigration of the Scots, in the days of Moses, under Gathelus, son of Neolus, King of Greece, down to the commencement of the Scottish monarchy in Britain, which Fordun supposes to have taken place in the year of the world 4864, under Fergus, the son of Ferchard. Following the absurd fashion of his age, the venerable canon presents his reader with a general history of the world, and descant upon such subjects as the form of the universe; the position of the earth in the centre of the system and equidistant from every part of the circle of the heavens; the four principal points of the compass; the four cardinal winds; the division of the world into Asia, Africa, and Europe; its partition among the three sons of Noah; the exact situation of paradise; the history of Europe, and its great islands; and thus winding his way through these heterogeneous topics, he comes at last to the origin of the Scots, the journey of Gathelus from Greece to Egypt, his marriage to Scota, the daughter of Pharaoh, his voyage to Spain, the three emigrations of the Scots from Spain to Ireland, and their settlement in Britain about 330 years before Christ.

The second book of the Scotichronicon embraces the history of seven centuries, from the year 330 A.C., to the alleged restoration of the Scottish monarchy by Fergus II., in the year of our Lord 403. The third book contains the history of the Scots from the time of Fergus II., down to the year 830, which marks the reign of Alpin, the father of Kenneth, who united the Pictish and Scottish kingdoms. The fourth book extends over a period of two hundred and thirty-six years, from the time of Alpin, down to the reign of Malcolm Canmore; and the fifth book occupies the space of ninety-six years, from A.D. 1056, to the death of David I., A.D. 1153.

The continuation of the Scotichronicon by Walter Bower, was composed partly from the notes which Fordun had collected, and which he committed to Bower when he found himself too infirm to carry on his historical labours; partly from the chronicles and papers communicated to him by Sir David Stewart, of Rosyth, his patron, who urged him to undertake the work; and partly from the additional information which his own researches had discovered. From these various sources Bower has continued the narrative, from the death of David I., down to the murder of James I., in 1437. In spite of the credulity and superstition often manifested by the authors of the Scotichronicon, and the lengthened digressions in which it abounds, it is a work of great value to the historian, and contains much important and authentic information, as well as many striking notices of contemporary manners. In style and arrangement it has been pronounced equal, and in fidelity and accuracy even superior to the chronicles of the contemporary English annalists, Trivet, Higden, Knighton, and Matthew of Westminster. Fordun appears to have enjoyed high reputation, even in his own day, and his Chronicle was held in such esteem by the clergy, who possessed a monopoly of the learning of this age, that the various monasteries and religious houses, which had been robbed of their ancient records by Edward I., adopted the Scotichronicon as their conventual history, making only a few inconsiderable additions, and giving it the name of the monastery by whose superiors it had been adopted, transcribed, and continued.*

The age which was adorned by the genius of James I.

Gower and Chaucer, produced in

JAMES I. a Scottish poet not unworthy to be ranked with these fathers of English verse. "James belongs," says Washington Irving, "to one of the most brilliant eras of our literary history, and establishes the claims of his country to a participation in its primitive honours. While a small cluster of English writers are constantly cited as the fathers of our verse,

* See "Liber Paslatensis," "Liber Seonensis," "Liber de Cupro," &c. Innes, Critical Essay, vol. i. pp. 210, 233.

the name of their great Scottish compeer is apt to be passed over in silence; but he is evidently worthy of being enrolled in that little constellation of remote, but never-failing luminaries, who shine in the highest firmament of literature, and who, like moving stars, sang together at the bright dawning of British poesy."

"James was evidently an admirer and studier of the writings of Chaucer and Gower. Indeed, in one of his stanzas, he acknowledges them as his masters; and in some parts of his poem we find traces of similarity to their productions, more especially to those of Chaucer. There are always, however, general features of resemblance in the works of contemporary authors, which are not so much borrowed from each other as from the times. Writers, like bees, toll their sweets in the wide world: they incorporate with their own conceptions the anecdotes and thoughts which are current in society; and thus each generation has some features in common, characteristic of the age in which it lived."

The most important production of this accomplished monarch, is a long poem, called, "The King's Quair," or Book, in which he describes the circumstances of the attachment which he formed, while a prisoner in Windsor Castle, to Lady Jane Beaufort, who subsequently became his queen. It is in various respects a remarkable work, and derives peculiar interest from the fact, that it may be considered a transcript of the royal bard's true feelings, and the story of his real loves and fortunes. It has been pronounced by Mr. Ellis to be full of simplicity and feeling, and not inferior in poetical merit to any similar production of Chaucer. The introduction to the poem is remarkably spirited and beautiful. It was, he says, the still mid-watch of a clear moonlight night, the stars Plan of "The King's Quair." were twinkling as the fire in the high vault of heaven, and "Cynthia viewing her golden locks in Aquarius." He lay in bed wakeful and restless, and sought to beguile the tedious hours by the perusal of "Boethius's Consolations of Philosophy," a work highly popular at that period, and which had been translated by his great prototype Chaucer. After closing the volume, he is naturally led to reflect on the general instability of human affairs, the vicissitudes of his own life, and the misfortunes that had overtaken him even in his tender youth. Suddenly he hears the bell ringing to matins, but its sound seems to him like a voice exhorting him to write his story. As he had in his time, he says, spent some ink and paper to little effect, he determines to comply with the intimation, and to write something new. He therefore takes the pen in hand, makes with it the sign of the cross, to implore a benediction on his work, and forthwith begins his poem. He describes, in very affecting terms, his departure from his native country, his cruel and unjust capture during his voyage to France; and bewails his long captivity in a foreign land, and his lonely and inactive life, shut out, in the vigour of youth, from all the enterprise and delights of the world, while even the lower animals live in freedom, every one after his kind. He had risen at day-break, he tells us, according to custom, to escape from the dreary meditations of a sleepless pillow. Bemoaning in his chamber thus alone, despairing of all joy and remedy, "fortired of thought, and woe-begone," he turned to the window,

"To see the world and folk that went forbye."

He informs us that the window looked forth upon a small garden, which lay at the foot of the tower, and was adorned with a green arbour and trellised walk, protected from the passing gaze by trees and hawthorn hedges.

"Now was there made fast by the towris wall
A garden fair; and in the corners set Ane arbour green, with wandis long and small Hailed about, and so with trees be set
Was all the place, and hawthorn hedges knet,
That lyf* was none walking there forbye,
That might within scarce any wight espy.

"So thick the boughis and the leavis green Beshaded all the alleys that there were,
And mids of every arbour might be seen
The sharpe greene sweete juniper,
Growing so fair with branches here and there,
That as it seemed to a lyf* without,
The boughis spread the arbour all about.

"And on the smalle greene† twistis sat,
The little sweete nightingale, and sung
So loud and clear, the hymnis consecrat
Of lovis use, now soft, now loud among,
That all the gardens and the wallis rung

It was the month of May, when everything was in bloom, and he imagines that the hymn of the feathered choristers, with which all the gardens and the walls rang, is a welcome to this delightful season.

¶ Worship all ye that lovers be this May,
For of your bliss the kalends are begun,
And sing with us—away Winter! away!
Come Summer! come the sweet season and sunn;
Awake! for shame! that have your heavenis won †
And amorously lift up your heads all;
Thank Love, that list you to his mercy call.

"When they this song had sung a little thrave, §
They stumt awhile, and therewith unafraid,
As I beheld and cast mine eyes alawe,
From bough to bough they hoppit and they played,
And freshly in their birdis kind arrayed
Their feathers new, and fret them in the sun, ||
And thanked Love they had their mates won."

As he gazes on the scene and listens to the notes of the birds singing the praises of their mates, the captive prince wonders what this love may be, which seems to confer, even on the irrational creation, such perfect enjoyment. Is it not, after all, a fantasy, a mere counterfeited bliss? And if it be a boon thus generally dispensed, even to the beasts of the earth and the birds of the air, why is he alone cut off from its enjoyments?

* Person. † Twigs or small boughs.

"Oft would I think, O Lord, what may this be,
That love is of such noble myght and kynde?
Loving his folk and such prosperitee;
Is it of him as we in books do find?
May he our hertes setten* and unbynd?
Hath he upon our hertes such maistraye?
Or is this all but feynit fantasye?

"For gif he be of so grete excellence,
That he of every wight hath care and charge,
What have I gilt † to him or done offence,
That I am thral'd and birdis go at large?"

As he thus muses, he accidentally casts his eyes from the latticed window of his tower upon the garden below, and there beholds "the fairest and the freshest young flower" that ever he had seen. It was the Lady Jane Beaufort, walking in the garden, to enjoy the beauty of that "fresh May morrowe."

"And therewith kest I down mine eye ageyne,
Where, as I saw walking under the toure,

Were so o'ercome with plesance and delyte,
Only thro' lettin of mine eyen fall,
That suddenly my heart became her thral
For ever, of free-will: for of menace **
There was no token seen in her sweet face."

Thus slightly modernized by Mr. Tytler,

"Then as it hapt, mine eyes I cast below,
And there I spied, beneath my prison tower,
Telling her beads, in walking to and fro,
The fairest and the freshest youthful flower
That ever I beheld before that hour;
Entranced I gazed, and with the sudden start Rushed instant all my blood into my heart.

"Awile I stood, abased and speechless quite,
Nor wonder was; for why?—my senses all
Were so o'ercome with pleasure and delight
Only with letting thus my eyes to fall,
That instantly mine heart became her thral
For ever of free will: for nought was seen
But gentleness in her soft looks serene."

"In the prince's situation," says the excellent critic †† to whom we are indebted for the publication of this poem, "viewing from his prison window the beautiful Jane walking below in the palace garden, he could not, with propriety or verisimilitude have given a minute description of her features; but it will be difficult for imagination to form a more lovely idea of beauty than what the poet has drawn under the figurative description of

The paints also her rich attire, and, as the portrait is evidently taken from the life, it may be considered as an accurate description of the female costume of that day. He dwells with the fondness of a lover on the various articles of her dress; the net of pearl, splendent with emeralds and sapphires, that confined her golden tresses; the chaplet of waving plumes; the 'goodly chain of small orfeverye' about her neck, from which hung a ruby in shape of a heart that seemed like a spark of fire burning upon her white bosom; her robe, loosely thrown over her shoulders, and her dress of white tissue, looped up to enable her to walk with more freedom.

"It is not difficult," says Mr. Tytler, "giving almost line for line, to present the English reader with a transcript of these sweet verses."

"Write I of her array and rich attire—
A net of pearl enclosed her tresses round,
Wherein a balas flamed as bright as fire;
And midst the golden curls an emerant bound,
Painted with greeny light the flowery ground.
Upon her head a chaplet fresh of hue,
Of plumes divided, red, and white, and blue.

"Which, waving, showed their spangles carved in gold,
Formed by nice art like amorous love-knots all;
Glancing most bright, and pleasant to behold,
And shaped like that sweet flower, that on the wall
Grows fragrant, which young lovers jonquil call;
Yet still above all this, she had, I wote,
Beauty enough to make a world to dote.

Which bright as spark of fire danced wantonly
Whene'er she moved, upon her throat so white,
That I did wish myself that jewel bright.

"Early astir to taste the morn of May,
Her robe was loosely o'er her shoulders thrown,
Half open, as in haste, yet maidenly,
And clasped, but slightly, with a beauteous zone,
Through which a world of such sweet youthhead shone,
That it did move in me intense delight,
Most beauteous,—yet whereof I may not write.

"In her did beauty, youth, and bounty dwell,

Far better than my feeble pen can tell,
Did meek-eyed wisdom in her gestures shine;

The poet then, in his extremity, implores assistance from Venus; and, in strains of exquisite beauty and tenderness, expresses his envy of the little dog which sported about his mistress, and expostulates with the nightingale, who is silent at the very time when she ought to pour forth her most joyous notes.

"When I with gude intent this orison
Thus endit had, I stynt a little stound,*
And of mine eye full piteously adoun
I cast, beholding there her little hound,
That with his bellis playit on the ground; †
Then woud I say and sigh therewith a lyte, ‡

"An other while the little nightingale
That sat upon the twiggis wold I chide,
And say richt thus—Where are thy notis small
That thou of love hast sung this morowe tyde?
Sees thou not her that fittis thee beyle,
For Venus' sake the blissful goddesse cleare,
Sing on agane, and make my ladye chere."

The departure of Lady Jane from the garden, puts an end to his transports. The day seemed turned into night, and he relapses into loneliness, now rendered tenfold more insupportable by the passing gleam of sunshine which, for a brief space, had illuminated the scene of his captivity. Through the long and weary day he repines at his unhappy lot, locked up within his prison-walls, and cut off from all hope of intercourse or acquaintance, and when evening approaches, and Phœbus had 'bade farewell to every leaf and flower,' then 'Hesperus gan light his lamp on high,' and as darkness deepens around him, he leans his head upon the cold stone, and, overcome with weariness, falls 'half-sleeping, half-swoon,' into a trance. Suddenly a bright ray of light pierces the window where he leaned, illuminating the whole apartment; a voice addresses him in words of comfort and encouragement, he is seized by the arms, and lifted into the air, and enclosed in a crystal cloud, he ascends upwards from sphere to sphere, till he reaches

" the glad empire
Of blissful Venus."

On entering the palace of Love, he finds it crowded with all descriptions of lovers;—the successful, the hypocritical, the unfortunate, the constant, and faithful, the worldly-minded and selfish, accompanied by Prudence, Courage, Benevolence, Repentance, and other allegorical personages, which abound in the poetry of this period. The description of the various groupes of the votaries of Love is extremely picturesque, and shows great powers of fancy and imagination; and there is a striking portrait of Cupid seated in a chair of state, his bright yellow locks bound with a chaplet of green leaves, with his bended bow in his hand, and his fatal quiver by his side. The Queen of Love herself is found reclining upon a bed, with a mantle cast over her white shoulders, and a fair fresh chaplet of red roses on her head. To her the poet makes his complaint, and earnestly implores her aid. The reply of Venus is somewhat tedious and discursive, though containing some beautiful poetry. She addresses her votary in the language of encouragement, assures him of her benevolent assistance, and sends him, under the guidance of Good Hope, to seek counsel of Minerva. This sage goddess, having first ascertained that her petitioner is influenced by a pure and virtuous attachment, and is not one of those and whom she denounces as having the hearts of wolves, under the guise of lambs,—bestows upon him a good deal of judicious, but rather tiresome advice, mingled with some discussions respecting free will and necessity, which show that the poet was sufficiently versant in the metaphysical learning of his age. The votary of love is then dismissed from the court of Minerva, and, like Milton's Uriel, straightway descends upon a sunbeam to the earth.

The fifth canto is occupied with the poet's journey in quest of Fortune. The opening verses are singularly beautiful:—

" Where in a lussy plain • I took my way Flowing a river • pleasant to behold,
Embroider'd all with fresh flowers gay,
Where thro' the gravel, bright as ony gold,
The crystal water ran so clere and cold,
That in mine ear it made continually
A manner soon meltit with harmony. †

" That fall of little fishes by the brym,
Now here, now there, with backs blue as lead,
Lap and playit, and in a rout gan awym
So prettily, and dresst thaim to spread
Their erual fins as the ruby red

As gesserant ‡ § glitterit in my sight."

Beside this pleasant river he finds an avenue of trees covered with delicious fruit, and under their umbrageous covert are seen 'beasts of mony divers kynd,' of whom he gives a most picturesque, and characteristic description, equal, it has been justly said, to anything of the kind in Chaucer or Spenser.

" The lion king and his fierce lioness;
The panther, spotted like the smaragdine; *
The little squirrel, full of business; †
The patient ass that drudgeth still in pine;
The cunning ape; the warlike porcupine;
The piercing lynx; the stately unicorn,
That voideth venom from his ivory horn.

" There I saw dress him new out of his haunt; ‡

The dromydare and stander elephant; §
The wily fox, the widow's enemy;
The climbing goat; the elk for arblastrye; ||
The harking boar; the holsum ¶ grey for sportis;
The hare also that oft goeth to the hortis." **

Under the guidance of Good Hope the poet proceeds in search of the goddess Fortune, whom he at length finds sitting on the ground, clothed in a surcoat of divers hues, with a large and long mantle, furred with ermine, and right before her feet a wheel, on which a multitude of people were clambering, whose alternations of fortune are described in lively strains. She inquires into his story; and on his earnest appeal to her for sympathy and assistance, she places him upon the wheel, admonishing him to maintain his balance there for half an hour, and after assuring him that he will be fortunate in his love, bids him farewell. In departing she seizes him so firmly by the ear, that he suddenly awakes, and addresses his soul in the following solemn and striking lines:—

" Oh besy ghost! ay flickering to and fro,
That never art in quiet nor in rest,
Till thou come to that place where thou come fro,
Which is thy first and very proper nest;
From day to day so sore here art thou drest,
That with thy flesh ay waking art in trouble,
And sleeping eke, of pyne so hast thou double."

He anxiously inquires whether all that had passed before his dreaming fancy has been conjured up by preceding circumstances, or whether it is a vision sent from heaven to comfort him in his despondency. If the latter, he prays that some further token may be sent to confirm the assurance of success given him in his slumbers. Suddenly a turtle dove as 'white as chalk,' comes flying in at the window, and alights upon his hand, bearing in her bill a stalk of red gilliflowers, on the leaves of which was written, in letters of gold, the glad news that it is decreed he is to be successful in his love.

" This fair bird rycht into her bill gan hold,
Of red gillyflowers with stalkis green,
A fair branch, where, written was with gold,
On every leaf with letters brycht and shene,
In compass fair, full pleasantly to sene, ††

And have in mind, said rycht upon this wise.

"Awake, awake! I bring, lover, I bring Most gladsome news, that blissful are and sure
Of thy comfort; now laugh, and play, and sing.
Full soon shalt thou achieve thine adventure,
For in the heaven decretit* is thy cure;
And unto me the flowers did present,
With wyngis spread, her ways furth then she went."

He receives the branch with mingled hope and dread, reads it with rapture, and this, he says, was the first token of his succeeding happiness. He concludes the poem by intimating, with thankful heart, that the promise conveyed in the vision, and by the flower, has been amply fulfilled, and that the possession of his lovely princess has proved a remedy for all his sorrows.

Such are the outlines of a poem, which, in the judgment of a distinguished writer,† is not inferior in fancy, elegance of diction, and tender delicacy of feeling, to any similar work of the same period produced either in England or in his own country. It may, no doubt, be objected, that its allegorical descriptions are tedious and uninteresting, and that it exhibits an incongruous mixture of classical mythology and Christian theology. But these were the faults rather of the age than of the poet, and they are redeemed by the genuine feeling, the delightful artlessness and urbanity, and the fresh and vivid descriptions of nature, with which the poem abounds. "As an amatory poem," says Washington Irving, "it is edifying in these days of coarser thinking to notice the nature, refinement, and exquisite delicacy which pervade it, banishing every gross thought, or immodest expression, and presenting female loveliness, clothed in all its chivalrous attributes of almost supernatural purity and grace."

The "King's Quair" is the principal work of this accomplished prince, but he wrote many other poems, some of which, unfortunately for the fulness of his fame, are now lost to the world. One of his minor productions, which is still preserved, called "Christ's Kirk of the Green,"‡ describes in humorous and graphic strains a rural fair, or merry-making, where the rustics danced, revelled, trunk, and, finally, quarrelled and fought. It shows how diligently James had made himself acquainted with the rural sports and pastimes of the Scottish peasantry, and with what humour he could enter into their enjoyments. The scene of his poem is traditionally said to be a village, called Christ's Kirk, in the parish of Kennethmont, in Aberdeenshire, where a fair was formerly held during the night. The opening stanzas describe with great spirit the flocking of country lads and lasses, wooers and their sweethearts, to the lay, or fair, at Christ's Kirk on the Green. The language, however, is a good deal antiquated, and the humour is occasionally somewhat coarse.

Gillie, a rural beauty, with slender waist, red cheeks, white bosom, and yellow locks, has sworn that in spite of 'kith and kin,' she will have none but 'sweet Willie.' Her scorn of his rival is given in very graphic terms:—

"She seornit Jock, and serapit at him, ††
And murgeonit him ¶¶ with mocks;
He wald have luvit, she wald not let him,
For all his yellow locks:

The spirited playing and sweet singing of Tam Lutar the minstrel; the dancing of Tousy, who scorns Scotch reels and apes the French fashion; the vigorous leaping and high capering of Steven, which ends in his downfall and misbehaviour; and the riotous revelling of Robin Roy, and his quarrel with Jock, which leads to a general battle, are all described with great force and happiness of humour. Among other weapons the combatants make use of the bow, and the poet ridicules their awkwardness in the mode of handling it, and the ludicrous failure with which their attempts are invariably accompanied. One doughty archer bends his bow with great vehemence, not doubting that he would do deadly execution upon his opponent, who, in great terror bawls out, "Confusion, blood and murder!" but he misses his mark by a whole acre's breadth.

'Peblis to the Play,' is another humorous poem by James I., descriptive of a great annual festival, or fair, which was held near that ancient town, on Beltane-day, or the first of May. "The anniversary games, or plays, at Peebles," says the author of the 'Dissertation on the Life of James I.,' "are of so high antiquity, that at this day it is only from tradition, joined to a few remains of antiquity, we can form any conjecture of the age of their institution, or even trace the vestiges, what these games were. . . . That this town, situated on the banks of the Tweed, in a pastoral country, abounding with game, was much resorted to by our ancient Scottish princes is certain. King Alexander III. is said to have had a hunting-seat here; the place where it stood is still pointed out. We are told by Boetius that the monastery of Cross Church, now in ruins, was built by that prince, and anciently our monarchs occasionally took up their residence in religious houses.††† Contiguous to it is a piece of ground, of old surrounded by walls, and still called the King's Orchard, and on the opposite side of the river is the King's Green. The plays were, probably, the golf, a game peculiar to the Scots; football, and shooting for prizes with bow and arrow. The shooting butts still remain; and an ancient silver prize-arrow, with several old medallions appended to it is, as I am informed, still preserved in the town-house of Peebles." The 'Beltain Fair' of Peebles, which is still held regularly upon the first Wednesday of May, must be considered, though very inferior in every respect, as the descendant of the ancient 'Play.' Indeed, till about the middle of the last century this fair was distinguished by a horse-race, and other festivities; but of late years it has degenerated into a mere tryst.

The poem commences with a description of the gathering of the people from all parts of the neighbouring country to attend the fair:

"At Beltane when each body bowms
To Peblis at the Play,
To hear the singing and the sownis,
The solace sooth to say.

Among the Scottish poets who flourished during the fifteenth century, a conspicuous place is due to ROBERT HENRYSOUN, the author of the 'Testament of Creseide,' the beautiful pastoral ballad of 'Robene and Makynne,' and several other fables and poems of a high order of excellence. Of this delightful writer hardly anything is known, except what is contained in the following brief statement of Urry, the editor of Chaucer:—"The author of the 'Testament of Creseide,' which might pass for the sixth book of this story, I have been informed by Sir James Erskine, late Earl of Kelly, and divers aged scholars of the Scottish nation, was one Mr. Robert Henrysoun, chief schoolmaster of Dunfermline, a little time before Chaucer was first printed, and dedicated to Henry VIII., by Mr. Thynne, which was near the end of his reign. Mr. Henrysoun wittily observing that Chaucer in his fifth book had related the death of Troilus, but made no mention what became of Creseide, learnedly takes upon him in a fine poetical way to express the punishment and end due to a false inconstant woman, which commonly term mates in extreme misery. Henrysoun was in all probability born during the reign of James II.; but the exact period is unknown; his life is a mere blank, and the time of his death is involved in equal obscurity. In one of his works he describes himself as "one man of age," and it is stated by Sir Francis Kinaston, that "being very old he died of a diarrhœa, or flux." It is certain that he died before Dunbar wrote his Lament for the Death of the Makars, for he commemorates him among other departed poets:—

"In Dunfermling death has tane Broun, With gude Mr. Robert Henrysoun."

"Of the works of this remarkable man," says a distinguished writer, "it is difficult, when we consider the period in which they were written, to speak in terms of too warm encomium. In strength, and sometimes even in sublimity of painting, in pathos and sweetness, in the variety and beauty of his pictures of natural scenery, in the vein of quiet and playful humour, which runs through many of his pieces, and in that fine natural taste, which, rejecting the faults of his age, has dared to think for itself—he is altogether excellent."* The greatest work of this sweet, but neglected poet, is that

His "Testament to which allusion has already been of Creseide." made,—the completion of Chaucer's beautiful poem of Troilus and Creseide. "Henrysoun," says the biographer of Chaucer, "perceived what was defective in the close of the story of Troilus and Creseide, as Chaucer had left it. The inconstant and unfeeling Creseide, as she appears in the last book, is the just object of aversion, and no reader can be satisfied that Troilus, the loyal and heroic lover, should suffer all the consequences of her crime, whilst she escapes with impunity. The poem of Henrysoun," he continues, "has a degree of merit, calculated to make us regret that it is not a performance standing by itself, instead of thus serving merely as an appendage to the work of another. The author has conceived, in a very poetical manner, his description of the season in which he supposes himself to have written this dolorous tragedy. The sun was in Aries—his setting was ushered in with furious storms of hail; the cold was biting and intense, and the poet sat in a little solitary building, which he calls his 'oratoire.' The sun has just set, and the beautiful evening-star shows her golden face in the west—the air has cleared up to an intense frost, and the aged bard for awhile contemplates the scene with delight, but warned by the increasing cold, he closes his shutters, stirs his fire, wheels in his chair, and, after warming his sluggish blood with a cup of generous wine, takes up a volume of Chaucer, and happens to light upon the story of Creseide fair, and lusty Troilus.

In the poem, to use the words of the author already quoted, "Creseide is represented as deserted by Diomed; filled with discontent, and venting her rage in bitter revilings against Venus and Cupid. Her ingratitude is resented by these deities, who call a council of the seven planets, in which it is decreed that Creseido shall be punished with leprosy. Cynthia is deputed, in a vision, to inform her of her fate; she wakes, and finds that the dream is true. She then entreats her father to conduct her to a hospital for lepers, by the governor of which she is compelled to go as a beggar on the highway. Among the passers by, comes Troilus, who, in spite of the dreadful disfigurement of her person, finds something in her that he had seen before, and even draws from a glance of her horrible countenance, a confused recollection of the sweet visage and amorous glances of his beloved Creseide. His instinct leads him no further. He does not suspect that his mistress is actually before him; yet,

'For knightly pitie and memorial Of faire Creseide,'

he takes a girdle, a purse of gold, and many a gaie jewell, and shakes them down in the skirt of the miserable beggar.

'Then rode away, and not a worde he spake.'

No sooner is he gone, than Creseide becomes aware that her benefactor is no other than Troilus himself. Affected by this unexpected occurrence, she falls into a frenzy, betrays her real name and condition, bequeaths to Troilus a ring which he had given her in dowry—and dies. Troilus laments her fate, and builds her a monument.”*

Henryson's knowledge of astronomy, as exhibited in his description of the planets, appears to have been extremely imperfect, and his personification of these heavenly bodies is by no means carefully preserved. But his description of Saturn shivering with cold; his hoary matted locks falling down his shoulders, glittering and fretted with hoar frosts; the wind whistling through his gray and weather-beaten garments, and a sheaf of arrows feathered with ice, and headed with hailstones, stuck under his girdle, is drawn with the hand of a master.

“ His face frowned, his skin was like the lead,
His teeth chattered and shivered with the chin,
His eye droop'd, whole sunken in his head;
Out at his nose the midrop fast gan rin,
With lippis blue, and cheeks lean and thin;
The icicles that from his hair down honge,
Were wonder great, and as a spear was longe.

“ Althou his belt his lyart + locks lay,

His withered wede fro him the wind out wore;
A boustess bow within his hand he bore;

The treatment of Creseide when she is smitten with leprosy, as a punishment for her inconstancy, affords some interesting information respecting the treatment, in the days of Henryson, of the unhappy creatures who were afflicted with this loathsome disease. “Want of cleanliness,” says the editor of Sir Tristrem,¶ “of linen, of vegetables, of fresh meat in winter, but, above all, sloth and hardship, concurred to render the leprosy as common in Europe, during the middle ages, as it is in some eastern countries at this day. Various hospitals were founded by the pious for the reception of those miserable objects, whose disease being infectious, required their seclusion from society. When they legged through the streets they usually carried a cup to receive alms, and a clapper or bell to warn the passenger to keep aloof, even while bestowing his charity. In allusion to this custom, Saturn, when he announces to Creseide the punishment to which she was condemned, says, “ Thus shalt thou go, begging from house to house,

With cuppe and clapper, like a lazarous.”

Her father conveys her to the receptacle for such miserable objects,

“ When in a mantel and a berri hat,
With cuppe and clapper wonder privily,
He opened a secret gate, and out therat
Conveyed her, that no man should espie,
Ther to a village half a mile therobie,
Delivered her in at the spital house,
And daily sent her part of his almous.”

A leper woman cuts short Creseide's long lamentation at this dismal change, and exhorts her to practise the trade which was now to support her—

“ Go learn to clappe thy clapper to and fro
And learn after the lawe of leper's lede.”

Again,—while she is begging with her miserable associates, Troilus, the lover whom she had betrayed, returns victorious from a skirmish against the Greeks. The lepers

To a different class belong the poems entitled ‘The Abbey Walk;’ ‘The Praise of Age;’ ‘The Reasoning betwixt Death and Men;’ and ‘The Reasoning betwixt Age and Youth;’ which are pervaded by a fine moral strain, and a tone of solemn and impressive thought. A few stanzas from the ‘Praise of Age,’ slightly modernized, may serve to show the high order of excellence to which Henryson has attained in didactic poetry.

Ane auld man and decrepit heard I sing;
Gay was the note, sweet was the voice and clear,

‘The Bludy Serk’ (Bloody Shirt) is an allegorical poem, typifying the sacred mysteries of the Christian faith. The beautiful daughter of a great monarch is represented as having been carried away by a hideous giant, and cast into a loathsome dungeon, where she was doomed to remain until rescued by some valiant knight. Her cause is at length espoused by a noble prince, who vanquishes the giant, but is himself mortally wounded in the encounter. He restores the damsel to her father and feeling that his end is approaching, he bequeaths to her his ‘Bludy Serk,’ and solemnly enjoins her to contemplate it whenever a new lover should present himself.

The poem entitled 'Robene and Makyne,' is the earliest specimen of pastoral poetry in the Scottish language, and, in the opinion of Dr. Irving, is not only the most beautiful of Henryson's productions, but is superior, in many respects, to the similar attempts of Spenser and Browne. It is free from the glaring improprieties which sometimes appear in the pastorals of the more recent writers, and it exhibits many genuine strokes of poetical delineation. The story is skillfully conducted, the sentiments and manners are truly pastoral, and the diction exhibits remarkable terseness and suavity.*

In addition to these poems, Henryson wrote a series of fables, thirteen in number, which are characterised by an arch simplicity, a quiet vein of humour, and a felicitous adaptation of the sentiments to the circumstances of the actors. One of these, the 'Tale of the Lion and the Mouse,' he feigns himself to have received from Æsop in one of his day-dreams. The prologue to this fable is remarkably beautiful.

"In the middis of June, that jolly sweet season,
When that fair Phœbus with his beams bright
Had dried up the dew from dale and downe,
And all the land made with his leyms + light,
In a morning, betwixt midday and night
I raise and put all sloth and sleepe aside,
On till a wood I want alone but guide.‡

"Sweete was the smell of flouris white and reid,
The noise of birdis right delicious,
The bewis braid bloomed about mine head,
The ground growand with grasses gracious;
Of all pleasance that place was plenteous,
With sweete odours and birdis harmony,
The morning myld my mirth was maer forthy.

To shelter himself from the heat of the sun, the poet lies down 'among the flowers sweet,' under the shade of a green hawthorn, and straightway falls asleep. In his dream his venerable master, Æsop, appears to him, carrying a roll of paper in his hand, a swan-pen behind his ear, with an ink-horn, a 'pretty gilt pennare,' and a bag of silk at his belt—probably the dress and implements of a notary public at that day.

"His gown was of ane elaiht as white as milke;
His chemeis was of camblet purple brown;
His hood of searlet, broidered well with silke,
Or heeked wise until his girdle down;

The sage addresses the poet in affectionate terms as his son, and gives him the novel information that he was a native of Rome, and first went to the schools in that city, and studied civil law 'full many a day.' Encouraged by his affability, the poet ventures to beseech 'Father Æsop' to tell him 'ane prettie Fable coneluding with ane gude Morality.' The sage at first declines, on the ground that a 'fairie tale' was certain to be disregarded, since 'holy preaching' was so little esteemed by the untoward generation of that day. Like other moralists, Æsop complains that the world grew worse daily:—

"Now in this world me think right few or none
To God's word that has devotion:
The ear is deaf, and heart as cauld as stane,
Now open sinne withouten correction.
The ear inclinand to the earth ay down,
So rusty is the world with canker blaek,
That now my tales may little succour make."

On the poet's reiterating his request, however, Æsop at length consents, and repeats to him the well-known tale of the 'Lion and the Mouse,' concluding with a somewhat lengthy moral, in which there is an evident allusion to that treasonable combination of the nobles which cost James III. his crown and life:—

"Thir cruel men that stentit has the net,†
In which the lion suddenly was tane, Waited allway that they amends might get;
For hurt, men write with steel on marble stane,
Mair till expone as now I let alane;
Bnt king and lord may well wote what I mean,
The figure hereof aftymes has been seen.

"When this was said, quoth Æsop, my fair child, Persuade the Kirkmen eydentlie ‡ to pray
That treason fra this cuntrie be exil'd;
That justice ring and nobles keep their fay
Unto their sovereign lord, baith night and day;
And at that word he vanish'd, and I woke,
Sine thro' the schaw hameward my journey toke."

The fable of the 'Sheep and the Dog,' contains all the particulars of an action before the Consistory Court, in which the wolf sat as judge, the corbie raven, 'who pyked had full many a sheep's eye,' was apparitor, and the fox, clerk and noter in the cause. The action terminates, as might be expected, in the fleecing of the poor friendless sheep. Although the poet speaks cautiously, like one who felt that he was on unsafe ground, it is evident that the proceedings of the ecclesiastical courts, which subsequently drew forth the indignant denunciations of Sir David Lindsay, must, even at this period, have been generally felt as a great grievance.

One of the happiest of these tales is the well-

* It has been conjectured, with some probability, that Henryson himself was a notary public as well as schoolmaster. A charter granted by the Abbot of Dunfermline, in 1478, is subscribed by Robert Henryson as a notary public, and the same person is a witness to two other charters in the Chartulary of Dunfermline. As he is designated Magister, it is supposed that he had taken the degree of Master of Arts.

known apologue of the 'Town and Country,' or, as Henryson terms it, 'The Uponland and the Burgess Mouse,' which, if inferior in elegance to the versions of Pope and La Fontaine, excels them in humour and in characteristic and natural description. The introduction to the story is remarkably spirited and graphic:—

"Easop relates a tale, weil worth renown,
Of twa wee mice, and they were sisters dear,
Of whom the elder dwelt in a borrow land;
The younger she wonned upon town near,
Solitaire whiles under bns, whiles under breir,
Whiles on the oorn, and wraith * of labouring men,
As outlaws do, she made an easy fen. †

"This rural mouse unto the winter tyde
Thol'd cauld and hunger oft, and great distress:
The other mouse, that in the burgh gan bide,
Waa gild-brother, and made a free burgess,
Toll-free, and without custom mair or less,
And freedom had to go wherever she list,
Among the cheese in ark, and meal in chest."

The burgh mouse is seized with a strong desire to pay her sister a visit; barefooted, and with staff in hand:—

"As pilgrim poor she past out of the town
To seek her sister baith o'er dale and down.
Thro' moss and muir, thro' banks, balk, and brier,
Fra fur to fur, ‡ cryand, fra balk to balk,
Come forth to me, mine ain good sister dear,
Cry 'peep' ance. With that the mouse could hear,
And knew her voice, as kindly kinsman will,
She heard with joy, and forth came she her till."

The meeting of the two relatives is described with much tenderness and simplicity:—

"Whiles they lough, and whiles for joy they grat, Whiles kissed sweet, and whiles in arms plet."

The country mouse forthwith conducts her sister into her cosy bield, constructed of 'fog and ferns':—

"Withouten fire or candle burning bright,
For commonly such pykers loves not light."

The entertainment which follows, the coarseness of the viands, and the affectation and dainty stomach of the city mouse, are very graphically described:—

"When they were lodged thus thir illie mice,
The youngest sister to her buttery hied,
And brought forth nuts and candle, instead of spice,
And sic plain cheer as she had her beside.
The burgess mouse, see dynt † and full of pride,
Said, sister mine, is this your daily food?—
Why not, quoth she, think ye this mess not good?"

"My sister fair, quoth she, have me excused,
This diet rude and I can not accord,
To tender meats my stomach is aye used,
For whiles I fare as well as any lord,
This wither'd nuts and pease, ere they be bored,
Will break my chafts ‡ and mak my teeth full slender,
Which have been us'd before to meat more tender."

The city dame enlarges upon her own domestic comforts, declares that her 'Good Friday is better than her sister's Pace,' and ends by entreating the rural to quit her rural retreat, and taste the enjoyments of her city mansion. The invitation is accepted; and, after a perilous journey, they reach the town, and take up their quarters:—

"Intil a spence where victual was plenty,

With fish and flesh enough, baith fresh and salt,
And pockis full of groats, baith meal and malt.

"After, when they were disposit to dine,
Withouten grace they wuish and went to meat,
On every dish that cookmen can divine,
Mutton and beef stricken out in telyies grit,
Ane lordis fare thus as they counterfeit,
Except ane thing—they drank the water clear
Instead of wine, but yet they made good cheer.

"With blyth upcast, and merry countenance,
The elder sister then spier'd at her guest
Gif that she thocht by reason difference
Betwix that chalmir and her sorry nest.
'Yea, dame,' quoth she, 'but how lang will this last?'
'For evermair, I wait, and langer too.'
'Gif that be true ye are at ease,' quoth she.

"To eik the cheer in plenty furth they broucht

Abundantly about her for to deal,
Furmage full fine she broucht instead of jeil,
A white candle out of a coffer staw,
Instead of spice to creish their teeth witha'."

But, as the poet sagely remarks:—

"—After joy oftentimes comes care,
And trouble after great prosperity."

In the midst of their delicious meal, the revellers are suddenly surprised by the portentous appearance of Hunter Gib, the jolly cat. The burgess mouse fled to her hole, 'as fire of flint,' but her luckless sister fell into the remorseless clutches of bawdrons. The description of the treatment which the unfortunate rural citizen receives from Hunter Gib, is exceedingly true to nature:—

"From foot to foot he cast her to and frae, Whiles up, whiles down, as tait † as any kid,
Whiles would he let her run beneath the strae, ‡
Whiles would he wink and play with her buhhid; §
Thus to the silly mons great harm he did,
Till at the last thro' fortune fair and hap,

"Syne up in haste beside the panaling,
Sae high she clam ¶ that Gibby might not get her,
And by the cleeks  sae crafty gan hing,
Till he was gone; her cheer was all the better,
Syne down she lap when there was name to let her.
Then on the burgess mouse aloud did cry,
Sister, farewell, thy feast I here defy.

"—she passit to her den,
A warm as woo' snippe it was not grit,
Full beinly stufft was baith butt and ben,
With peas, and nuts, and beans, and rye, and wheat; †
Whene'er she liked, she had enough of meat,
In quiet and ease withouten ony dread,
But till her sister's feast nae mair she gaed."

The tale concludes with a beautifully-expressed moral, in which the blessings of simple life are depicted in the following sweet lines:—

Nearly coeval with Henrysoun, there flourished Holland and two poets of some note. The one Hay, was a priest of the name of HOLLAND, who was the author of a curious allegorical poem called 'The Buke of the Howlat' (or Owl); the other was SIR GILBERT HAY, Chamberlain to Charles the Sixth, King of France, who translated from the French the voluminous but popular romance of 'Alexander the Great.' Dunbar, in his 'Lament for the Makars,' makes mention of Clerk of Tranent, 'that maid the Awnteris of Gawanc.' The poem here referred to is supposed to be the romance of 'Gawan and Gologras,' which was published at Edinburgh in the year 1508, but was probably composed as early at least as the middle of the fifteenth century. Another poem, of the same description, entitled 'Sir Gawan and Sir Galoran of Galloway,' is supposed to be the composition of the same author.

About the same period flourished another poet, the well-known HENRY THE MINSTREL,—or BLIND HARRY, as he was familiarly termed,—whose 'Life of Sir William Wallace' has enjoyed unbounded popularity among the common people of Scotland down to the present day. Of the life of this venerable bard scarcely anything is known, beyond what is contained in the following statement in 'Major's History of Scotland.' "The book of William Wallace," says this author, "was composed during my infancy, by Henry, a man blind from his birth. He wrote in popular rhymes,—a species of composition in which he was no mean proficient,—such stories as were then current among the common people. From these compilations I must not be blamed if I withhold an implicit belief, as the author was one who, by reciting them to the great, earned his food and raiment, of which, indeed, he was worthy."†† Dempster asserts, that Henry was living in the year 1361; but this assertion is not supported by any trustworthy evidence, and can scarcely be reconciled with the statement of Major, who is believed to have been born about the year 1446. As the Minstrel must have been acquainted with the Latin language,—the knowledge of which was at that time almost exclusively confined to ecclesiastics,—it has been conjectured by Dr. Irving that he belonged to some religious order. But this hypothesis, which appears sufficiently improbable in itself, is contradicted by the poet's own explicit statement—

"I can nocht speak of sic divinitie,
 To clerks I will let all sic matters be."

The uninterrupted and almost unequalled popularity of 'The Life of Wallace,' for upwards of three centuries, has no doubt been owing in no small degree to the affectionate reverence with which the character of its patriotic hero has been regarded by the Scottish people; but the poetical genius which has been honoured by the praise of Warton and Ellis must have been of no mean order. "That a man born blind," says the latter, "should excel in any science is sufficiently extraordinary, though by no means without example; but that he should become an excellent poet is almost miraculous, because the soul of poetry is description. Perhaps, therefore, it may be safely assumed, that Henry was not inferior in point of genius either to Barbour or Chaucer; but it is our present business to estimate the merit of the work, rather than the genius of the author.

"The similarity of the subject will naturally induce every reader to compare the 'Life of Wallace' with Barbour's 'Life of Bruce;' and on such a comparison it will probably be found, that Henry excels his competitor in correctness of versification, and perhaps in perspicuity of language,—for both of which he was indebted to the gradual improvements which had taken place during near a century,—but that in every other particular he is greatly inferior to his predecessor."

The inaccuracies into which Henry has fallen were pointed out by Lord Hailes more than half a century ago, in no friendly spirit, and since that time the 'Life of Wallace' has generally been regarded as wholly a work of fiction. Recent and more careful investigations, however, have shown, that though the poem abounds with confusion and error, it contains a valuable vein of historic truth; and that important facts are related in it, which were formerly denounced as fabulous, because unnoticed by other Scottish historians, but are now corroborated by authentic documents, only published within these few years, and to which the author of the 'Life of Wallace' cannot have had access. The character and vocation of the Minstrel, the mode in which his narrative was composed and recited, and the mistakes which may be traced to the ignorance or carelessness of transcribers, will easily account for the errors in names and chronology with which the poem now abounds. "But is it a fair inference," says a learned and candid writer, "because some errors are found in a poem containing several thousands of lines, written by a blind and ignorant versifier; and in a poem, too, handed down for a long period by recitation, that the whole is utterly worthless? The present collection of documents (the 'Wallace Papers') places this subject in a new and interesting position; for it shows us, that those very particulars which, from their romantic character, were supposed to be fictitious, and which contributed to throw discredit on the whole production, are in reality genuine and authentic history.* There can be but little doubt, that though the Minstrel himself was an ignorant man,—a 'rural man,' as he expresses it,—he was yet in possession of valuable and authentic materials, which form the main groundwork of his narrative. Throughout his poem he makes frequent references to original authorities, which have perished, and represents himself as little else than the transcriber from another author. In one passage he tells us who this author was,—

"Maister Johne Blair was oft in that message,
A worthy clerk, baith wise and rych sawage,
Leryt before he was in Paris town. . . .
He was the man that principall durtuk,
That first compylit in dyte the LATYNE BUK
OF WALLACE'S LYT; richt famous of renouue,
And Thomas Gray, parsoun of Libertoun;
With him that war, and put in story all,
Of aue or baith; meikle of his travaiill."

We are elsewhere informed, that Master John Blair, the worthy ecclesiastic here referred to, officiated as the chaplain of Wallace. After the death of the hero, he is believed to have retired to the Abbey of Dunfermline. It is worthy of notice, that, as Dr. Irving remarks, Henry appears to have been less ambitious of being considered as a great poet, than as a faithful recorder of the exploits of that renowned warrior whose history he has undertaken to delineate; and he seems to have been persuaded, that the splendour of his subject would preserve his work from oblivion.

"Ge, nobill bak! fullillyt of gud sentens,
Suppose you be barren of eloquence;
Ge, worthi bak! fullillyt of suthfast; deid;
But in language of help you has gret neid.
Whan gud makars; rang weill into Scotland,
Gret harm was it that name of thaim ye fand.
Yet thar is part that can ye weill awance.
Now byd ye time and be a remembrance.
I ye besook of you benevolence.
Wha will nocht low, lack nocht my eloquence.
It is weill knowin I am a rural man;
For here is said as gully as I can."

Notwithstanding the homeliness of the language, however, and the rudeness of the versification, the 'Life of Wallace' contains many passages of great poetical merit. One of the best of these is the highly picturesque description of Wallace's encounter with the ghost of Fawdon. After a successful attack upon the strong fortress of Kinclaven, situate near the confluence of the rivers Tay and Isla,† the Scottish patriot and his followers had retreated with their plunder to the Short-wood Shaws, an extensive forest in the neighbourhood. Here they were suddenly attacked by an immensely superior body of the English, and after a desperate resistance, in which a great portion of his men were slain, Wallace and a few of his followers were compelled to fly towards the neighbouring wood of Gask, closely pursued by the enemy, who had let loose a bloodhound upon their traces. At this critical moment, one of the fugitives, named Fawdon, a man of a fierce and sullen temper, and of somewhat doubtful fidelity, declared that he was exhausted, and refused to proceed farther. Wallace, after a fruitless attempt to induce him, by entreaty and remonstrance, to resume his flight, in a paroxysm of apprehension, fury and suspicion, struck him on the neck with his sword, and at one blow severed his head from his body. The whole scene,—the murder of the unhappy wretch—the immediate revulsion of remorse and pity in the breast of the chief—the escape of the fugitives to the ruined castle in the forest of Gask—the loud blast of a horn at midnight, startling the soldiers from their slumbers—the ghastly figure of Fawdon, holding his own head by the hair and hurling the gory missile at his murderer—the flight of the terror-stricken chief into the wood, and his violent paroxysms of remorse and anguish—the appearance of the deserted castle, blazing in one wide conflagration, and the figure of Fawdon, with a beam or rafter in his hand, standing on the wall and superintending the work of destruction,—are all described with great spirit and power. It is not difficult to account for this singular adventure on natural causes, in the morbid state of excitement to which Wallace's mind seems to have worked up, under the combined influence of remorse and superstition, increased by danger and exhaustion, the stillness and awful solemnity of midnight, and the lonely situation in which he was placed.

"As they were best arrayand Butler's route,

But this sloth-brach, whilk sicker was and keen,

Gude hope they had, for it was near the night.
Fawdon tirit, and said he might not gang.
Wallace was wae to leave him in that thrang.
He bade him gae and said the strength was near,
But he tharefore wald not faster him steir.
Wallace, in ire, on the craig' can him ta',

 The Englishmen were comand wonder near—
 Five hundred hail was in their chivalry.

 Stephen of Ireland, unwitting of Wallace,
 And gude Kerly bade still near hand that place;
 At the muir side, until a seroggy slaid,
 By east Dupplin, where they this tarry made.

" Fawdon was left beside them on the land,
 The power came, and suddenly him fand,
 For their sloth-hound the straight gait* till him yede,
 Of other trade she took as than no heed.
 Englishmen deemit for als they could not tell,
 But that the Scots had fouchten among themself,
 Richt wae they were that losit was their scent.
 Wallace twa men among the host in went,
 Dissemblit weel that no man sould them ken,
 Richt in effeir as they were Englishmen.
 Kerly beheld on to the bauld Heroun,
 Upon Fawdon, as he was lookand down,
 A subtle straik upward him took that tide;
 Under the cheeks the grounden swerd gart glide,
 By the gude mail, baith halse and his craig bane,
 In snnder strak; thus endit that chieftain.
 To ground he fell, feil folk about him thrang:
 Treason! they cried, traitors was them among!
 Kerly with that fled ont soon at a side;
 His fallow Stephen than thought no time to bide:
 The fray was great, and fast away they yede
 Laigh † toward Earn; thns scapit they of dreid.
 Buder for woe of weeping nicht not stint,
 Thus recklessly this gude knight they tynt.
 They deemit all that it was Wallace men,
 Or else himself, though they could not him ken.
 'He is richt near, we shall him have but ‡ fail,
 This feeble wood may him little avail.'
 Forty were passed again to Sanct-Johnstoun,
 With this dead corse to burying made it boune;
 Parted their men syne diverse ways raid;
 A gret power at Dupplin still there baid, Till Dareoch the Bntler passed but let; §
 At sundry furids the gait they unbeset;
 To keep the wood till it was day they thocht.
 As Wallace thus in the thick forest soucht
 For his twa men, in mind he had great pain;
 He wist not weel if they were ta'en or slain,
 Or scapit hail by ony jeopardy:
 Threteen were left him; no mae had he.
 In the Gask hall their lodging had they ta'en,
 Fire gat they soon, but meat than had they nane.
 Twa sheep they took beside them off a fauld.
 Ordained to sup into that seemly hauld,
 Graithit in haste some food for them to dicht:
 So heard they blaw rude hornis upon heicht.
 Twa sent he forth to look what it might be;
 They baid richt lang, and no tidings heard he,
 But boustous noise so brimly blew and fast,
 So other twa into the wood furth passed.
 Nane come again, but boustously can blaw;
 Into great ire he sent them furth on raw.
 When that alane Wallace was leavit there,
 The awful blast aboundit mickle mair.
 Thau trowit he weel they had his lodging seen;
 His swerd he drew of noble metal keen;
 Syne furth he went where that he heard the horn,
 Without the door Fawdon was him befor,
 As till his sicht his awn heid in his hand:
 A cross he made when he saw him so stand,
 At Wallace in the heid he swakit || there,
 And he in haste soon hynt ¶ it by the hair;
 Syne out at him again he couth it cast—
 Intill his heart he was greatly aghast.

Richt weel he trowit that was nae spreit of man,
 It was some devil at sic malice began.
 He wist no weel there langer for to bide;
 Up through the Hall this wicht Wallace can glide,
 Till a close stair the buirdia rave in tywne,
 Fifteen foot large he lap out of that inn.
 Up the water suddenly he couth frae,
 Again he blent what 'psurance he saw there;
 He thocht he saw Fawdon, that ugly sir,
 That hail hall he had set in a fire;
 A great rafter he had intill his hand,
 Wallace as than no langer wald he stand,
 Of his gude men full great marvel had he,
 How they were tint through his feil fantasy.
 Traists richt weel all this was sooth indeed,
 Suppose that it no point be of the creed.
 Power they had with Lucifer that fell,
 The time when he parted frae heaven to hell.
 By sic mischief gif his men might be lost,
 Drownit or slain among the English host;
 Or what it was in likeness of Fawdon,
 Whilk broucht his men to sudden confusion;
 Or gif the man ended in evil intent,
 Some wicked spreit again for him present,
 I can not speak of sic divinity;
 To clerks I will let all sic matters be.

 He wist not weel if it was Goddis will,
 Richt or wrang his fortune to fulfil.
 Had he pleased GOD, he trowit it micht not be,
 He sould him thole in sic perplexity,*
 But great courage in his mind ever drave
 Of Englishmen thinkand emends to have.
 As he was thus walkand by him alane,
 Upon Earnside, makand a piteous mane,
 Sir John Bntler, to watch the furids richt,
 Out frae his men of Wallace had a sight.
 The mist was went to the mountains again:
 Till him he rade, where that he made his mane.
 On loud he speirt, 'What art you walks this gate?'
 'A true man sir, though my voyage be late;
 Errand I pass frae Doune unto my lord;
 Sir John Stewart the richt for to record,
 In Doune is now, new command frae the king.'
 Than Bntler said, 'This is a selceonth thing,
 You ree'd' all out, you have been with Wallace,
 I shall you know, or you come off this place.'
 Till him he stert the courser wonder wicht,
 Drew out a swerd, so made him for to licht.
 Aboon the knee gude Wallace has him ta'en
 Through thie and brawn, in sunder strak the bane, Derfy to deid the knight fell on the land.
 Wallace the horse soon seizit in his hand;
 Ane backward straik syne took him, in that steid,
 His craig in twa; thns was the Butler deid.
 Ane Englishman saw their chieftain was slain
 A spear in rest he cast with all his main,
 On Wallace drave, frae the horse him to beir;
 Warly he wroucht, as worthy man in weir;
 The spear he wan withouten mair absaid,
 On horse he lap, and through a great rout raid

 Stampit to ground, and drownit withouten mair.
 The third he hit in his harness of steel
 Through out the cost, the spear it brak some deal.
 The great power than after him can ride,
 He saw na weel nae langer there to bide.
 His burnist brand bravely in hand he bare;
 Wham he hit richt they followit him nae mair.

 But Wallace made the gayest aye agast.
 The muir he took, and through their power yede."

The following account of the cruel execution of the great Scottish hero bears internal evidence of its truth, and is fully corroborated by the statements of contemporary historians, and by important documents which recent investigation has brought to light.*

* On Wednesday the false Sonthron furth brocht
To martyr him, as they before had wrocht.
Of men in arms led him a full great rout;
With a bauld sprite guid Wallace blent about;
A priest he asked, for GOD that died on tree.
King Edward then commanded his clergy,
And said, 'I charge yon upon loss of life,
Name be soe bauld yon tyrant for to shrive.
He has reigned long in contrar my highness.'
A lylth bishop soon, present in that place;
Of Canterbury he then was righteous lord;
Again' the king he made this richt record,
And said, 'Myself shall hear his confession,
If I have might in contrar thy crown.
An thou through force will stop me of this thing,
I vow to God, who is my righteous king,
That all England I shall her interdie,
And make it known thon art a heretic.
The sacrament of kirk I shall him give:
Synn take thy choise, to starve † or let him live.
It were mair weil in worship thy crown,
To keep sic ane in life in thy bandoun,
Than all the land and good that thou hast reived,
But cowardice thee ay fra honour drieved.
Thou has thy life rougin † in wrangoous deed;
That shall be seen on thee or on thy seed.'
The king gart ‡ charge they should the bishop ta,
But sad lords counsellit to let him gae.
All Englishmen said that his desire was richt.
To Wallace then he rakit in their sight,
And sadly heard his confession till ane end:
Humbly to God his sprite he there commend.
Lowly him served with hearty devotion
Upon his knees, and said ane orison.
A psalter-book Wallace had on him ever,
Fra his childheid fra it wald nocht dissever.
Better he trowit in wyage † for to speed.
But then he was dyspalyd of his weed. ‡
This grace he asked at Lord Clifford, that knight,
To let him have his psalter-book in sight.
He gart a priest it open before him hald,
While they till him had done all that they wald.
Stedfast he read for ought they did him there;
Fell Southrons said that Wallace felt nae sair.
Guid devotion, sae, was his beginning,
Conteined therewith, and fair was his ending.
While speech and sprite at anis all can fare,
To lasting bliss, we trow, for evermair."

Blind Harry may be regarded as a specimen of the early Scotch class of errant minstrels who abounded in Scotland from an early period, and combining the character of bard and musician, "wandered with their harp from castle to castle, and sang to the assembled lords and dames those romantic ballads of love and war which formed the popular poetry of the day." The Saxons, Normans, Scandinavians, and other ancient races who peopled Scotland, were all passionately attached to poetry and music, and there can be no doubt that at a remote period, "the country maintained a privileged race of wandering minstrels, who eagerly seized on the prevailing superstitions and romantic legends, and wove them in a rude, but sometimes expressive, versification into their stories and ballads; who were welcome guests at the gate of every feudal castle, and beloved by the great body of the people." The most ancient existing specimen of the compositions of these primitive bards is the elegiac poem, already given,* on the death of Alexander III., who was killed by a fall from his horse, in the year 1286. Another rhyme of the same period is quoted by Ritson, from an old Harleian MS. It appears to have been composed by the Scots at the siege of Berwick, in 1296, when the garrison at first succeeded in repelling the assaults of Edward I., though they were ultimately overcome and cruelly massacred by that ruthless monarch. It runs as follows:—

"Wend Kyng Edeward with his lange shankes
To have gete Berwyke all our unthankes
Gas pikes hym and after gas dikes him."

'The grand old ballad of Sir Patriek Spens,' as it is styled by Coleridge, has been generally referred to the time of Alexander III., and is supposed by some writers to allude to the bringing home of the Maiden of Norway, and by others, to commemorate the disastrous shipwreck which awaited the return of those noblemen who formed the retinue of Margaret when she was married to Eric of Norway. If, however, the poem be contemporaneous with either of these events, it is evident that the orthography and language must have been considerably modernised. The disastrous period between the death of Alexander III. and the decisive battle of Bannockburn, must have been peculiarly fertile in heroic stories and ballads, commemorating the daring exploits of the gallant assertors of their country's independence. The great Scottish patriot, Wallace, became the hero of a large series of such poems. One of his earliest adventures, which still exists in the shape of a ballad, is recorded by Wyntown, who closes his notice of 'the ill-requited chief,' by alluding to the 'Gret gestis' to which his illustrious actions had given rise.

"Of his gud dedis and manheid
Gret gestis I heard say are made,
Bnt sa mony I trow noucht
As he until hys dayis wroucht.
Wha all hys dedis of prys wald dyte
Hym worthy a gret Buk to wryte;
And all thait to wryte in here
I want both wyt and gud layser." †

This resolution of the worthy chronicler is greatly to be regretted. As Mr. Tytler has justly remarked, "a single ballad on the death of Wallace, or the glory of Bruce, preserved as it then fell from the lips of a Scottish minstrel, or a Scottish maiden, were now worth half the proud volumes of those pedantic schoolmen," who preserved with affectionate care many a monkish Latin rhyme, composed in the miserable taste of the age, while the historic tales and ballads of this early period of our history have been consigned to what was then deemed a just and merited oblivion. It has been supposed, with considerable probability lity, that in the heroic poem of 'Henry the Minstrel' will be found incorporated the substance of many of the detached songs founded on real or fabulous incidents which were living on the breath of tradition, regarding the hero at the time his metrical biographer lived, and that the disappearance of these detached songs may be ascribed to the extreme popularity which the work of Henry has acquired. We learn from Barbour, that the good King Robert had a very lively relish for tales of romance, and

"Auld stories of men that wer Set intyll hard assayis ser" (sore);

and there can be no doubt that the exploits of the great restorer of Scottish independence were commemorated in the songs of the minstrels and maidens of the country which his valour and sagacity had saved from ruin. Ballads of this kind must have been common when Barbour wrote, for the poet, in speaking of 'Thre worthi poyntis of war,' which occurred during the struggle of the patriots to expel the English invaders, omits the particulars of the 'Thrid which fell into Esdail,' being a victory gained by 'Schyr Johne the Soullis' over 'Schyr Andrew Hardclay,' for this reason—

"I will nocht rehers the maner,
For wha sa likes thai may hear
Young women when thai will play
Syng it amang thaim ilk day."

All these songs respecting Bruce and his chivalrous compatriots have unfortunately perished; but a single stanza of a Scottish ballad, composed after the defeat of the English at Bannockburn, has been preserved in the St. Alban's Chronicle.

"Maidens of England, sore may ye morne
For your lemmans ye have lost at Bannockysborne
With hevelogh.
What! weneth the King of England
So soon to have wone Scotland?
With rombelogh."

"This song," says Fabian, "was, after many daies sung in daunces, in the carols of the maidens and mynstrelles of Scotland, to the reprofe and disdayne of Englychemen with dyvers others which I overpasse."* At a later period, in 1328, when the daughter of Edward II. was given in marriage to David, the son of Robert Bruce, and a treaty of peace was entered into at York, between the two countries, on terms which were regarded as humiliating to the English; we are informed by the same historian, that the contempt of the Scots broke out in "diverso truffes, rounds, and songes, of the which one is specially remembered, as foloweth:—

"Long beirdis hartlis,
Painted hoods wytleess,
Gay cottes graceless, Maketh England thryfteless."

* Dr. Jamieson's Notes on Barbour's Bruce, p. 437. Dauney's Preliminary Dissertation to 'Ancient Scottish Melodies,' published by the Maitland Club, p. 43.

A somewhat different account of the origin of this rhyme is given by Godscroft, who says, "The English soldiers of this army were cloathed in coats and hoods embroydered with flowers and branches, and did use to nourish their beards, wherefore the Scots, in derision thereof, made this rime and fastened it upon the church doore of St. Peter in the Canongate."* A similar account is given in the Book of St. Alban's. It is obvious, however, as Mr. Dauney remarks, that these lines partake much more of the character of an epigram or jeu d'esprit, than a song; and that they were regarded as such is apparent, from the circumstance that they were inscribed on a placard and fastened to the church doors.† Another of these Scottish ballads, of an early date, is referred to by Hume of Godscroft, in his history of the family of Douglas, in these words: "The Lord of Liddesdale being at his pastyme, hunting in Attrick Forest, is beset by William, Earle of Douglas, and such as he had ordained for that purpose, and there assailed, wounded, and slain, besides Galeswood, in the year 1353, upon a jealousy that the earle had conceived of him with his lady, as the report goeth, for so sayes the old song—

"The Countesse of Douglass out of her bowre she came,
And loudly there that she did call:
It is for the Lord of Liddesdale
That I let all these teares downe fall.

"The song also declareth how she did write her love letters to Liddesdale, to dissuade him from that hunting. It tells likewise the manner of the taking of his men and his own killing at Galeswood; and how he was carried the first night to Linden kirk, a mile from Selkirk, and was buried in the abbey of Melrose."‡

To the beginning of the fifteenth century has been referred the well-known ballad, entitled 'The Battle of Harlaw,' probably the most ancient Scottish historical ballad of any length now in existence. The event on which it is founded occurred in 1411, and it may safely be concluded that the poem was written soon afterwards. From this period down to the time of James I. no fragments or traces of Scottish song have survived to the present day; but in the poem of 'Peblis to the Play,' ascribed to that monarch, and probably written about the year 1430, we are furnished with the names of two compositions of this class—'Thero fure ane Man to the Holt;' i. e., there went a man to the wood; and 'Thair shall be Mirth at our Meeting.' The first is alluded to in the sixth stanza of the poem.

"Ane young man stert into that steid
Als cant as ony colt;
Ane birken hat upon his heid,
With ane bow and ane bolt;

* Dr. Jamieson's Notes to Barbour's Bruce, p. 470. Dauney's Introduction, &c., p. 44.

† The attaching of placards to church doors is a practice which has descended to the present time. It was the principal method of publication at this time, and for many years afterwards.

‡ Godscroft, vol. i. p. 144.

"Said, merry maidens think nocht lang
The wedder is fair and smolt:
He cleikit up ane high ruf sang,
'Thair fare ane man to the holt,'

The other is referred to in the twenty-fifth stanza:—

"He spallit like ane fatherless fole,
And said, Be still my sweet thing:
By the haly rood of Peblis,
I may nocht rest for greiting.
He whissilit and he pypt baith
To mak her blythe that meeting;
My honey hart how sayis the sang,
'Thair sall be mirth at our meeting,'
Yet
Of Peblis to the Play."

Another tune, called 'The Salmon's Dance,' is also spoken of in this poem.

Bower, who wrote about the year 1441, speaks of tragedies, comedies, ballads, and romances, founded on the story of Robin Hood and Little John, which the bards and minstrels used to sing in preference to all others of the same kind of compositions, and which were highly popular among all classes of the community; but every trace of these ancient ballads has now perished. The names, however, of a number of ballads, songs, and dances, which were popular at this period, have been preserved in a ludicrous vernacular poem, called 'Cockelbie Sow,' written rather before the middle of the fifteenth century.

"And his cousin, Copyn Cull,

There can be little doubt that the greater part of these ballads, songs, and tunes, The minstrels. were the composition of the minstrels, who, in many instances, were not only harpers or musicians, who sang and recited the verses composed by others, but were also poets, who framed extemporaneous effusions suited to the tastes and feelings of their audience. At a very early period in Scottish history those who subsisted by the arts of poetry and music were held in high honour, and were indeed to be found among the officers who composed the personal state of the sovereign. At the coronation of Malcolm III. and Alexander III. we are informed that a bard or sennachie recited a Gaelic poem, containing a recital of the king's ancestors, from the reign of Fergus I. Aldred mentions that minstrels accompanied the army of David I., at the battle of the Standard, which was fought in 1138; and it appears to have been a custom, as old at least as the reign of Alexander III. that when the sovereign made a progress through the country he was serenaded by minstrels and singers, both on his entrance into the towns, and when he took his departure. Mention is made of the minstrels kept at the court of King Robert Bruce, and liberal donations were bestowed upon the professors of 'the gay science,' both at the marriage and the coronation of David his son. The monarchs of the Stewart family appear to have been passionately attached to poetry and music, and down to the sixteenth century large sums of money appear in the Chamberlain's accounts, as paid to 'divers menstrales, schawmens, trumpets, taubroners, luters, harpers, pipers,' and other musical performers, Italians, French, English, and Irish, as well as Scots.

According to Dr. Percy these minstrels not only sang to the harp, verses composed by themselves and others, but "they also appear to have accompanied their songs with mimicry and action, and to have practised such various means of diverting as were much admired in those rude times, and supplied the want of more refined entertainment. These arts rendered them extremely popular and acceptable in this and all the neighbouring countries, where no high scene of festivity was esteemed complete that was not set off with the exercise of their talents, and where so long as the spirit of chivalry subsisted, they were protected and caressed, because their songs tended to do honour to the ruling passion of the times, and to encourage and foment a martial spirit."† In the course of time, however, a gradual change took place in their character and position; and vagrants of every description were at all times ready to assume the character of the minstrel as a passport to hospitality and attention, and thus contributed to bring the profession into discredit. They came at length to be stigmatized as rogues and vagabonds, and to appear in the statute book in juxta position with the very dregs and refuse of society. Dr. Percy admits that towards the end of the sixteenth century the minstrels had lost all credit, and were sinking into contempt and neglect. At length the popular companion of knights and dames, the welcome guest in the halls of the nobles, as well as in the cottages of the poor, degenerated into "the poor and wandering gleeman, glad to purchase his bread by singing his ballads at the ale-house, wearing a fantastic habit, and latterly sinking into a mere crowder on an untuned fiddle, accompanying his rude strains with a ruder ditty, the helpless associate of drunken revellers, and marvellously afraid of the constable and parish beadle."* So early as 1449, severe penalties are denounced against 'bardis, or other sik like rinnars about;' and in 1579, it was ordained that "all idle persons ganging about in any countrie of this realme, using subtil, craftie, and unlawful playes, as ginglarie, fast and loose, and sik others, all vagabond scholars of the Universities of St. Andrew, Glasgow, and Aberdeen, not licensed by the Rector and Deane of Facultie of the Universitie to ask alms, and all minstrelles, sangsters, and tale-tellers, not avowed in speciall service be some of the Lords of Parliament, or great burrows and cities for their common minstrelles," upon conviction, are to be "scourged and burnt throw the eare with an hote iron." In spite of these cruel enactments some slight traces of this ancient and once honourable profession existed till about the commencement of last century. "To our fathers' time and ours," says Martine in his "Reliquiæ Divi Andree," written about the year 1683, "something remained, and still does, of this ancient order. And they are called by others and by themselves 'Jockies,' who go about begging, and use still to recite the slug-gornes of most of the true ancient summaries of Scotland from old experience and observation. Some of them I have discovered and found to have reason and discretion. One of them told me there were not now twelve of them in the whole isle; but he remembered when they abounded, so as at one time he was one of five that usuallie met at St. Andrews."* Down to the close of last century there was attached to each town of note on the borders, a piper, whose office was often hereditary, and who was the great depository of the poetical traditions of the district. These musicians received a living and a salary from the community to which they belonged, and in some burghs they had a small allotment of land, called the Piper's Croft. Sir Walter Scott is of opinion, that these town-pipers were certainly the last remains of the minstrel race.†

CHAPTER XIX.

JAMES THE SECOND.

1436—1460.

THE assassination of James I. exposed the kingdom to the evils of a long minority, which the position of the different parties in the state rendered unusually perilous. To the nobles, the administration of the late king had been highly obnoxious, and his death was therefore viewed with secret satisfaction. During the feeble reigns of his predecessors, and the regencies of Albany and his son, the rights of the crown had been gradually invaded, until, shorn of its power, little remained to the wearer but the name of king. It had been the aim of James to reduce within constitutional limits the over-grown pretensions of the nobility; and such was the wisdom of his plans, combined with stern inflexibility of purpose, that his efforts had been crowned with a large measure of success. His proud barons saw, with ill-concealed hatred and fear, their insolence crushed, their crimes brought within the range of wholesome law, the possessions of the crown which they had appropriated, torn from their grasp, and the highest offices in the state, which prescriptive right had enabled them hitherto to monopolize, filled by persons belonging to the inferior barons, gentry, and clergy, whose talents compelled respect, while their hopes of advancement induced them to make common cause with the king. The sudden removal of James freed them not only from a stringent rule, but afforded them the gratifying prospect of regaining their consequence. During the minority of the young king, and the feeble government of a regency, it seemed by no means difficult to undo all that the late monarch had accomplished; and already the leading nobles were seen merging their fruds, and combining to humble the crown, and restore the splendour of their order. To these selfish schemes there existed no adequate check. The policy of James I. had, indeed, developed the popular element in the constitution, and set limits to the license of the nobles; but his plans, besides being in advance of the age, had not been in operation for a length of time sufficient to evince their value, and obtain for them the support of prescriptive right, while the few whom he had imbued with his views, terrified by his death, shrunk from the dangerous attempt to enforce them. So menacing was the aspect of affairs, that the queen, after having pursued the murderers of her husband with summary vengeance, influenced by her maternal fears, hastened to Edinburgh with the young king, then a boy six years of age, and found shelter within the walls of the castle. The governor of that important fortress was Sir William Crichton, on whose fidelity, as the friend of the late king and the master of his household, she could fully rely; and there, secure from immediate danger, she anxiously waited the approaching meeting of the Estates. On the 25th of March, the Scottish parliament assembled at Edinburgh, and adopted immediate measures for the government of the country. Their first act was the coronation of the young prince, who was conducted in procession from the castle to Holyrood Abbey, and solemnly inaugurated in presence of a great concourse of the nobility, clergy, and representatives of the towns, and amid the usual testimonies of popular devotion and loyalty. It was agreed that, during the minority of the king, the care of his person and education should be entrusted to the queen-mother † and Sir Alexander Livingston, of Callendar; while Sir William Crichton was appointed chancellor of the kingdom, and charged with the general administration of its affairs. So scanty and meagre are the records of the times, that it is impossible to determine whether these appointments originated with the parliament, or were made in accordance with the provisions contained in the will of the late sovereign. The evidence, however, preponderates in favour of the latter conclusion. Livingston and Crichton, though men of acknowledged talents, and descended from ancient families, belonged to the inferior class of barons, and had been elevated by James I. to a high place in his council, with the view of arresting the dangerous encroachments of the nobles. It was commonly believed that with them originated some of the most stringent measures of the late administration directed against the great barons; and it seems unlikely that anything but a desire to escape the suspicion of disloyalty, by carrying out the intentions of the murdered king, could have induced the nobles to sanction the appointment of such men to offices which conferred on them so great a measure of power, and so many opportunities for increasing it. The fears of the nobility may have been partly allayed, and their scruples removed, by the rivalry which had already sprung up between Crichton and Livingston, who, jealous of each other, and eager for personal aggrandizement, were disposed, as events subsequently proved, to sacrifice the revenues and power of the crown in order to promote their selfish schemes. The appointment, also, of Archibald, Earl of Douglas, to the office of lieutenant-general of the kingdom, was a sufficient concession to the pride of the nobles, and an ample guarantee for the protection of their privileges. Amid the convulsions of the kingdom, which had curtailed the prerogatives of the sovereign, and extinguished some of the noblest families, the house of Douglas continued to flourish, and had now risen to a height of power which rivalled that of the crown itself. In addition to the extensive districts of Galloway and Annandale, and some of the fairest portions of the south of Scotland, the dignity of the earldom had been increased by the possession of the duchy of Touraine, and the lordship of Longueville, in France. Its retainers were numerous, and thoroughly disciplined

Power of the Douglases. by the incessant raids of border warfare, while the marriages of many of its members with the nobility, who coveted alliances with so princely a house, rendered its influence on the government immediate and powerful. The present earl, on whom devolved the lieutenancy of the kingdom, inherited the characteristic virtues and vices of his family. His military talents were of a high order, and fitted him, in an eminent degree, for the duties of his office; but he was fierce, and intolerably arrogant, jealous of the honour of his house, and his immunities as a noble; quick to revenge an injury, and by no means scrupulous as to the mode of gratifying his resentment. During the late reign, he had maintained the state of an independent sovereign, and met the measures of James with a haughty defiance, which threatened the kingdom with a civil war. From a government so constructed, unity of action could scarcely be expected. Crichton and Livingston viewed with suspicion and fear the vast power of Douglas, while the earl regarded them with scorn as his inferiors in birth, and hated them as the enemies of his order. Besides these important appointments, the Enactments of attention of parliament was directed to the possessions of the crown, and the foreign relations of the kingdom. An inventory was ordered to be taken of the personal property of the monarch, while an act was passed revoking all alienations of lands, or other property belonging to the crown, since the death of the late king, unless granted with consent of the Three Estates; and declaring all future alienations void, save those warranted in a similar manner, until the king should have attained his twenty-first year.* A short time before the death of James I., hostilities had been resumed between Scotland and England. The temper of that monarch, and the many grounds of complaint against the English government, would have secured, had he lived, the vigorous prosecution of the war; but the Scottish parliament were not indisposed during the minority of their sovereign, to cultivate peace with the sister kingdom, and after some negotiations, a safe conduct was granted by Henry VI. to commissioners empowered to arrange with the English envoys the terms of a treaty between the two countries.† The English regency, involved in a contest with France, and struggling to retain the conquests of Henry V., dreaded the prosecution of a war with Scotland, and listened with favour to an arrangement which secured the neutrality of a dangerous neighbour. A truce between the two kingdoms was accordingly concluded for a period of nine years, dating from the 1st of May, 1438. The treaty embraced also a series of wise laws, regulating the commercial intercourse of the two countries during the truce, and anxiously guarding against the interruption of those friendly relations which had thus been established. On the part of England, the Dukes of Gloucester and Norfolk, with the Earls of Salisbury, Northumberland, and Westmoreland, and on that of Scotland, Archibald, Earl of Douglas, with the Earls of Angus, Crawford, and Avondale, and the Lords Gordon, Maxwell, Montgomery, and Crichton, bound themselves to maintain the provisions of the truce, and to punish those who presumed to violate them.*

While these friendly negotiations were in progress, the spirit of faction, which had slumbered for a little after the death of the late king, became suddenly active, and filled Scotland with misrule and crime. Sir William Crichton, the chancellor, from whom, before the meeting of parliament, the queen-mother had solicited protection for her son, continued to retain possession of the young king, though the estates had appointed Joanna and Livingston of Callendar his guardians during his minority. The wily and unprincipled statesman seems to have employed his custody of the monarch as a pretence for large demands on the public treasury, and the unscrupulous appropriation of the royal revenues, while, in addition to these immediate advantages, he was desirous of gaining the affections of the young sovereign, with a view to the maintenance and increase of his own power. He not only refused, therefore, to permit James to leave Edinburgh, but resisted the right of Livingston to the charge of his pupil, and made the intercourse of the queen-mother with her son both vexatious and difficult. Remonstrances having proved in vain, Joanna determined to effect the freedom of her son by a stratagem, which her access to the castle enabled her without difficulty to execute. At the close of a visit of a few days, during which she managed to lull the suspicions of Crichton, she left the castle with two coffers or chests, containing, as was affirmed, her wardrobe and ornaments; but in one of the chests she had dexterously contrived to conceal the young prince. On reaching Leith, she set sail for Stirling castle, at that time commanded by Livingston, who received her with joy, and took immediate measures for the retention of his charge, as well as for the punishment of the chancellor. At a meeting of the queen's friends, and those favourable to the views of Livingston, it was resolved to besiege Crichton in his stronghold, and to compel him either to resign his office, or to recognize the rights of the queen-mother and guardian. Joanna promised to supply the soldiers composing the expedition with provisions from her own storehouses while the aid of the Earl of Douglas was confidently anticipated in the attempt to reduce the refractory chancellor. Emboldened by these prospects, Livingston left Stirling castle for Edinburgh, at the head of a considerable force, among whom were many barons and gentry belonging to his faction. The situation of Crichton was alike mortifying and perilous. Besides the disgrace, which he keenly felt, of having been outwitted by the queen, he was justly alarmed at the prospect of the speedy overthrow of his power, the surrender of his ill-gotten wealth, the vengeance of the factions whom his violence had exasperated, and, above all, the elevation of his rival, Livingston, whom he bitterly hated. Driven to extremities, he resolved at last to solicit the aid of the Earl of Douglas, and for this purpose despatched messengers to that noble, representing the peril to which the government was exposed, by the traitorous designs of Livingston, and offering his constant friendship in return for assistance in his present difficulties. The reply of Douglas was fierce and contemptuous. Besides rejecting the proffered friendship of the chancellor, he declared both Livingston and Crichton to be "mischievous traitors," whom it became not "the honourable state of noblemen" in any way to help, and concluded by expressing, in no equivocal terms, his desire for their speedy destruction. "As to myself, there is nothing more pleasant than to hear of war and discord between these two unhappy tyrants; and namely, when the beginning of their dissension is not founded upon a good cause, but upon a shameful and wicked ground. Would God I might see a miserable mischief to befall them both, seeing they have both deserved the same condignly, through their own ambition, falsehood, pride, and height: for I know it is the very just judgment of God that deceitful tyrants, setting their whole purpose and intent upon mischief and wreck upon others, according to their demerits, shall be punished in the sight of the world, and, specially, seeing they have so oft offended both noblemen and simple men of good condition."* Thus scornfully repulsed by Douglas, and beleaguered by the force of Livingston, which had vigorously commenced the siege of the castle, Crichton determined to arrange his differences with the opposite faction, by timely concessions. Having solicited, and obtained from Livingston a truce for two days, the rival statesmen met before the gates of the castle, each being attended by a company of friends. At the conference,

Crichton repeated the words of Douglas, urged the necessity of immediate reconciliation as the only safeguard against their common enemy; and, in proof of his sincerity, offered to surrender the castle on the promise of honourable treatment. Livingston listened to these overtures with favour, and, after receiving the keys of the castle, entered it in triumph. A number of banquets followed, during which the rivals vied with each other in expressions of friendship, and Crichton, in return for his submission, having been reinstated in his chancellorship, harmony was restored for a time to the distracted government.*

Meanwhile, the country was brought to the verge of ruin by the feuds of the nobles, which were greatly encouraged by the weakness of the executive. The stern administration of James I. had awed, into something like quietness, the fierce spirit of strife which had for many years disgraced and enfeebled the kingdom; but now that the government was conducted by men whom the haughty barons despised, and whose factious struggles seemed to countenance every enormity of aristocratic license, they hastened to renew the scenes of private war, and the whole south and east of Scotland were filled with "theft, reif, and slaughter." treacherously slain at Polmais-thorn, between Falkirk and Linlithgow, by Sir Thomas Boyd, in consequence of an old feud which existed between their families.† To revenge the death of his brother, Alexander Stewart mustered a strong body of his friends and vassals, with whom he encountered the Boyds in a pitched battle, near Neilston, in Renfrewshire. The engagement was not only protracted and bloody, but marked by a savage determination, unusual even in those times. "It was foughten that day so manfully, that both the parties would retire and rest themselves diverse and sundry times, and reconter again at the sound of the trumpet."‡ Victory at last declared in favour of the Stewarts, and Sir Thomas Boyd and many of his friends were left on the field of battle. Besides these deadly conflicts, which the rank of the parties has rescued from oblivion, scenes of outrage and revenge were daily occurring among their vassals, or those who, connected with them, however remotely, by paction or by blood, were disposed to maintain their feuds. Crichton and Livingston either felt themselves unable to check these deplorable outrages, or secure in the possession of the chief power of the state, they seem to have regarded them with indifference. They have been accused even of fostering the spirit of faction, in order to prevent that union among the barons by which their own authority would have been endangered; while the bribes offered by rivals factions to the government, and the outlawries, which were frequently occurring, furnished opportunities for increasing their wealth, of which, it was affirmed, they unscrupulously availed themselves. The vast power and chivalrous character of Douglas might have restrained, had he lived, this savage spirit; but the Death of the Earl of Douglas. he was suddenly seized with malignant fever, at Restalrig, and died there on the 26th of June, 1439.* His great possessions and titles descended to his son William, a boy only seventeen years old, whose youth and inexperience rendered him totally unfit to wield the power and dignity which had descended to him, and who speedily added to the national troubles by his arrogant pretensions, and provoked the cruel vengeance to which, shortly afterwards, he fell a victim.

Crichton and Livingston were now, by the death of Douglas, sole rulers of the kingdom, and conducted affairs with an insolence and lust of power which made their administration both hated and feared. Joanna, the queen-mother, though ostensibly restored, on the reconciliation of the statesmen, to her office as guardian of the prince, found herself so jealously watched by Livingston, that, dreading the dangers of her defenceless position, she contracted a second marriage with Sir James Stewart, commonly called "The Black Knight of Lorn," a man of high rank and approved valour.† To the ambitious designs of Livingston, the marriage of the queen was eminently favourable, as, by placing her under tutelage, she was thus disqualified, by the laws of Scotland, from taking any part in the administration. But her husband was the friend of the Douglasses; and the governor, alarmed at this accession of power to that great family, resolved to take advantage of the marriage to consolidate his own authority. His measures were speedily taken, and partook largely of his characteristic craft and cunning. Sir James Stewart and his elder brother,

—she and her husband are seized and imprisoned by Livingston— then residing at Sterling, were seized and thrown into prison, on pretence that they had conspired against the state;‡ and scarcely had the queen received intelligence of the fate of her husband, when, by orders of Livingston, her own private apartments were entered, and herself hurried to confinement on a similar charge, after a brave but unsuccessful resistance by her servants.§ These insolent acts were immediately followed by a convention at Stirling, summoned in name of the Three Estates, but composed entirely of persons in the interest of the governor. Before this assembly the unhappy queen was conducted, trembling for her own and her husband's safety; and there, affecting to yield to the necessities of the state, she surrendered, by solemn deed, the person of her son into the hands of Sir Alexander

Livingston, of Callendar, resigning at the same time the royal residence of Stirling castle, and the annual allowance made to her by parliament as queen-mother. The last clauses of the deed were worded with a cautious duplicity which indicated the conscious tyranny of its framers, and their anxiety to save themselves from its probable consequences. Joanna is made to profess her cordial concurrence in the measures of the faction, as dictated by motives purely patriotic; and it was distinctly stated, that their conduct in the matter should at no future period be the subject either of revision or blame.* The deed of transference having been solemnly ratified, the queen and her husband were set at liberty, while the young king was delivered to Livingston, who forthwith retained him in a kind of honourable captivity.

By the proceedings of the Stirling convention, the influence of Livingston became paramount in the state; and Crichton, who had calculated on an equitable division of power, saw, with surprise and dismay, the functions of government monopolized by his rival. He determined, therefore, with all speed, to restore the balance, and his measures were taken with great cunning, and were attended with complete success. Having consulted with his friends, and secured their co-operation, he rode, on a dark night, with a hundred chosen men, to the park of Stirling, where he placed his followers in small parties, to avoid suspicion and discovery. Fortunately for the success of his enterprise Livingston was at this time absent. At the break of day the king left the castle, as was his custom, to enjoy the pastime of hunting, attended by a small body of horsemen, and found himself suddenly surrounded by groups of armed men, who hailed him with every demonstration of loyalty. At the same time Crichton advanced, and kneeling before him, protested his devotion to his person, condemned the ungenerous captivity to which the jealousy and ambition of Livingston had consigned him, and offered the services of himself and his friends in securing to him immediate freedom from a state of undignified restriction. The young monarch, in spite of the opposition of his retinue, lent a willing ear to the solicitations of Crichton, with whom he hastened to Edinburgh, and made his entrance into that city, accompanied by an additional escort of four thousand men, before Livingston had received any intelligence of his movements.† The escape of the king, and the treachery of Crichton, filled the governor with mingled rage and fear, and had his power equalled his desire for vengeance, the authors of the plot would speedily have felt the weight of his vengeance. But he was in no condition to risk an appeal to force. The party of the queen, exasperated by late events, eagerly desired his downfall, and the aid of Douglas was hopeless, except on terms which must have placed him at the feet of that arrogant noble. Yielding, therefore, to the necessities of his position he skilfully dissembled his mortification, and, hastening to Edinburgh, sent a message to Crichton, deploring their alienation, and expressing his willingness to submit their disputes to the arbitration of mutual friends. The exertions of Leighton, Bishop of Aberdeen, and Winchester, Bishop of Moray, aided by the dread of Douglas, speedily brought the rival statesmen to their reconciliation. They accordingly met in the church of St. Giles, and sealed their reconciliation by mutual concessions. The young king was restored to the custody of Livingston, and Crichton resumed, with increased power, his office of chancellor.

The internal condition of the kingdom, during these disgraceful feuds, deepened its miseries. Availing themselves of the distraction of the government, a large body of marauders from the Western Isles, led by Lauchlan McLeod and Murdoch Gibson, two noted robbers, invaded many parts of the mainland, and especially the extensive district of Lennox, which they ravaged with fire and sword. The progress of the invaders was for a moment arrested by John Colquhoun of Luss, who, with his armed vassals, offered a gallant resistance near Inch-murrain, on Loch Lomond; but, overwhelmed by numbers, they were quickly defeated, with the loss of their leader.* "After that victory," says an old chronicler, "traitors became so proud and insolent that they burnt and herried the country wherever they came, and spared neither old nor young, bairn nor wife, but cruelly would burn their houses and them together, if they made any obstacle; or else, if they made no debate, without consideration and pity would cut their throats, and thereafter carry away their gear and wares, with their wives and bairns, who, not witting of such incursions, were cruelly murdered and sticked in their beds without any regard of old or young. Thus they raged through the realm without any respect to God or man."†

The country was next visited by a grievous famine, the result chiefly of an ungenial season, but aggravated by the interruptions to which husbandry was subjected amid the troubles of the times.‡ Great numbers of the poorer classes perished of hunger, and many who contrived to prolong life, enfeebled by insufficient or unwholesome food, fell victims to a virulent disease, which followed the dearth. "There reigned also a horrible pest at that time in the country," says Pitseottie, "for all men that were infected with it died the same day they took it, without any remedy."§ Appalled by these fearful visitations, and roused from their selfish inaction by the dangers which menaced the nation, the government convened a parliament at Stirling, and proceeded to consider the best means of healing the distractions of the realm. With this view various enactments were passed by the legislature, among which two deserve special notice, viz., "that the justiears on the northern and southern sides of the Forth should hold their sessions twice a year, and that whenever intelligence was received of the occurrence of any rebellion, slaughters, burning, robbery, outrage, or theft, the king should instantly proceed in person to the spot, and summoning before him the sheriff of the shire wherein the crime was committed, see immediate justice done upon the offender before he left the district, in the execution of which ordinance all the barons, with one assent, were obliged to assist, "with their persons, vassals, and property."* These enactments, though framed in general terms, have special reference to the power of the house of Douglas, which had risen to a height that threatened the independence of the throne. William, sixth Earl of Douglas and Duke of Touraine, succeeded on the death of his father Archibald to the titles and vast possessions of his family. The princely inheritance which thus passed to him, would have been dangerous to one of mature age and experience, but in the earl, who was scarcely seventeen years of age, it rapidly developed all the vices which youth and irresponsible power are almost certain to produce. Proud of his ancestry, the owner of extensive domains, which included the richest and most important tracts of Scotland, connected with many of the first families in the kingdom, possessed of wealth equal, if not superior, to that of the sovereign himself, and able at any time to bring into the field a numerous following of highly disciplined soldiers, Douglas, instigated by his own haughty ambition, and the adulation of his friends, assumed all the state and independence of a king. Shortly after the death of his father, he despatched Malcolm Fleming, of Biggar, and Alan Lauder, of the Bass, to the court of France with his oath of fealty for the duchy of Touraine. His envoys were received with distinguished respect by the French monarch, and his rights as lord of that extensive principality solemnly confirmed.† Flattered by the countenance of France, and despising the government at home, the arrogance of the young noble prompted him to imprudent displays of power, which could not fail to excite the indignation of Livingston and Crichton. His personal attendance, when he rode out, consisted of a thousand horse; his household was conducted on a scale of dazzling magnificence; he is said to have held within his own dominion courts which rivalled the solemnity of parliaments, and to have dubbed knights with his own hand. To the commands of the sovereign requiring attendance and service, he either gave no heed, or returned a contemptuous refusal; while he spoke in scornful terms of the government as administered by traitors, who had ^{—his factions and turbulent conduct.} usurped its functions and enslaved the king for their own selfish ends. Meanwhile his followers, secure in his countenance and protection, filled the country with pillage and bloodshed. The worst spirits of the time hastened to enroll themselves among his dependants, and employed the sanction of his name in defence of their brutal outrages. The laws furnished no protection to the victims, as the authority of Douglas within his own jurisdiction was supreme, and beyond it, the number and strength of his dependants enabled him to defy the ordinary administrators of justice. There can be no doubt, that it is to the acts of grievous oppression, perpetrated by the followers of this baron, that Lindsay of Pitseottie refers when, speaking of the complaints made to parliament respecting the abuses which prevailed in the country, he says, "Many and innumerable complaints were given in whercof the like were never seen before. There were so many widows, bairns, and infants seeking redress for their husbands, kindred, and friends, that were cruelly slain by wicked bloody murderers; sicklike many for herschip, theft, and reif, that there was no man but he would have ruth and pity to hear the same. Shortly murder, theft, and slaughter, were come in such dalliance among the people; and the king's acts had fallen into such contempt, that no man wist where to seek refuge, unless he had sworn himself a servant to some common murderer, or bloody tyrant, to maintain him contrary to the invasion of others, or else had given him largely of his gear to save his life, and afford him peace and rest."* Irritated at last by the constant insults which the proud noble offered to the government, and convinced that so long as he lived their own power must continue insecure, Livingston and Crichton resolved to destroy him on a charge of high treason. A more cautious adversary would have detected and avoided the snare thus laid for him, but arrogant and full of the careless confidence of power, Douglas, both by his words and actions, furnished abundant materials for impeachment, which, being reported by the spies of the governor, were carefully treasured up in the prospect of his trial and doom. Besides openly defying the laws and maintaining a state dangerous to the throne, it has been conjectured that Douglas had subjected himself even to a graver charge by impugning the title of James II. to the throne, and preferring the claim of his uncle Malise, Earl of Strathearn, who as the descendant of Euphemia Ross, the second queen of Robert II., was supposed by some to have a better right to the crown than its present possessor. Though the ambition of the earl, and the interest he may be supposed to have taken in his kinsman's pretensions, render the conjecture far from improbable, no evidence has been furnished of its truth. His conduct in other respects afforded his enemies sufficient grounds to give at least the appearance of justice to their subsequent proceedings, and as soon as their plans were matured they took immediate measures to secure his person. The progress of the tragedy was marked by a baseness and cruelty worthy of its chief actors. Crichton, in his own name and that of Livingston, despatched a message to Douglas, in which, after professing the highest esteem for his character, and regret at the misunderstanding which existed between them, he anxiously solicited his presence at the court, that the earl might cultivate the friendship of the young sovereign, and lend the aid of his great talents and influence to the administration. Douglas was easily inveigled into the snare, and along with his brother David, his friend Malcolm Fleming, and a small retinue, set out for Edinburgh. On the way he halted for the night at Crichton castle, the residence of the chancellor, where a splendid entertainment tended still further to flatter his pride and remove suspicion. Attended by Crichton he proceeded to Edinburgh on the following day. But before he entered the town, some of his retinue observing that there were too many private messages passing between the chancellor and the governor, reminded the earl of the injunction of his father, that he and his brother should never go together where there was any appearance of danger, and urgently entreated them both to return, or if the earl persisted in going forward that he should at least send home his brother.* This prudent counsel was unfortunately rejected, and confidently relying on the honour of the chancellor and governor, Douglas rode fearlessly to the castle, where he was received in state by Livingston, who conducted him to the apartments of the king. The young monarch became speedily attached to the Douglasses, whose high rank and youthful accomplishments qualified them in an eminent degree for his society, and some days were spent in unrestrained and pleasing intercourse. The gaiety of the young friends, however, was destined to be quickly and terribly broken. During a banquet at the royal table Crichton and Livingston dropped the mask and assailed their unsuspecting guests with loud and fierce charges of treason.† The astonished youths, rendered defenceless by the absence of their attendants, who had been carefully removed, and surrounded by armed men, who barred escape, were quickly bound and hurried to a neighbouring apartment, to undergo the formality of a mock

The story which represents a bull's head,—the signal of death,—as having been introduced, towards the close of the entertainment, and placed before the Douglasses, is now generally rejected, and placed before the Douglasses, is now generally rejected. No traces of any such custom are to be found in the records of authentic Scottish history. The fertile fancy of Hector Boece seems responsible for this and other embellishments which, carelessly adopted by succeeding writers came ultimately to be regarded as indubitable facts.—See Pinkerton's History, vol. i. p. 104.

trial. It is said that the youthful monarch, alarmed at these violent proceedings and the impending fate of the young noblemen, entreated the chancellor with tears to spare their lives.* His interference, however, was sternly rejected by Crichton, who reprimanded him in no measured terms for his desire to save the lives of the traitors who sought to overturn his throne. No record exists of the investigation which followed: even the nature of the charges brought against the unfortunate youths is only matter of conjecture; but as it has been well observed, "The extent of their power and the lawless character of their followers must have afforded enough of pretexts for condemnation when the sentence rested with judges who were determined to make no allowance for the youth and inexperience of the accused parties, for the artifices by which they had been brought within the danger of the law, and for their being totally deprived of constitutional or legal defenders." The proceedings terminated by a sentence of death on the brothers, who were hurried to the back court of the castle, and there beheaded. Three days afterwards Malcolm Fleming, of Cumbernauld, their friend and counsellor, was brought to trial, as accessory to their crime, and shared the same fate.†

The murder of the Douglasses was a deed equally cruel and impolitic. It not only excited the fierce indignation of their numerous and powerful friends and followers throughout the country, but the youth of the victims, and the cold-blooded treachery with which they had been entrapped and murdered, called forth a general expression of sympathy, in which their grave crimes were overlooked or forgotten. From causes, however, which are now unknown, those, on whom what was then deemed the sacred duty of revenge devolved, seem to have taken no immediate steps to revenge the death of their relatives. The French title and possessions of the earl reverted to the crown of France. The earldom of Douglas proper, devolved upon his uncle James, Lord of Abercorn, surnamed the Gross, who quietly assumed the title and estates of his nephew without opposition;‡ and the large unencultivated property of the late earl, comprehending Galloway, Wigton, Balveny, Ormond, and Annandale, descended to his only sister Margaret, who, from her great beauty, was commonly called the Fair Maiden of Galloway. Thus far the calculations of Crichton and Livingston, as to the probable consequences of Douglas's death, were justified by the removal of a dangerous enemy, the dismemberment of a princely house, and the consolidation of their own power. A course of unforeseen events, however, baffled their expectations and restored the house of Douglas to more than its former splendour. James the Gross died after two years' inglorious possession of his honours, and was succeeded by his son William, who inherited all the courage and ambition of his family. Eager to regain the lost appen-dages and power of his earldom, he hastily espoused his cousin Margaret of Galloway; and, by this union, the vast possessions of the family were once more united in his person. The indifference which Crichton and Livingston exhibited during the progress of this important alliance, has never been sufficiently explained. Policy dictated determined opposition to a union so fraught with danger to the government, and objections existed, which, if skilfully urged, must have prevented its formation. Margaret, besides being a ward of the crown, was a child scarcely twelve years old at the period of her brother's death. Earl William and herself were within the forbidden degrees of consanguinity, while the former was already married, and his countess was still living, so that a dispensation from Rome was necessary to procure a release from existing ties, and the sanction of the church to the contemplated marriage.* Some light is thrown on the supineness of the government by a conjecture, to which subsequent events give countenance, that Livingston had already formed a secret coalition with Douglas, in order to secure his own power, and ruin his rival, Crichton, who, though alive to the dangers of the alliance, was compelled to preserve a prudent neutrality. If so, the selfish policy of the governor recoiled on himself, and he lived bitterly to deplore the consequences of his baseness.

Happily for Scotland, during these distractions, her relations with foreign powers were uniformly of the most friendly character. At this period an embassy arrived from Bretagne, proposing a marriage between Francis, Count de Montfort, son and heir of John V., surnamed the Good, and the princess Isabella, sister of the king. These overtures were favourably entertained by the Scottish court, commissioners were despatched to Bretagne, with the view of completing the arrangements, and, in the following year, Isabella left Scotland for France, where she was formally united to her betrothed husband.† The truce with England continued to be sacredly observed, and the friendly intercourse between the two countries exercised the most beneficial influence on their mutual prosperity. A war at this time broke out between England and the Netherlands; but the trade so long carried on by Scotland with the latter country does not appear to have suffered any material interruption.

According to the historian of the house of Douglas, the remarkable obesity of the new earl extinguished in him those quick feelings of honour which should have stimulated him to revenge. It has been conjectured, with more probability, that the trial and execution of the young earl was undertaken with the connivance, if not the assistance, of the countess.

dom, rent by faction, and groaning under all the distracted state miseries of a feeble and vicious administration, was, in every respect, deplorable. The laws ceased to be respected, and occasional attempts to vindicate their authority served only to provoke resistance. Sir William Ruthven, Sheriff of Perth, while conducting a Highland freebooter to the gallows, was attacked by John Gorme Stewart, of Athole, with a party of his associates, who endeavoured to rescue the criminal from the grasp of justice. Ruthven, a man of high spirit and determined courage, collected his followers, and gave battle to the assailants on the North Inch of Perth. The aggressors were defeated, but not until thirty men had been slain, including the leaders on both sides, Ruthven and Stewart.*

Feuds of the nobles. Erskine, whose claims on the earldom of Mar had been factiously resisted by the chancellor, stormed the castle of Kildrummie, and took possession of the extensive estates connected with it. In retaliation, Livingston and Crichton seized the castle of Alloa, the property of Erskine.

During the progress of these savage feuds, William, Earl of Douglas, was silently maturing his plans to restore the political influence of his house. Already affianced to his cousin, and virtual possessor of her extensive estates, he bent the whole energies of his subtle and ambitious nature to secure that place in the administration, which he considered due to his ancient family and great power. The existing state of parties favoured his designs, and he skilfully turned to his advantage the jealousies and contentions of his rivals. To the nation at large, the government of Livingston and Crichton had long been odious, and a general desire existed for some change which seemed likely to remedy the evils under which the nation was groaning. James cherished a natural dislike to those who, for years, had made him their puppet, and sometimes cruelly wounded his feelings; while he had now reached an age when the restraints of a state of pupilage excite strong irritation and an ardent desire of independence. He was thus prepared to welcome the services of any party who could secure his good opinion, and relieve him from the indignities of his position. Douglas was no stranger to the feelings of the young monarch, and awaited only a favourable opportunity to render them subservient to his purpose. An incident, characteristic of the times, furnished him with the occasion for which he sought. Dumbarton castle was at this period commanded by Sir Robert Semple, as sheriff-depute to Sir Robert Erskine. Patrick Galbraith, a partisan of Douglas, in revenge of some injury done him by Semple, or, as some affirm, incited by Douglas himself, sealed the walls with a party of his followers, and took possession of the fortress, after killing the captain and some of the garrison. When the news of this outrage reached the court, suspicion naturally turned on Douglas as its chief instigator, and the earl, affecting deep concern for his honour as a noble, and his fidelity as a subject, hastened to Stirling with a few followers, and obtaining an audience of the king, denounced the conduct of Galbraith, placed his own life and estates at the disposal of the sovereign, and professed unbounded attachment to his person and crown. The manœuvre of the earl was completely successful. Prepossessed by the skilful address of Douglas, and agreeably surprised to discover a devoted adherent in one whom he had been taught to regard as a dangerous rival, the young and unsuspecting monarch lavished on his visitor every mark of kindness, made him a member of the privy council, and soon after elevated him to the office of lieutenant-general of the kingdom. The course pursued by the persons chiefly affected by this sudden change in the administration indicated, with sufficient clearness, the part they had taken in promoting it. Livingston remained quietly at Stirling, though, on the plea of age, he surrendered his office as governor into the hands of his eldest son, Sir James, thus giving strong probability to the supposition that the veteran statesman had entered into a coalition with Douglas; while Crichton fled from the court, and threw himself into the castle of Edinburgh, where he proceeded to lay in provisions, and to strengthen the fortifications in the evident expectation of a siege. The proceedings of Douglas speedily justified —his hostility to the alarm of the chancellor. Armed with the royal authority, and accompanied by a portion of the household troops, besides his own retainers, the earl marched against Barnton castle, which belonged to Crichton, and demanded its immediate surrender. The governor, a near kinsman of the chancellor, at first resolved on resistance, but daunted by the display of the royal banner, and the prospect of a long siege, ultimately capitulated, and the fortalice, by the orders of Douglas, was immediately dismantled. This decisive movement was followed by a summons to Crichton requiring him, in the name of the king, to appear at Stirling, and answer for his many acts of treason against the state; but the proud baron, undismayed by the danger to which he was exposed, and confident in the strength of his fortress, replied only by an incursion into the lands in Lothian belonging to Douglas and his adherent, Sir John Forrester of Corstorphine, which he wasted with fire and sword.† In a parliament subsequently convened at Stirling, he was proclaimed a traitor, his estates confiscated, and his friends outlawed.‡

and his subsequent conduct left no doubt as to his daring designs on the independence of the crown. The members of the late administration were quickly displaced, and the vacant offices filled by persons devoted to his interests. Three of his brothers, Archibald, Hugh, and John, were raised to the peerage. Archibald, who had married the youngest daughter of James Dunbar, Earl of Moray, succeeded on the death of his father-in-law to the title, in spite of the preferable claim of Sir James Crichton, son of the chancellor, who was the husband of the eldest daughter of the deceased earl. Hugh was created Earl of Ormond and John Lord of Balveny. To these grounds of alarm others were soon added of a more serious nature. Instigated by Douglas, the chief nobles determined to make common cause for the recovery of those privileges of their order, which, conceded by the weakness of former sovereigns, had been abolished by James I. as dangerous to the throne. The lieutenant-general became thus the centre of a powerful combination, including not a few of the great barons, who having suffered under the former reign, remembered with fear and hatred the restraints imposed upon them by the crown, and exulted in the prospect of curtailing and humbling the royal power. Though artfully veiled, the treasonable intentions of Douglas were too apparent to escape notice, and, in spite of his overgrown power, which rendered opposition most perilous, the nation found a leader, whose pure patriotism and unsullied virtues enabled him to vindicate its menaced rights. Kennedy, Bishop of St. Andrews, a prelate of great wisdom and integrity, had been raised to the chancellorship on the disgrace of Crichton. His high talents, incorruptible honesty, and distinguished ecclesiastical position as head of the Scottish church, while they fitted him in an eminent degree for the office, rendered him the more formidable to Douglas, nor is it easy to account for the acquiescence of the latter in the appointment of the prelate, except on the supposition that the relation of Kennedy to the sovereign as the sister's son of the late king, combined with his known qualifications, rendered opposition for the time alike futile and impolitic. The sagacity of Kennedy speedily divined the intentions of the lieutenant-general, and took prompt and vigorous measures to defeat his insidious and traitorous machinations. In spite of the defection of the Livingstons there still remained a large party in the kingdom, composed chiefly of the minor barons, who viewed with dread the restoration of feudal supremacy, and were eager to defend the throne from the dangers which menaced it. The ablest of these nobles were sought out by Kennedy, who succeeded in imbuing them with his own resolute and patriotic spirit, and rallying them round the youthful sovereign. In this attempt to counterbalance the traitorous confederacy of Douglas, it was impossible to overlook Crichton, who, in spite of his vices, possessed not a few of the qualities of an eminent statesman, and by his determined resistance to the Douglas faction, was now assisting to maintain the cause of national order and independence. The sympathies of the bishop were therefore strongly attracted towards his predecessor, and having opened a correspondence with the besieged baron, he hesitated not to support him with the whole weight of his powerful influence. The manner in which Douglas resented the interference of Kennedy was in keeping both with his own character and the spirit of the times. The person of the prelate was sacred, but his lands in Fife and Angus were immediately invaded by the partisans of Douglas, headed by the Earl of Crawford, Alexander Ogilvy, Livingston, governor of Stirling, Lord Hamilton, and other partisans of the earl, who wasted them with fire and sword, thus converting the most peaceful and industrious portions of Scotland into a smoking desert. Kennedy, indignant at this savage raid, demanded instant reparation; and on receiving only contemptuous defiance, proceeded to visit Crawford and his adherents with the thunders of the church, and solemnly excommunicated them with book, bell, and candle.* Meanwhile Douglas had already commenced the siege of Edinburgh castle, which Crichton, in anticipation of attack, had stored with provisions, and now stood prepared to defend to the last extremity. After the lapse of nine weeks, however, the besiegers either finding that they were making little progress in the reduction of the fortress, or that the friends of Crichton were more numerous and powerful than they had at first supposed, entered into negotiations for peace, and the stout old baron capitulated on terms every way advantageous. His titles, honours, and possessions were restored to him, and at the solicitation of Douglas and Livingston he was induced to join the administration.† The results of this sudden coalition, in spite of the suspicious motives which led to it, were most important and beneficial to the country. Douglas, checked by a colleague so sagacious and powerful, found it necessary to dissemble, if not to abandon his treasonable designs, while the friends of the king, encouraged by the restoration of Crichton, determined to watch and defeat the plots of their enemies.

These faint indications of returning prosperity speedily passed away amid the fierce and bloody feuds which continued to convulse the kingdom. One of these, from the number and power of the parties engaged in it, as well as from its disastrous results, has been rescued from the oblivion to which other events of a similar kind, from their appalling frequency, have been consigned. The monks of Arbroath had made choice of the Master of Crawford as their feudal protector, but were induced, from causes not clearly explained, to dispense with his services, and to confer the bailiwick on Ogilvie, of Inverquharity, chief of that ancient sept. Crawford, whose ferocity afterwards procured for him the appellation of the "Tiger Earl,"* collected his vassals for the double purpose of revenging the insult which had been offered to him, and recovering the authority of which he had been deprived. On the other hand, the Ogilvies, who were greatly outnumbered by their opponents, were accidentally reinforced by Sir Alexander Seton, of Gordon, afterwards Earl of Huntley, who, on his return from the court, happening to lodge for the night at the Castle of Inverquharity, was compelled to take part in the fray by an ancient custom, which bound the guest to fight in the quarrels of his host, so long as the food eaten under his roof remained in his stomach.† The

Its disastrous results. hostile armies were drawn up near the gates of the town of Arbroath, and the conflict was to commence, when the Earl of Crawford, who, on receiving information of the intended combat, had hastened from Dundee for the purpose of averting it, suddenly arrived on the field, and commanded his son to halt, while he rode forward between the two lines, in order to propose terms. But a private soldier of the Ogilvies, unacquainted with his person, and mistaking his purpose, struck him in the mouth with his spear, and mortally wounded him. The hostile armies immediately joined battle with the utmost fury, and after a fierce and stubborn conflict the Ogilvies were defeated and driven from the field. Inverquharity himself was mortally wounded in the action, along with five hundred of his followers, among whom were John Forbes, of Pitsligo, a retainer of Huntley; Alexander Barclay, of Gartley; James Maxwell, of Teiling, and many others of the gentry of Angus. Huntley himself with great difficulty made his escape to the castle of Inverquharity, and was afterwards taken prisoner and conducted to the castle of Finhaven, the seat of the victor.‡ The Master of Crawford followed up his victory with characteristic ferocity, and assailed by a party of the Douglasses, plundered and wasted the estates of the Ogilvies and their allies with fire and sword, burnt their castles, slew their vassals, and carried their wives and children into captivity. The earl his father, after lingering for a few days, died of his wound, and his body lay for some time unburied, on account of the sentence of excommunication.

The death of the queen mother, which occurred (A. D. 1445) in the midst of these fierce commotions, deserves notice, but as an affecting example of fallen greatness, and the sad insecurity of the times. From the period of her marriage with Sir James Stewart, the Black Knight of Lorn,—an alliance formed mainly from the desire to secure a protection in her defenceless condition,—she sunk into obscurity; but the peace and safety which she sought to purchase by the abdication of rank do not seem to have followed her in her retirement. Stewart, who doubtless calculated that his connection with the royal family would improve his position, on discovering his mistake, and finding himself the victim of suspicion and persecution, became gradually alienated from his wife, and ultimately treated her with utter neglect. Compelled at last to flee from Scotland, in consequence of some incautious reflections on the despotism of Douglas, he deprived her even of the slender protection which his presence afforded. Thus abandoned by her husband, and pursued by the relentless malice of her enemies, the health of the unhappy princess gave way under her manifold griefs, and she closed her chequered life in Dunbar castle, then held by Patrick Hepburn, of Hailes, a fierce free-booter and partisan of Douglas. It is impossible to determine with certainty, whether she had sought a sanctuary in the fortress, or had been violently seized by its possessor; but the lawless character of Hepburn and his connection with Douglas render it highly probable that he had made her a prisoner to serve some sinister or selfish purpose. So great, however, was the power of his patron and the weakness of the government, that he not only escaped punishment, but received a pardon in the name of the king himself, who was thus made to sanction the unmanly cruelty which had been inflicted upon his own mother.*

Misfortune continued to pursue the other members of the royal family. In the distracted condition of the kingdom, and to secure Departure of the princesses Jane and Eleanor to France, and death of the dauphiness. them from the ambitious designs of Douglas, the princesses Jane and Eleanor, on the death of the queen-mother, were sent to France on a visit to their sister the dauphiness. On their arrival they were greeted with the sad news of her early death in circumstances peculiarly painful. The marriage of Isabella had proved eminently unhappy. Her husband, afterwards the infamous Louis XI., treated her from the first with marked neglect. In despair of securing his affection her gentle spirit sought solace in the composition of poetry and in the society of literary men. But the charges of Jamet de Tilloy, who, with the connivance, if not at the instigation of the dauphin, accused her of conjugal infidelity, destroyed a constitution enfeebled by a course of harshness and neglect. She died protesting her innocence; and the equivocations of her base accuser, with the deep grief of her father-in-law, Charles VII., who, after her death, sought, but without effect, to obtain a dispensation from the pope for the marriage of her sister Jane with the danphin, leave no reason to doubt the truth of her solemn declaration.* The mourning princesses were received by the king with every mark of kindness and respect, and after a brief sojourn at the court of France, Jane returned to her own country, where she wedded the Earl of Angus; Eleanor was some years after espoused to Sigismund, Duke of Austria.

In Scotland meanwhile matters were gradually assuming a more favourable aspect. The influence of Douglas, indeed, was still paramount, and a treasonable treaty formed between that noble, the new Earl of Crawford and Alexander Ross, Lord of the Isles, threatened not only to disturb the peace of the country, but to destroy the independence of the crown. But the king, who was now seventeen years of age, began to take an important share in the administration of the affairs of the country, and by his prudence and sagacity excited the warmest hopes of his friends. No longer deceived by the professions of Douglas, he penetrated his dangerous designs, and cautiously, though firmly, took measures to defeat them. An open rupture with this powerful and arrogant noble would have hastened a crisis for which he was as yet unprepared. He sought, therefore, gradually, but steadily, to reduce the overgrown power of his turbulent subject, and selected as his confidential advisers Kennedy, Bishop of St. Andrews, and the veteran Crichton, who was about this time reinstated in his office as chancellor. With the assistance of these experienced and sagacious councillors the friends of the reigning family rallied in support of the royal authority; while some of the nobles, who had been expatriated by Douglas and his faction, returned home at the solicitation of the king, and eagerly contributed to the downfall of a party, from which they had suffered so many wrongs. Among these were Sir James Stewart, the husband of the queen-mother, and Robert Fleming, son of Sir Malcolm Fleming, who burned to revenge on the Livingstons the murder of his father. Measures were also taken at this time by James to maintain the existing friendly relations with the courts of France and England, in order that he might give his undivided attention to the improvement of his own kingdom.

The diplomacy of Crichton, to which these movements were mainly to be traced, was farther displayed in a matter deeply affecting the happiness of the sovereign. In company with John Railston, Bishop of Dunkeld, and Nicholas Otterburn, Official of Lothian, he left Scotland for France, in order to choose from among the ladies of that friendly court a proper bride for the Scottish king. France at that time offered no suitable match, but, by the advice of Charles VII., the ambassadors proceeded to Burgundy, and, with the cordial concurrence of Duke Philip the Good, made their proposals to his kinswoman, Mary, the only daughter and heiress of Arnold, Duke of Gueldres. In the succeeding year the engagement was formally concluded at Brussels, in the presence of envoys from France. Philip promised to pay, in the course of two years, sixty thousand pounds of gold as the portion of the bride; and James, on the other hand, settled upon the princess the sum of ten thousand crowns, secured upon land in Strathern, Athole, Methven, and Linlithgow, as her jointure in the event of his own death, while he relinquished all claims on the Duchy of Gueldres in the event of a male heir being born to the present duke.* Besides effecting the main object of the embassy, Crichton succeeded not only in renewing the ancient league between France and Scotland, but in concluding a treaty of mutual defence between the latter country and Burgundy, in which Gueldres was also comprehended.†

These symptoms of returning prosperity received a temporary check by the renewal of hostilities upon the Borders. The truce between Scotland and England had just expired, and though there existed, on the part of both nations, a desire to maintain peace, their common distractions afforded tempting opportunities for incursion and plunder, of which the border chiefs were not slow to avail themselves. England was convulsed by three factions, which, under the Duke of Gloucester, the queen, and the able but ambitious Richard of York, Hostilities commenced on the Borders.

were contending for supremacy; while the mal-administration of Douglas had weakened the authority of the government among the rude and turbulent inhabitants of the border districts. Incited, accordingly, by the hope of large spoil, the English, under the Earls of Northumberland and Salisbury, warden of the Marches, poured in two great divisions into Scotland, and burned the towns of Dunbar and Dumfries. In revenge for this outrage, Douglas of Balveny, a brother of the earl, invaded Cumberland, and, after wasting that district, gave the town of Alwick to the flames. The spirit of border warfare was now again exhibited in all its ancient ferocity. A force of six thousand men, led by the younger Percy and Sir John Pennington, crossed the river Sark at low water, and found themselves in front of the Scottish army, under the command of Hugh, Earl of Ormond, another brother of the Earl of Douglas. The details of the battle which followed are involved in much obscurity, though the engagement was the only one of importance which occurred on the borders during the interval between the conflicts of Homildon Hill and Flodden Field. Douglas, though his army was greatly inferior in numbers, immediately attacked the English, Battle of Sark, and defeat of the English. and after a brief but fierce struggle, in which he was ably seconded by Sir Thomas Wallace, the Sheriff of Ayr, he succeeded in breaking their ranks, and putting them to flight. Fifteen hundred men were slain, and five hundred were drowned while attempting to cross the Sark, now swollen by the returning tide. Many prisoners were taken, including the young Lord Percy and Sir John Pennington. The loss of the Scots was trifling, amounting only to sixty men; but their triumph was damped by the death of their gallant leader, Wallace of Craigie, whose bravery and skill had mainly contributed to the victory.* With the battle of Sark hostilities terminated for a time between the two nations. Both disclaimed being the aggressors, and professed equal anxiety for peace, which was happily restored, in the following year, by the conclusion of a permanent truce.

The Scottish court was now ingrossed in preparations for the reception of Mary, the intended consort of James. The parliament met at Stirling resolved that the royal nuptials should be conducted on a scale of splendour suited to the occasion. At length, on the eighteenth of June, the vessels containing the bride cast anchor in the Forth; and the princess, accompanied by a splendid train of knights from France and Burgundy, including the Archduke of Austria, the Duke of Brittany, and the Lord of Campvere, the brothers-in-law of James, along with the Dukes of Savoy and of Burgundy, landed at Leith. Here she was met by a great concourse of all classes of the people; and accompanied by an imposing body-guard of three hundred men-at-arms, she proceeded, amid the acclamations of the people, to Holyrood palace, where she was received and warmly welcomed by her future husband.† The week which intervened between her arrival and marriage was spent in a series of magnificent entertainments, during which, from her great beauty and amiable manners, she won the devoted affection of the attendant nobles and people. In accordance with the chivalrous spirit of the age, various tournaments were held, at which knights displayed their prowess. A contemporary chronicler has given a minute account of one encounter, which was rendered memorable by the high rank and distinguished valour of the combatants. Three nobles of Burgundy, two of them brothers, named Lelain, and the third Hervé Meriadet, challenged an equal number of the Scottish chivalry to a joust with lance, battle-axe, sword, and dagger. The challenge of the foreign knights was immediately accepted by Sir John Ross of Halket, and two Douglasses, James, brother of the Earl of Douglas, and another James, brother to the Lord of Lochleven. A space near the castle rock of Stirling was selected for the lists, galleries were erected for the king and nobles, and an adjoining crag afforded accommodation for the ladies of the court, who were expected to grace the scene. On the day appointed for the encounter, the combatants appeared in the lists clothed in rich velvet dresses; the Scottish champions being attended by the Earl of Douglas himself, with a retinue of five thousand men. Having made their obeisance to the sovereign, they retired to their pavilions to arm. They were then knighted by the king, and at the sound of the trumpet the conflict began. Their lances were almost instantly shivered, and a fierce hand-to-hand struggle ensued, which was maintained with equal fortune by the brothers Lelain against James Douglas and Sir John Ross. Meriadet, however, who was engaged with Douglas of Lochleven, parried the thrust of his opponent, and, before the Scottish knight could use his battle-axe, struck him to the ground, on which the king threw down his truncheon, and terminated the conflict.* The foreign knights were afterwards entertained by James, who bestowed on them the meed of praise due to their valour and courtesy. The royal marriage, which took place at the conclusion of these stirring scenes, was celebrated at Holyrood, amid expressions of universal joy.

From the period of his marriage, James prosecuted with vigour his plans for the overthrow of those factions which had so long usurped the royal authority, and filled the kingdom with confusion and bloodshed. The counsels of Kennedy and Crichton had urged the necessity of some decisive measures for this end; and to these was now added the influence of the queen, a woman not only of great beauty, but of strong sense, who, alive to the honour of the crown, confirmed her husband in his resolution to restore and defend its authority. Douglas, from his tyranny and arrogance, was the most obnoxious of the confederated nobles, and had lately given new cause of offence, by an act of lawless revenge and insolent cruelty. Sir Richard Colville, of Ochiltree, having received some injuries from Sir John Auchinleck, a friend and follower of Douglas, seized the opportunity, while his enemy was on his road to wait upon the earl, to intercept and slay him. The crime of Colville certainly deserved punishment, but Douglas, without waiting for any formal trial of the criminal, treated the matter as an insult to himself, demanding prompt and summary vengeance. He immediately ravaged the lands of Colville, stormed his castle, and put that baron and his whole garrison to the sword.† This daring outrage filled James with the highest indignation. But as the vast power of the earl rendered a collision with him at that time eminently hazardous, the king prudently concealed his wrath, and awaited a more favourable opportunity for vengeance. In the meantime, he resolved to weaken the confederacy of which Douglas was the acknowledged head, by destroying its members in detail, and thus pave the way for the fall of the earl himself. The Livingstons were the first to feel the effects of his prompt and vigorous measures. Having received information of a proposed meeting of that faction, at the Bridge of Inchbilly, near Kirkintilloch, James took instant steps for the capture of their leaders, who, on reaching the place of rendezvous, were suddenly surrounded by the king at the head of his household troops, and committed to prison. By this bold step, Sir Alexander Livingston, of Callendar, the chief of his name, and now an aged man; James Livingston, his eldest son; Robyn, of Callendar, Captain of Dunbarton; David Livingston, of Greenyards; John Livingston, Captain of Doune castle; Robert Livingston, of Lullithgow; with James Dundas, of Dundas; and Robert Bruce, of Clackmannan, relatives and allies of the Livingstons, were entirely in the royal power; and in the brief space of forty days their whole estates were seized, their subordinates expelled from all places of trust, and every castle and fortalice held by them fell into the king's hand.* The interval between the arrest and trial of the culprits was wisely employed by James in securing the friendship of those foreign powers whose hostility would have embarrassed him in the resolute course which he determined to prosecute. The Bishop of Brechin, and the Abbot of Melrose, in company with Lords Montgomery and Grey, were despatched to England, with the view of arranging the terms of a truce between that country and Scotland, and succeeded in concluding a peace for an indefinite period; the treaty providing that, in the event of hostilities being resumed by either country, warning should be given six months before. The previous treaty with France, and the league with Brittany, were also confirmed by separate embassies.

Immediately after the adoption of these vigorous and prudent measures, James summoned a meeting of his parliament in Edinburgh, on the nineteenth of January, for the trial of the Livingstons. No record of the proceedings has been preserved; but the principal charge brought against them appears to have been their forcible seizure of the queen's person, on the third of August, 1439. As the facts could not be denied, they were all found guilty. Livingston himself, the aged head of the family, had his life spared; but he was deprived of his estates, and, along with his kinsmen, James Dundas, of Dundas, and Robert Bruce, brother to Bruce of Clackmannan, was imprisoned in Dunbarton castle, while his younger son, Alexander, and Robert Livingston, comptroller, were hanged, and afterwards beheaded, on the Castle-hill at Edinburgh.†

After inflicting this signal punishment upon the Livingstons and their allies, the legislature proceeded to take into consideration the state of the country, and to provide a remedy for those grievous abuses which had grown up during the minority of the monarch. It was first of all declared, in the usual form, that the freedom of the holy church should be maintained, and that the civil power should carry into execution the sentences pronounced against heretics and others who had incurred the censures of the clergy. It was next provided that a general peace should be proclaimed throughout the realm, so that all men might travel in security, for mercantile or other purposes, in every part of the country, without any protection, save that of the king's peace, or the necessity of 'having assurance one of the other.' If any person, in spite of this enactment, should stand in fear of another, he was directed to repair to the sheriff, or nearest magistrate, and take oath that he was in mortal fear of his enemy; on which the officer was to exact pledges for the maintenance of the peace, according to the ancient estates of the realm. It was enacted that just and able judges, learned in the law, should be appointed to administer justice impartially, to the small as well as to the great, and that the justiciar should pass through the country twice in the year, as ordered by the old law.* It was declared, that rebellion against the king's person and authority should be punished according to the judgment of the Three Estates, who were to take into consideration 'the quality, and the quantity of the rebellion,' and that those who were guilty of open and 'notour' rebellion against the sovereign, or who should presume to make war upon the king's subjects, or to give encouragement or protection to such criminals, should be proceeded against by the sovereign in person, with the whole force of the country, and punished according to their deserts. An attempt was made, as we have seen, by James I.,‡ to secure to the tenants of the feudal barons protection from summary ejection from the lands which they held on lease; and it was now 'declared to be ordained, for the safety and favour of the poor people who labour the ground, that they, and all others, who have taken or shall take lands in any time to come, from lords, according to a lease, which is to run for a certain term of years, shall remain on the lands protected by their lease till the expiry of the same, paying all along the same yearly rent, and notwithstanding the lands should pass by sale or by alienation into different hands from those by whom they were first given in lease to the tenant; †—a most important provision for the security of property, and the improvement of the country. Severe enactments were passed against spoilers and marauders, and the sheriffs were peremptorily enjoined to make immediate inquiry into all outrages on property, and to compel the offenders to make instant restoration, and, in addition, to pay all expenses, and a fine to the king. It was provided, that the justiciaries, along with the justices, chamberlains, coroners, and other officers, in their progresses through the country, should travel with a moderate train, and not oppress the people by the number of their attendants.

It appears that, at this period, numbers of 'sorners, outlyers, masterful beggars, fools, bards, and runners about,' were in the habit of travelling through the country with their horses and hounds, and grievously oppressing the people by their exactions. For the remedying of this grievance, it was enacted, that all sheriffs, barons, aldermen, and bailies, should make inquiry into this matter at every court which they held, and all such rude and vexatious persons, on being discovered, should be put in prison till such time as the king 'had his will of them,' and their horses and hounds immediately confiscated to the crown. A similar enactment was passed against those that followed the profession of 'fools,' or such like runners about, who did not belong to the class of bards. On being discovered, they were to be put in prison or in irons, as long as they had any goods or substance of their own to live upon. If they had nothing to live upon, it was directed, that "their ears be nailed to the Tron, or to any other tree, and then cut off, and they themselves banished the country, to which, if they returned again, they were, upon their first apprehension, to be hanged."*

A committee, consisting of four persons, chosen from each of the Three Estates, was appointed to examine the acts of parliament passed during the reign of James I., and to select such as were calculated to promote the welfare of the realm, that they might be revised and submitted for approval to the parliament which was to be assembled at Perth. Stringent regulations were enacted for the prevention of forestalling in corn, and it was ordained, that all persons who were in the practice of buying victual or corn, and hoarding it up till the occurrence of a dearth, should be sought out and punished, and that the provisions which they had thus hoarded up should be forfeited to the king. The keeping old stacks of corn in the farmyard later than Christmas was strictly prohibited, and it was enjoined, that dealers in corn and other victual, should not be allowed to lay up a great store of grain, and keep it out of the market till the ripening of the next harvest; but at Christmas they were only to have so much grain in their possession as was required for the support of themselves and their families.†

A statute was passed, denouncing the penalties of treason against those who should make war against the king's majesty, or lay violent hands upon his person, or who should aid or supply with help or counsel, those who were traitors to the king's person, or who should garrison houses in their defence, or aid such rebels in the assault of castles or other places where the king should happen to be at the time;—an enactment evidently directed against a repetition of the lawless and disgraceful practices of Livingston, Crichton, and Douglas, who had each in turn sought to govern the kingdom by taking violent possession of the person of the sovereign. It was further ordained, that when those who had been guilty of theft or robbery were so powerful that the justiciar could not put down by legal measures their 'great and masterful theft,' information should be instantly sent to the king, that with the assistance of the privy council he might provide a remedy. But, with a lamentable perversion of justice and infringement of the rights of the people, the justice clerk was enjoined not to reveal to the offenders that a legal process was in preparation against them, or to alter the process in any way from the form in which it was given him 'except for the king's advantage.' It was further ordained, that all the regalities belonging to the crown should be judged by the king's justiciary, and that the freeholders of such regalities should appear in parliament equally with those of the royal domains. Regulations were also made respecting the importation of bullion by the merchants, the circulation of the money then current, and the new coinage and its issue; and strict injunctions were issued for the apprehension of those carrying money out of the kingdom, and for the punishment of all false strikers of gold and silver, and all forgers of false groats and pennies. And, finally, several important privileges were bestowed upon the clergy, whose influence had been most beneficially exerted in counteracting the exorbitant power of the barons, and in promoting the social welfare of the people. In a charter, dated on the 24th January, 1449, the king declared that, "for the salvation of his own soul, and that of Queen Mary, his consort, with consent of the Three Estates, and in terms of a schedule then presented to him, he conferred upon all bishops of cathedral churches in Scotland, the privilege of making their testaments, of levying the fruits of vacant sees, and converting them to their use, the vicars-general of the cathedrals rendering a true account of the same." These laws, which show the grievous abuses that had prevailed in the kingdom during the minority of the sovereign, were, for the most part, wise and just; but there is reason to fear that, owing to the weakness of the government, they were, like former enactments of a similar kind, neglected, or openly violated, by the very persons who had assisted in framing them.

The young king having now assumed the reins of government, displayed great ^{Vigorous and prudent conduct} intelligence, prudence, and vigour ^{of the king.} in the management of public affairs. In order that he might give his undivided attention to the improvement of his own kingdom, he was careful to maintain amicable relations with England, and to encourage by every method in his power the friendly intercourse which subsisted between the two countries. He cautiously carried out a systematic plan for the reduction of the overgrown power of the Earl of Douglas, and without attempting at once, and by any arbitrary measure, to deprive this haughty chief of his high office as lieutenant-general of the kingdom, he gradually withdrew from him his countenance, and entrusted the management of public affairs to able and prudent councillors, on whose fidelity and attachment he could rely. This conduct was attended with the best results. Douglas, finding his consequence decreasing, and his power on the wane, retired for a season from the country, and attended by a splendid retinue, consisting of six knights, with their own suites, fourteen gentlemen of the best families in Scotland, with their servants and a body of eighty men-at-arms, he undertook a pilgrimage to Rome.* At Paris he was joined by his brother, afterwards Earl of Douglas, who appears to have been at this time prosecuting his studies at the university there.† He was received by the French court with the distinction due to his rank, and the memory of his ancestor who fell at Verneuil, in the service of France; and even at Rome, which he reached during the season of the jubilee, his reputation and rude magnificence seem to have attracted attention and regard. During his absence, however, the disorderly and turbulent conduct of his vassals disturbed the peace of the country, and drew down upon them the vengeance of the government. His brother, the Lord of Balveny, on whom he had conferred the office of administrator of his estates, excited universal discontent by his insolent and tyrannical abuse of his authority. Symington, the earl's bailiff in Douglasdale, when cited to answer for the conduct of his retainers, contumaciously refused to obey; and when the Earl of Orkney, then chancellor of Scotland, was sent to make inquiry into these complaints, and to distrain the rents and goods of the earl, in order to compensate those who had received injury from his tenants, he met with open resistance and insult. The king, justly provoked at this contumacious opposition offered to the highest law officer of the realm, marched in person into the territories of Douglas, made himself master of the castles of Lochmaben and Douglas, razed the latter to the ground, and inflicted summary punishment on the marauders who had carried on their depredations under the protection of their powerful chief.‡

† Ibid.

When the tidings of these vigorous measures reached Rome, the Earl of Douglas set out immediately on his return to his own country. On reaching Scotland he found that the royal authority had gained ground so rapidly during his absence, that he must for the present, at least, act a subordinate part to his sovereign. He, therefore, sent a submissive message to the king, expressing his indignation at the excesses committed by his vassals during his absence, and his resolution to observe the laws and to maintain order among his dependents, on which he was again received into favour. Soon after his submission to the royal authority, Douglas was appointed one of the commissioners to negotiate the continuation of the truce with England; but there is too much reason to suspect, that, along with the Earl of Crawford, another of the commissioners, and several other disaffected barons, he used his influence rather to disturb than to confirm the friendly relations existing between the two countries, and that in concert with the Yorkist faction, he entered into a secret intrigue against the authority of his sovereign and the peace of the kingdom. In the following month he obtained from the English court a protection to visit England for himself, his three brothers, twenty-six gentlemen, and sixty-seven attendants. And as the chief persons mentioned in this safe conduct afterwards followed the house of Douglas in their rebellion, there can be little doubt that their journey to England was closely connected with their treasonable designs against their sovereign. On his return to Scotland, Douglas took up his residence on his extensive estates in Annandale. Although he had now been deprived of the office of lieutenant-general of the kingdom, the youthful monarch, unwilling to come to an open rupture with his too powerful subject, had invested him with the office of warden of the west and middle marches, and had besides confirmed by a deed of entail the earldoms of Wigton and Douglas to the earl and his descendants. But the arrogant noble, instead of exhibiting any symptoms of gratitude for the kindness shown to him by his sovereign, was only the more emboldened to set at defiance both the restraints of law and the authority of the king. He had the audacity even to attempt the life of the king's chief minister, the Chancellor Crichton, who, while he was passing through the southern suburb of Edinburgh, was suddenly attacked by an armed band of ruffians, hired and placed in ambush for the purpose by Douglas. But encouraged by the presence of his son, a young man of great spirit and bravery, the veteran statesman courageously defended himself, and after killing one and wounding another of his assailants, succeeded in effecting his escape to Crichton castle, Indignant at this unprovoked outrage, and resolved upon revenge, the chancellor immediately collected a strong body of friends and adherents, marched rapidly to Edinburgh, and attacking Douglas, who lay there with a small retinue, unsuspecting of danger, compelled him in his turn to flee from the metropolis.

When such an outrageous attack was openly made upon the person of the chief minister of the crown, it may readily be supposed that Douglas was not slow to evince his total contempt of the royal authority; and that the minor barons who refused to join his faction and promote his designs were, in one way or other, made to feel his vengeance. Sir John Herries of Terreagles, a gentleman of ancient family in Nithsdale, and of eminent loyalty, having refused to become an ally and follower of Douglas, had his estates repeatedly ravaged and plundered by a lawless banditti from Douglasdale. Having frequently sought redress from the earl, but without effect, Herries at length retaliated by invading the lands belonging to the vassals of Douglas, and attempting to recover by force of arms the property of which he had been robbed. But he was unfortunately defeated and made prisoner by his powerful enemy, who cast him into irons, and soon after caused him to be ignominiously hanged, in contempt of a positive injunction of the king requiring his release.* Shortly after this, Sir John Sandilands of Calder, a kinsman of James, was murdered by Sir Patrick Thornton, a follower of Douglas; and two other knights, Sir James and Sir Allan Stewart, lost their lives at the same time.†

It had now become evident to all men that a crisis was at hand, and the conduct of Douglas speedily brought matters to an extremity. With an evident view to an open insurrection against the royal authority, he sought to compel not only his own vassals, but the gentry in all the neighbouring districts, to join in his treasonable association with the Earls of Crawford and Ross, and to execute leagues and bonds, by which they engaged to support each other, and to make common cause with Douglas against all persons whatsoever, 'within or without the realm.' In the words of an old chronicler, he "sought and persuaded all men under his opinion and servitude, and in special the gentlemen of Galloway, with Coile, Carriek, and Cunninghame, and all other parties that were near adjacent unto him, desyring them daylie to ride and goe with him as his own household men and servantis, and to assist him in all thingis whosomevir he had to doe, whether it was ryght or wrong, with the king or against him." The treasonable character of his proceedings had now, however, become apparent, and a few of the men of influence in Galloway defied the threats of the formidable chief, and refused to join in his designs against the independence of the crown and the peace of the country. "Therefore they would not assist him, nor take part with him, nor ride, nor gang with him, nor be his men."

Cruel murder of the tutor of Bomby. Among the most prominent of these was a gentleman named Maclellan, tutor or guardian of the young Lord of Bomby, ancestor of the Earls of Kirkcudbright, and sister's son to Sir Patrick Gray, captain of the king's guard. Enraged at his opposition to his schemes, Douglas suddenly besieged the residence of the family, took Maclellan prisoner, and threw him into a dungeon in the castle of Douglas. Intelligence of this outrage having reached the court, Sir Patrick Gray, anxious to avert the too probable fate of his nephew, obtained from the king a letter to Douglas under the royal seal, entreating rather than commanding the immediate release of his prisoner. Sir Patrick proceeded with the utmost speed to Douglas castle, where he was received by the earl with great apparent courtesy and respect. He inquired if his visitor had dined, and receiving an answer in the negative, he declined entering upon business until Gray had partaken of some refreshment, remarking that there was 'no talk to be had between ane full man and ane fasting.' He accordingly pressed Sir Patrick, with an affectation of great hospitality, to partake of the cheer which was presently set before him. But well aware of the object of Gray's errand, and determined to defeat it, he gave private orders that Maclellan should be immediately led out into the courtyard of the castle, and there beheaded. Meanwhile, Sir Patrick, having concluded his meal, presented the king's letter to the earl, who received it with affected reverence, and seemed much gratified by the contents. He thanked Sir Patrick, and declared that he was much beholden to him for bringing so gracious a letter from his sovereign, especially considering their mutual relation at that time; and as to the request contained in the royal epistle, it should be thankfully granted to the king, and the rather for Sir Patrick's sake. Thus saying, the ruthless savage took Gray by the hand and led him to the castle green, where the bleeding trunk of his poor kinsman lay covered with a cloth. "Yonder, Sir Patrick," said he, "lies your sister's son; unfortunately he wants the head, but you may take his body and do with it what you will." "My lord," said Gray,—who was compelled by a sense of danger to conceal his indignation at the atrocious deed, and the heartless mocking of the murderer,—“Since you have taken the head you may dispose of the body as you will,” and instantly calling for his horse, he mounted him, and with a sad heart rode across the drawbridge. But unable any longer to suppress his burning resentment at the insult and injury with which he had been treated, in spite of the dangerous situation in which he was placed, he sternly said to the earl, "My lord, if I live, you shall be rewarded according to your demerits for this day's work." Douglas, incensed at this ebullition of natural indignation, instantly called to horse; and though Sir Patrick, seeing the fury of the earl, rode off with the utmost speed, he was closely pursued by the followers of Douglas till near Edinburgh, and would have been taken but for the uncommon fleetness of his led horse.*

This wicked and cruel deed, which manifested an utter contempt both for the person of the sovereign, and the authority of the law, appears to have filled up the cup of the king's resentment against the Earl of Douglas. It had now become evident that either the overgrown power of this arrogant and sanguinary noble must be diminished or the royal authority would be reduced to a mere shadow. His treasonable league with Ross and Crawford, which had now been discovered, as well as his intrigues with the Yorkist faction in England, against the peace of his own country, had exposed him to the highest penalty of the law. But James was well aware, that if open war was declared, the combined power of the three earls could bring into the field a force superior to that of the crown, and he therefore prudently hesitated to bring matters to such an extremity. It was finally

Douglas invited resolved, by the advice of Crichton and other experienced counsellors, that the earl should be invited to court, in order that the king might try the effect of a personal remonstrance with him respecting the flagrant outrages he had committed, and offer to forgive his past offences on condition that he should make reparation to the relations of those whom he had injured, and abstain in future from such aggressions against the royal authority. James accordingly sent a message to Douglas by his friend Sir William Lauder, of Hatton, inviting him to a personal conference in the castle of Stirling, and assuring him of his forgiveness and restoration to the royal favour, provided only that the earl would express his regret for the offences which he had committed. It appears that, about the same time, Crichton and Sir Patrick Gray had proposed to accompany Douglas and his brother James, with Lord Hamilton, his faithful ally, three bishops, and various other nobles, upon a pilgrimage to Canterbury, and that a safe conduct was granted by the English king to permit this strangely-mixed party to visit the shrine of Thomas à Becket.*

In the absence of all historical documents, it is impossible to say how far the invitation and promises of the king and his ministers were sincere. Be this as it may, the earl was induced, by the representations made to him, to visit the court about the beginning of Lent, 1452. It is asserted by a contemporary chronicler, that before venturing himself within the king's power he was furnished with a letter of safe-conduct under the great seal, and signed by the principal nobles of the court. Trusting to this security, Douglas, who was naturally rash and fearless, repaired to Stirling, with a small retinue, and, upon Shrove Tuesday, he received an invitation to dine at the royal table, which he accepted without hesitation or suspicion. The earl was kindly received by the king, and not only dined but supped with the court. After the royal feast, James led his guest apart into an inner room, where there were none present but Sir Patrick Gray and a few of the privy councillors, and introducing the subject of the bond or league in which Douglas had engaged with the Earls of Crawford and Ross, remonstrated with him on his illegal conduct, and the lawless outrages which he had committed upon the loyal subjects of the king, and condescended to entreat him to renounce this treasonable confederacy, as inconsistent with his allegiance, and dangerous to the state. Douglas, however, declined to comply with the entreaties addressed to him. The king urged him more earnestly, and assured him of his pardon and favour if he would return to his allegiance. The earl not only gave a haughty and positive refusal, but upbraided the king with his conduct towards him, in depriving him of the office of lieutenant-governor of the kingdom, and declared that he could not, with his honour, renounce the solemn engagement which he had made with Ross and Crawford, nor would he do so for the words of any living man. The king, whose temper was naturally fiery and impetuous, lost all self-command at this insolent defiance, and passionately exclaiming, "By heaven, if you will not break the league, —his assassination by the king. I shall!" drew his dagger, and stabbed the earl, first in the throat, and then in the lower part of the body.* Upon this, Sir Patrick Gray, who had sworn revenge upon Douglas for the murder of his nephew, struck him with his battle-axe, and the rest of the nobles who were present, showed their zeal by stabbing the dying man with their knives and daggers. The dead body of the murdered noble, pierced by twenty-six wounds, was then cast out into an open court adjoining the royal apartments, and was afterwards ignominiously buried upon the spot.

The atrocious murder of Douglas by the hand of his sovereign, and while under the protection of the public faith, was utterly indefensible, and set a most pernicious example to the turbulent and lawless barons whom it was the object of James to subject to the authority of the government and of the law. But very little sympathy can be felt for his victim, whose ambitious, treasonable, and cruel conduct merited the most condign punishment, and whose death can be regarded in no other light than as a public benefit. There is no reason to believe that the death of Douglas was a premeditated action, for, to say nothing of other considerations, the designs of the king and his counsellors were likely to be injured rather than promoted by a deed which was calculated to shock public feeling, and to precipitate that struggle between the crown and the aristocracy, which it was the interest of the crown to delay till some more favourable opportunity. It was evident that the overgrown power of the house of Douglas would not be diminished by taking the life of its chief, when he had four surviving brothers, men of courage and ability, to inherit his vast influence and estates, and to lead his followers and vassals. There can be little doubt, therefore, that this lamentable deed was the result of sudden passion, not of preconcerted treachery and bad faith; though it is by no means improbable that the king and his councillors had determined, if Douglas proved intractable, to detain him a prisoner, and perhaps even to bring him to trial for his manifold crimes against the state.

The murder of Douglas was immediately followed by a fierce struggle between the royal party and the friends and vassals of the unfortunate baron. The four brothers, who were then in the town of Stirling, on learning the fate of the earl, instantly assembled themselves along with Lord Hamilton and other friends of their family, and recognized James, the eldest of the four, as his successor in the earldom. The new earl exhorted the assembly to attack the castle of Stirling and revenge the blood of his murdered brother.* But his retainers and followers were of opinion that the fortress was too strong to be assaulted at that moment with any hope of success, and they agreed to meet in arms at Stirling on the 25th day of March. They accordingly collected their vassals and returned to Stirling on the day appointed, accompanied by six hundred barons and gentlemen, the supporters of the house of Douglas, and with the sound of horns and trumpets proclaimed King James a false and perjured man. They then took the letter of safe conduct which had been granted to Earl William, and after exhibiting it publicly at the cross proceeded to nail it to a board and dragged it in scorn through the streets, at the tail of a miserable cart horse. After this bravado they pillaged and burnt the town of Stirling, but finding themselves still unable to attempt the siege of the castle they drew off their forces and retired to their own estates. †

* Pitscottie, vol. i. pp. 100—103. Achinleck Chronicle, p. 47.

Guided by the counsel of the experienced Bishop Kennedy, James endeavoured to separate Douglas from his adherents; and, by liberal promises of lands and honours, succeeded in inducing many, who had hitherto wavered in their allegiance, to give their strenuous support in this struggle to the royal authority, and the cause of order and good government. The king's most powerful adherent was the Earl of Huntley, the chief of the great family of Gordon, whom he promoted to the office of lieutenant-general of the kingdom, and entrusted with the task of putting down the rebellion of Crawford and Ross. Huntley immediately collected a numerous army, including the greater part of the northern barons, whom the promise of reward, or the hope of indemnity for past offences, attracted to the royal standard, and marching towards Stirling, he encountered the Earl of Crawford, who, at the head of his retainers and vassals, had taken post near Brechin, for the purpose of intercepting the royalist forces. The battle was fought on the 18th of May, 1452, at the Hair Cairn on the moor about two miles north-east of the town. The most determined courage was displayed on both sides, and though the royalists far outnumbered their opponents, at one period the royal standard was in danger, and Crawford was on the point of gaining the victory. At this critical moment, providentially for the welfare of the country, the desertion of one of his most trusted vassals turned the tide of battle, and caused the signal defeat of the Tiger Earl. This was John Collace of Balnamoon or Bonnymoon, the commander of the left wing of the Angus billmen, who, before the engagement, had requested Crawford to put his son in fee of the lands of Ferne, which lay near his house, and convenient for him. "The time is short," replied the earl; "stand bravely by me to-day, and prove yourself a valiant man, and you shall have all and more than you desire." Balnamoon, dissatisfied with this answer, which he regarded as an evasion of his claims, and, perhaps, also, as the historian of the Lindsays conjectures, having had some prior pique against the earl, during the heat of the conflict deserted to the enemy with his whole division, consisting of three hundred men, armed with bills, broad-swords, battle-axes, and long spears, on whom the earl chiefly relied, and in 'whose hands the hail hope of victory stood that day.' The centre of Crawford's army was thus left exposed and unprotected, and Huntley, seizing the opportunity, made a vigorous assault on the troops thus laid open, and put them to flight in spite of the frantic efforts of the Tiger Earl to retrieve the fortunes of the day. Sir John Lindsay of Brechin, and Pitcairle, brother of Crawford, Dundas of Dundas, with sixty other lords and gentlemen, were among the slain; while Huntley lost his two brothers, Sir William and Sir Henry Seton, and Gordon of Methlic, ancestor of the Earl of Aberdeen. The Tiger and his discomfited followers fled to his castle of Finhaven. A son of Donald, Thane of Cawdor, pursued the fugitives so fiercely that he became involved among the personal attendants of the earl, and found it necessary for his safety to pass for one of their number. On reaching the castle he heard with horror the oaths and blasphemies which poured from the lips of the savage baron, who, rendered furious by defeat, called for a cup of wine on alighting from his horse, and declared that he would willingly pass seven years in hell to gain the honour of such a victory as had that day fallen to Huntley.* The intruder sat at supper among the crowd in the great hall of the castle, when a false alarm was given that Huntley was upon them. In the terror and confusion caused by this announcement he effected his escape, carrying off with him Crawford's silver goblet, which he presented to Huntley at Brechin as a voucher for his strange adventure. †

The king lost no time in inflicting the penalties of treason upon the insurgent baron, and in reward-

† This adventurous youth is said to have been the ancestor of the Caldors of Assuanlee, an estate which the historian of the Gordons asserts to have been given him by Huntley, in reward of his daring—though it is probable that a former grant was only confirmed upon this occasion. ing his victorious lieutenant-general for his important services on this occasion. The 'life, lands, and goods,' of Crawford 'were declared forfeit' to the state; his lordship of Brechin, with the hereditary sheriffdom of Aberdeen, were conferred upon Huntley; and while the armorial coat of the victor was honourably augmented, that of the rebel was torn, and his bearings abolished and 'scrapit out of the Book of Arms for ever.'*

Meanwhile the civil war between the royalists, and the partisans of the Douglas family, raged fiercely in other parts of the country. The Earl of Angus, though himself a chief of a younger branch of that house, espoused the cause of the king against his own kinsman. A similar course was followed by Sir John Douglas, of Dalkeith, who became on that account exceedingly obnoxious to the partisans of the head of the family. His castle of Dalkeith, a place of great strength, was besieged by them, and the adjacent town and villages ravaged and burned. But the garrison defended themselves with so much courage and resolution, that the assailants were ultimately compelled to raise the siege.† In other districts of the country, the operations of husbandry and the pursuits of trade and commerce, were completely interrupted by these bloody feuds, and life and property were alike rendered insecure. In the north, the Earl of Moray, one of the brothers of Douglas, sought to take vengeance on Huntley, for his overthrow of the Earl of Crawford, by burning his castle of Strathbogie and ravaging his estates. Huntley himself, who was recalled to the north by this disastrous intelligence, was afterwards surprised by Moray, and lost a considerable number of his followers in a morass, called Dunkinty.‡ In revenge for this outrage the Gordons invaded the fertile district of Moray, and after laying it waste with fire and sword, razed to the ground that half of the city of Elgin which belonged to the friends of the Earl of Moray;§ while the Tiger Earl of Crawford, exasperated by his defeat at Brechin, spoiled the lands and destroyed the houses of the king's friends in Angus, taking terrible revenge on all who had either refused to support him, or had deserted his banner in the recent engagement.

The Earl of Douglas meanwhile, not contented with having inflicted upon the country all the miseries of civil war, entered into a treasonable correspondence with the English government, then in the hands of the faction of the Yorkists, and promised to swear homage to the

Thou Gordon so gay?

English king as his lawful sovereign.* On receiving intelligence of these intrigues, the king, by the advice of the sagacious Kennedy, resolved to adopt prompt and vigorous measures for the punishment of Douglas and his accomplices, and for this purpose a meeting of the Three Estates was assembled at Edinburgh on the twelfth of June, 1452. In this parliament the sentence of forfeiture against the Earl of Crawford was ratified and confirmed, 'his gudis and gear confiscat, his landis dealt, and his name abolished and blotted out of the buik of arms for evir.' The Earls of Douglas, Moray, and Ross; James, Lord Hamilton; and John, Lord Balveny, were summoned to appear before the parliament on a certain day to answer for the crimes laid to their charge. During the night, however, previous to the day appointed for their appearance, a paper, signed with the names of the Earl of Douglas, his brothers, and Lord Hamilton, was affixed to the church doors, declaring that they would not obey the summons; and renouncing their allegiance to the king as a murderer, a perjured prince, a violator of the laws of hospitality, and an 'ungodly thirster after innocent blood, without just quarrel or occasion.†

James was highly incensed at this gross insult, and took immediate and vigorous measures to inflict condign punishment on those who had thus openly defied his authority. A solemn deed was unanimously passed by the parliament, declaring that the late Earl of Douglas was at the time of his death an avowed enemy to his sovereign, and in a state of open rebellion, and that, in such circumstances, it was lawful for the king to put him to death.‡ The earldom of Moray, forfeited by Archibald Douglas, was bestowed upon Sir James Crichton, the eldest son of the chancellor, who had claims upon it by marriage. Lord Hay, Constable of Scotland, a zealous supporter of the king in his struggle with the Douglasses, was rewarded with the earldom of Errol. Sir George Crichton, of Cairnes, was created Earl of Caithness; the dignity of lords of parliament was bestowed upon Hepburn of Hailes, Boyd, Fleming, and other loyal barons and Lord Campbell, and his son, Sir Colin Campbell, Sir David Hume, Sir Alexander Home, and Sir James Keir, were rewarded with grants from the crown lands, and the forfeited estates of the rebel barons. After taking these steps to encourage his friends, and to intimidate and weaken his enemies, the king proceeded to issue a summons for the assembling of an army on the moor of Pentland, near Edinburgh, with the intention of invading the estates of the insurgents, and compelling their submission. The summons was cheerfully obeyed by the nobility and their retainers, that in a short time the king found him self at the head of an army of thirty thousand men.

Accompanied by this powerful force James ^{Submission of} marched in person against the Douglas. Earl of Douglas, through Ettrick forest, Annandale, and Galloway, 'burning the corns and harrying the countrie' of this arch-rebel, who did not venture to meet his sovereign in the field.* At length, when the royal army appeared before Douglas castle, the earl, by the advice of his chief vassals and supporters, laid down his arms, and implored the clemency of the king. James, who was fiery and impetuous in his temper, but not vindictive, readily extended his forgiveness to the insurgent chief and his retainers, upon certain conditions, which were formally specified in a written bond. In this deed, which was subscribed by the earl with his own hand, and solemnly sworn to on the holy gospels, he bound and obliged himself to abstain from any attempt, direct or indirect, by law or any other manner of way, to obtain possession of the earldom of Wigton, or the lordship of Stewarton, forfeited by the late earl; and in his own name and in that of his brother and Lord Hamilton, he engaged to remit and forgive all manner of rancour of heart, feud, malice, and envy, which they had entertained against any of the king's subjects, and more especially against those who were art and part in the slaughter of William Earl of Douglas, his brother, and promised, 'at the ordinance and advyce of his sovereigne lord,' to take such persons 'in heartlines and friendship.' He next obliged himself 'to allow his tenants and rentallers to remain unmolested in their farms till Whitsunday come a year,' except those tenants who occupied the granges and farm 'steadings,' which were in the hands of Earl William at the time of his decease, for his own proper use; but even these were to be permitted to remain upon their farms till the ensuing Whitsunday. The earl also became bound to dissolve all the leagues and bonds into which he had entered against his sovereign, and to enter into no more illegal confederacies in time to come; he engaged to bring no claim against the king for any rents which he or the queen might have levied in Douglasdale or Galloway, and to make reparation for all the injuries which had been done to the persons who enjoyed letters of protection; and, finally, he bound himself to maintain and defend the Borders, to keep the truce between England and Scotland to the best of his ability, and to pay to his sovereign lord the king all honour and worship, 'he having such surety as was reasonable for safety of his life.†

Having thus succeeded in restoring the southern districts of the country to a state of comparative quiet and security, the king undertook an expedition to the north, accompanied by his privy councillors and a strong body of troops. As the royal procession advanced through Angus, the Tiger

Earl of Crawford suddenly presented himself before the king, bareheaded and bare-footed, and clad in miserable apparel, and throwing himself at his sovereign's feet, confessed his treasons, and implored the royal forgiveness. His earnest petition for mercy was powerfully supported by Bishop Kennedy and the Chancellor Crichton, by whose advice Crawford had made his submission in this humble guise, and the king moved by the penitence of the offender and their intercession in his behalf, granted him a full pardon. He assured the earl that he desired neither 'lands, lives, goods, nor gear' of his barons, but their hearts and friendship, and that he wished no other vengeance for his repeated treasons than the sight of his penitence and submission. He, therefore, freely forgave him and his associates all their offences against the royal authority, and restored them to their honours and estates.* The stubborn heart of the rude chief seems to have been powerfully affected by the wise and generous conduct of his sovereign. At the head of a chosen company of the barons and gentry of Angus, he accompanied the king in his future progress to the north, and on his return in the following month, he entertained him with great magnificence at his castle of Finhaven. It is said that James had sworn to make the highest stone of the earl's castle the lowest; and that on the occasion of his visit to Finhaven, he climbed to the top of the battlements, and throwing a stone, which was lying loose there, down into the moat, thus accomplished his vow, if not in the spirit, strictly in the letter.† The king had no reason to regret his clemency to the Tiger Earl, for from this time till the period of his decease he continued a loyal subject and a firm supporter of the cause of order and good government. On this account, his death, which took place from fever, six months after his restoration to the royal favour, was regretted both by the king and the nation.

Meanwhile, it soon became apparent that the submission of the Earl of Douglas had not been sincere, and that the peace which had been patched up between the king and that factious and turbulent chief was not likely to be of long continuance. The power of Douglas was already too great for a subject, and he had recently obtained from the pope a dispensation for his marriage with the heiress of Galloway, the widow of his deceased brother, and had thus united in his person the immense entailed and unentailed estates of the family. He had also renewed his treasonable negotiations with the Yorkist party, who had now obtained the supremacy in the government of England, and received from them the promise of an immediate supply of money and of troops, on condition that he and his associates should take the oath of homage to the English crown. At this critical emergency, the royal cause received a severe blow from the death of the sagacious and experienced Crichton, who died at the castle of Dunbar in the end of the year 1454; and the aspect of affairs was so threatening, that it is said to have been a question in the king's mind whether he should abide the conflict or retire to France.

On hearing of the formidable army which the Douglasses were assembling, and the number and power of the barons who had espoused their cause, James, in great perplexity and alarm, repaired with all speed to St. Andrews to ask counsel of Bishop Kennedy in this hour of need. The prudent counsel of mode in which the prudent prelate Bishop Kennedy tendered his advice to his youthful sovereign is related by the venerable Pitscottie in the following simple and graphic terms:—"The bishop was ane wyse and godlie man and answered the king in this manner as after follows, saying, 'Sir, I beseech your grace that ye take a little meat to refresh your and I will pass to my orature and pray to God for you and the commonwealth of this realme and countrie.' This being spoken the king passed to his disjoine and the bishop to his orature to make his prayer to Almighty God to open his mouth, to give him knowledge and utterance, to give that noble prince who was destitute and comfortless of all good counsel, that he might give him instruction and learning how he should escape that great perrel and danger apparentlie to fall at that time. Then this bishop took the king's grace be the hand and led him to his orature, beseeiking him to make his earnest prayers to the Almighty that he would strengthen him with his Holy Spirit, that he might with ane bold courage resist his enemies who were risen against him contrair the commandement of God and commonwealth of the countrie, beseeiking God of his mighty power and grace that he would grant him victorie of these conspirators and rebellors who were risen against him, but (without) any cause made be him, and speciallie that he would grant him the upper hand of the Earle of Douglas, and his complices, like as he had done before against him and his oppressors when they oppressed the commonwealth of the countrie. This being done, the king passed in this manner to his devotion, as this holy bishop had commanded him. And after, when the king had ended his prayer to Almighty God, then this bishop seeing the king desolate of good counsel and dispaired of good hope or success of any victorie to fall to him contrair his enemies, caused him to pass into his studie, or secret house, where his bowes and arrowes lay, with other sundrie jewels of the said bishop's. Then the bishop let this noble prince see ane similitude, the which might bring him to experience and comfort, how he might invade against the uproar of the conspirators, and speciallie against the Earle of Douglas and the leave (rest) of his complices. The said bishope pulled out ane great sheaffe of arrows, knit together in ane quhange of leather and delyvered them to the king in his hand and bade him set them to his knee and break them. The king answered, 'It is impossible, because thair is so manie together of the said arrowes, and knit so fast with leather that no man can break them at once.' The bishop answered and said, 'That is true, but yet he would let the king see that he could breake them,' and pulled out one by one, or two by two, till he had broken them all, and said unto the king, 'Sir, ye must evin doe in this manner with your barons that have risen against you, which are so many in number, and knit so fast together against you in conspiracy, that ye on no ways can get them broken. But be this practick that I have shoven you be the similitude of thir arrowes, that is to say, ye must conquer and break by lord and lord be himsele, for ye may not deal with them all at once: and farder, make ane proclamatioun out through your realme to all theiffes and traitouris, and all them that have offendit against you, to grant them free remissione to be good men in time coming, and now to serve your grace at this instant time in your necessitie. The which being done, I trust your grace shall get more favour, nor shall your contrair partie.' The king hearing this wyse counsel took courage, and maid his proclamatiounes as forsaid is in all pairts of his realme to the effect forsaid."*

Acting upon this sagacious advice, James caused private representations to be made to some of the most powerful of the adverse party, pointing out the danger which must arise, not only to the independence of the crown, but to the peace and welfare of the country and to their own interests, from the ambition and overgrown power of the Douglas family; and made liberal promises to those who, in this moment of extremity, should abandon their cause, and join the party of the sovereign. Induced by these promises and expectations, as well as by the dread of the overwhelming predominance of the Douglasses, many of the most powerful of the barons rallied round the crown, and the king soon found himself at the head of a numerous and well-appointed army. With this force he marched into Douglasdale and Avondale, laying waste, with fire and sword, the estates of the Earl of Douglas and Lord Hamilton, and, by threats of immediate and condign punishment, compelled the barons and gentry of the disaffected districts to renew their allegiance and join his banner. His lieutenants, the Earls of Orkney and Angus, then laid siege to the strong castle of Abercorn, on the Frith of Forth, belonging to the Earl of Douglas. For a whole month this fortress resisted the utmost efforts of the besiegers, though battered by powerful engines, and especially by a large cannon, which was directed by a French engineer; but, at length, it was taken by assault, and the leaders of the garrison hanged. Meanwhile, Douglas, and his kinsman and ally Lord Hamilton, having collected a numerous and highly-disciplined army, advanced to the relief of the beleaguered fortress. A battle appeared to be inevitable, and the situation and character of the two parties left no doubt that it would be desperately contested, and that the result would be decisive. But the Bishop of St. Andrews had already opened a secret negotiation with the allies and vassals of Douglas, and addressed himself so successfully to their hopes and fears, that some of the most powerful of their number were gained over to the royal cause.

* Pitscottie, vol. i. pp. 123—130, note.

The representations of the sagacious prelate produced a deep impression upon the mind of his kinsman, Lord Hamilton, who commanded a chosen body of three hundred horse, and as many infantry, in the army of Douglas. But although this powerful baron returned a favourable answer to the overtures of the prelate, he was sincerely attached to the cause of Douglas, and hesitated to abandon him at this critical conjuncture. Meanwhile, the king sent a herald to the rebel army, charging them to disperse, under the pains of treason; but at the same time promising pardon to all who should lay down their arms. To this message Douglas returned a scornful answer, and immediately caused his trumpets to sound; and placing his troops in battle array, marched forward to encounter the royal army. Imagining, however, that the proclamation of the king had produced an unfavourable impression on the minds of his followers, and made them waver in their adherence to his cause, he resolved to delay the engagement till next day, and accordingly led his troops back into his camp, hoping to re-animate their drooping courage, and to inspire them with greater confidence and zeal. But this injudicious movement had a most unfavourable effect on his most powerful adherents, who saw in this wavering and undecided conduct a proof of the unfitness of the earl to conduct so perilous an enterprise. Douglas had no sooner entered his tent, than Hamilton came to expostulate with him, and inquired whether it was his intention to fight, or not; assuring him that every day's delay would augment the royal forces, and diminish the number of his own adherents. Douglas contemptuously answered, 'If you are tired, you may depart when you please.' Hamilton straightway took the earl at his word, and that very night passed over to the king, with all the troops under his command. His example was so generally followed by the other insurgent chiefs, who had a high opinion of Hamilton's prudence and sagacity, that before morning the camp of Douglas was almost entirely deserted, and scarcely one hundred men remained in it, besides his own household troops and immediate dependents.* The unfortunate baron, thus abandoned by his friends, and exposed to the unmitigated vengeance of the king, hastily broke up his encampment, and fled to the wilds of Annandale, where, for a time, he eluded the pursuit of his enemies. Hamilton, whose desertion of Douglas had mainly contributed to his overthrow, for the sake of appearances, was committed to prison for a short time at Roslin, and was put under the charge of the Earl of Orkney; but he was soon released, and rewarded for his services to the royal cause with large grants from the forfeited estates.

James followed up his success by vigorous measures for the complete overthrow of the house of Douglas, and the establishment of the royal authority throughout the kingdom. At the head of a powerful army, he marched through the western and southern districts of the country, and, after a slight resistance, reduced the various strongholds which Douglas and his adherents had fortified against the government. Douglas castle itself, with the strong fortresses of Strathavon, Thrieve, Lochendorb, and Tarnaway, were in this way successively taken and dismantled. Douglas had in the meantime fled into England, but his three brothers, the Earls of Ormond and Moray, and Lord Balveny, remained on the borders, and succeeded in collecting a numerous army of their own retainers, and other lawless marauders, with which they plundered and laid waste the country. They were encountered at Arkinholme, on the river Esk, by the Earl of Angus, at the head of a powerful force, composed of the Scotts, Maxwells, Johnstons, and other borderers, who had been lately numbered among the vassals of Douglas, but now abandoned his sinking cause, and hastened to enrol themselves in the ranks of the victorious party.† After a desperate conflict, the insurgents were totally routed. The Earl of Moray was slain in the action; Ormond was wounded and taken prisoner, and shortly after executed; and of the brothers of Douglas, Balveny alone made his escape into England. James, who at the time this action was fought was prosecuting the siege of Abercorn, received the first intimation of this signal victory from a soldier, who laid at his feet the bleeding head of the Earl of Moray. 'He was received by the king,' says Pitscottie, 'with very great thanks.'

James having thus triumphed over the formidable rebellion, which had menaced not merely the independence, but the very existence of his throne, returned to the capital to meet his parliament, * The prominent part taken by the Earl of Angus in the overthrow of the elder branch of his family, gave rise to a popular saying, founded on the different complexion of the two branches of the house of Douglas, 'That the Red Douglas had put down the Black.'

According to Pitscottie, the earl himself was present at the battle of Arkinholme, and, along with his brother, very narrowly escaped through a wood; but in the letter of James to Charles VII. of France, giving an account of the overthrow of the rebels, it is stated, that Douglas had shortly before fled to England with only four or five attendants.—See Pinkerton, vol. i.—Appendix, p. 486.

which had been summoned to assemble there in the month of June, 1455. In this meeting of the national council, the Earl of Douglas, his mother, Beatrice, Countess of Douglas, and his brothers, Archibald, Earl of Moray, who had fallen at Arkinholme, and John Douglas of Balveny were declared traitors, and their estates and offices were forfeited to the crown. The seals of the bishops, earls, and barons who sat in the parliament, and of the burgh of Haddington, in the name of the whole body of the commissioners of the burghs, were appended to the instrument of forfeiture, in order to give additional weight and solemnity to the sentence. After having thus directed the vengeance of the laws against the arch-rebel and his family, the parliament proceeded, on the fourth of August, to adopt measures for strengthening the authority of the crown, and providing for the defence of the kingdom, with the view of preventing the dilapidation of the royal revenues. It was first of all declared that "since the poverty of the crown is oftentimes the cause of the poverty of the realm, and of many other inconveniences which it would be tedious to enumerate, it had been ordained, by the advice of the full council of parliament, that there should be from this time appointed certain lordships and castles in every part of the realm, where, at different periods of the year, the sovereign may be likely to take up his residence; which were to belong, in perpetuity, to the crown, never to be settled or bestowed, either in fee or franctenure upon any person whatever, however high his rank or estate, except by the solemn advice and decree of the whole parliament, and under circumstances which affected the welfare and prosperity of the kingdom." As an additional security against the alienation of the crown lands, it was further declared, "that, even if the present monarch or any of his successors should alienate or convey away to any person the lordships and castles which were the property of the crown, such a transaction, being contrary to the will of parliament, should not stand good in law; but that it should be permitted to the king for the time being to resume these lands into his own hands without the solemnity of any intervening process of law; and not only to resume them, but to insist that those who had unjustly occupied those royal estates should refund the whole rents and profits which they had received, till the period of their resumption by the crown." And that every possible precaution might be taken to prevent the violation of this solemn demand, it was finally enacted, "that the present king and his successors should be obliged to take an oath that they shall keep this statute and duly observe it in every particular."

After this enactment, a particular account is given of the lands and revenues belonging to the crown. Mention is first of all made of the customs of the kingdom, as they stood at the death of James I. Then follows a specific enumeration of the crown lands, among which we find the lordship of Etrick

Forest and the principality of Galloway, which had formed part of the extensive domains of the family of Douglas; the remainder of the forfeited estates of that formidable house having been divided among the nobles who assisted in suppressing the rebellion. The other chief territories recorded as belonging to the crown are the castle of Edinburgh, with the lands of Ballincrieff and Gosford, and all the other estates pertaining to the king within the sheriffdom of Lothian—the castle of Stirling, with the lands connected with it—the castle of Dunbarton, with the lands of Cardross, Roseneath and the pension from Cadyow, with the pension of the "ferme meill" of Kilpatrick—the whole earldom of Fife, with the palace of Falkland—the earldom of Strathern, with the rights belonging to it—the house and lordship of Brechin, with the services and superiority of Cortachy—the castles and lordships of Inverness and Urquhart, with the water mails, or rents, due for the fishings of Inverness—the lordship of Abernethy and the several baronies of Urquhart, Glenorchane, Bonnechen, Bonochar, Annache, Edderdail, Peety, Brachly and Strathern; and lastly, Redcastle, in the south-east of Rosshire, with the appended lordship of Ross.

It was also provided by the parliament, that all the regalities which at this time belonged to the king should be inalienably annexed to the royalty; and that in future no regalities should be granted without the sanction of the parliament. It was decreed that the important office of warden of the Borders, which had long been held by the house of Douglas, should henceforth cease to be hereditary; and that the wardens should have no jurisdiction in cases of treason, except where these were out of breach of the truce. It was also ordained that in future "no office should be given in fee or heritage, whilst such as had been so disposed of since the death of the late king were revoked and abolished; due care being taken that any price or consideration which had been advanced by the possessor should be restored"—a judicious and most important statute, which struck at the root of a grievous abuse, and was calculated to diminish the exorbitant power of the nobility. An exception, however, was made in favour of the wardenship of the march, bestowed upon the second son of the king, Alexander, Earl of March, and Lord of Annandale.* Various enactments were also passed for the arrest of false coiners and sorners, or sturdy vagrants, who were to be punished as thieves or robbers; and it was provided that for the settlement of petty suits a council of eight or twelve persons, according to the size of the town, should be appointed by the privy council. A curious sumptuary statute followed, prescribing with great minuteness of detail the particular dresses to be worn respectively by earls, lords of parliament commissaries of burghs, and advocates, or 'fore-speakers' at all meetings of parliament and general councils, under a heavy penalty to the king.†

At an adjourned meeting of the parliament, held at Stirling, on the 13th of October, preparations were made for the defence of the kingdom against any sudden invasion 'of their auld enemies of England,' and it was directed that watchmen should be stationed at all the fords of the Tweed between Roxburgh and Berwick, whose duty it was to give notice of the enemy, by lighting a beacon. Regulations were also enacted regarding the number of beacon-fires that were to be kindled, to make known the strength of the invading force, and the certainty or uncertainty of its approach. And minute arrangements were made, prescribing

the manner in which the inhabitants, not only of the border-districts and of Lothian, but also of Fife and Stirling, should be warned of the invasion. A subsequent statute ordered a guard of two hundred bowmen, and an equal number of spearmen, to be maintained on the east and west marches, at the expense of the Border lords; and a force of one hundred bows and one hundred spears, to be kept up for the defence of the west marches; while strict injunctions were issued to the Border barons to have their castles well garrisoned and provisioned, and their vassals in readiness to join the force under the command of the warden. The abstraction of any part of the general booty captured during a warden march, or invasion of England by the warden in person, or any theft of the plunder, or the prisoners belonging to the leaders or their men, was forbidden under the severest penalties; and it was declared that any person who should furnish supplies to the English garrisons of Roxburgh or Berwick, or give warning to the English of an intended invasion of the Scots, or undertake a private journey into England, without the king's or the warden's safe conduct, should be punished as a traitor, with the loss of life and estate.*

Meanwhile the tranquillity of the country was again threatened by the Earl of Douglas, who, after the battle of Arkinholme, had renewed his alliance with John, Earl of Ross and Lord of the Isles. This ocean prince, in consequence of the remoteness and inaccessibility of his territories, had hitherto escaped the vengeance which had fallen so heavily on his confederates, and he was now induced by Douglas to make another attempt to overturn the Scottish throne. Having collected a force of five thousand men, he embarked them on board a fleet of a hundred galleys, and gave the command of the whole to his near kinsman, Donald Balloch, Lord of Isla. This powerful chief, who had great influence not only in Scotland but in the north of Ireland, entered readily into the projects of Douglas, and, animated by hereditary antipathy against the royal family, he undertook a predatory incursion against the western coast of Scotland, and laid waste the country from Innerkip to Bute, the Cumrays, and the island of Arran. But, owing to the prudent precautions taken by the king to repel the invaders, the main object of the expedition was frustrated, and the loss sustained was by no means so great as might have been expected. In the words of a contemporary chronicler, "There was slain of good men, fifteen; of women, two or three; of children, three or four. The plunder included five or six hundred horse, ten thousand oxen and kine, and more than a thousand sheep and goats. At the same time they burned down several mansions in Innerkip around the church, harried all Arran, stormed and levelled with the ground the castle of Brodick, and wasted with fire and sword the islands of the Cumrays. They also levied tribute upon Bute, carrying away a hundred bolls of malt, a hundred marts,* and a hundred marks of silver.† The expedition concluded by a fierce attack on Lauder, Bishop of Lismore, a son of the baron of Balcomy, in Fife, who was obnoxious to the rude islanders, both as a stranger and as a supporter of the royal cause. The unfortunate prelate, who had three years before been plundered and maltreated by the rude inhabitants of his diocese, on the present occasion narrowly escaped with his life, while the greater part of his attendants were savagely murdered.‡

After the failure of the expedition of Donald Balloch, the Earl of Douglas returned to England, where he was cordially welcomed by his ally, the Duke of York, who, in consequence of the imbecility of Henry VI., was at this time regent of the kingdom, and received from him, as the reward of his services, the grant of an annual pension of five hundred pounds, "to be continued to him until he should be restored to his possessions, or to the greater part of them, by the person who then called himself the King of the Scots."§ Justly indignant at the gross insult, James sent a spirited remonstrance to the English monarch, complaining of the encouragement given by his government to a convicted traitor like Douglas, and warning him of the danger which he incurred by this attempt to foster rebellion, and to disturb the tranquillity of a friendly state.||

These representations, however, seem only to have had the effect of provoking the Yorkist faction to offer still farther indignities to the Scottish king; and, in reply to his letter, they transmitted to him the following foolish and insolent epistle:—"The king, to an illustrious prince, James, calling himself King of Scotland, sends greeting. We presume it to be equally acknowledged and notorious, that fealty and homage are due by the King of Scots to the King of England, upon the principle that it becomes a vassal to pay such homage to his superior and overlord; and that from times of so remote antiquity that they exceed the memory of man, even to the present day, we and our progenitors, kings of England, have possessed such rights, and you and your ancestors have acknowledged such a dependence. Wherefore, such being the case, whence comes it that the subject hath not scrupled insolently to erect his neck against his master? And what, think ye, ought to be his punishment, when he spurns the condition, and endeavours to compass the destruction of his person? With what sentence is treason generally visited? Or have you been so ignorant of all things as not to be aware of the penalties which await the rebel, and him who is so hardy as to deny his homage to his liege superior? If so, we would exhort you speedily to inform yourself upon the matter, lest the lesson should be communicated by the experience of your own person, rather than by the information of others. To the letters which have been presented to us by a certain person calling himself your lion-herald and king-at-arms, and which are replete with all manner of folly, insolence, and boasting, we make this brief reply:— It hath ever been the custom of those who fight rather by deceit than with open arms, to commit an outrageous attack, in the first instance, and then to declare war; to affect innocence, and shift their own guilt upon their neighbours, to cover themselves with the shadow of peace, and the protection of truces; whilst beneath this veil they are fraudulently plotting the ruin of those they call their friends. To such persons, whose machinations we cordially despise, it seems to us best to reply by actions. The repeated breaches of faith, therefore, which we have suffered at your hands; the injury, rapine, robbery, and insolence, which have been inflicted upon us, contrary to the rights of nations, and in defiance of the faith of treaties, shall be passed over in silence, rather than committed to writing; for we esteem it unworthy of our dignity to attempt to reply to you in your own fashion, by slanders and reproaches. We would desire, however, that in the mean season you should not be ignorant that, instead of its having the intended effect of inspiring us with terror, we do most cordially despise this vain confidence and insolent boasting, in which we have observed the weakest and most pusillanimous persons are generally the greatest adepts; and that you should be aware that it is our firm purpose, with the assistance of the Almighty, to put down and severely chastise all such insolent, rebellious, and arrogant attempts, which it hath been your practice contumeliously to direct against us. Wishing, nevertheless, with that charity which becomes a Christian prince, that it may please our Lord Jesus Christ to reclaim you from error, into the paths of justice and truth, and to inspire you for the future with a spirit of more enlightened judgment and counsel, we bid you farewell.*

This extraordinary letter, which furnishes an amusing specimen of the boasting which it professes to condemn, was followed by the renewal of hostilities on the Borders; and a desolating warfare was carried on between the two countries, which inflicted severe injuries upon both, and led to no important results. The Scottish monarch having received information from the borderers, that the important town of Berwick was weakly garrisoned, and might easily be taken by surprise, collected a numerous army, and made a rapid and secret march to the frontier. But an English fugitive, who had come into Scotland protected by a safe conduct, and had bound himself by an oath not to retire without the royal permission, broke faith with the king, and contrived to make his escape and to give the alarm. So that when James appeared before the town, he found the English on their guard, and was constrained to abandon the enterprise.*

About this period, Margaret, Countess of Douglas, widow of Earl William, who fell by the king's hand in Stirling castle, and wife of his successor, the banished earl, fled for protection to the Scottish court, and threw herself on the royal mercy, complaining of the misery which she had suffered from her forced and unnatural union with the brother of her first husband.† James, moved by her beauty and misfortunes, welcomed her with the utmost kindness and sympathy, and married her to his uterine brother, Sir John Stewart, on whom he soon afterwards conferred the earldom of Athol, and the forfeited barony of Balveny. The example of Margaret was followed by the Countess of Ross, the wife of the rebel earl of that name, and a daughter of Sir James Livingston, who implored the protection of the sovereign, against the harshness and cruelty of her husband, whom she had married through the persuasion of the king himself, in the hope that her influence might soften the disposition of the savage chief, and retain him in the royal interest. James received her with the courtesy due to her rank and claims, and assigned her an ample revenue for her maintenance.‡ About the same time, the Princess Annabella, sister to the king, whose intended marriage with Louis, the second son of the Duke of Savoy, had been broken off, returned to the Scottish court and was provided with a husband in George, second Earl of Huntley.

Meanwhile, the house of Lancaster having regained a temporary ascendancy in England, the warfare on the Borders began to languish, and the Scottish monarch, anxious to avail himself of this favourable opportunity to re-establish peace bea truce, which was ultimately concluded for two years, terminating on the sixth of July, 1459. But notwithstanding this termination of hostilities between the two kingdoms, the banished Earl of Douglas succeeded in assembling a considerable force, and, along with the Earl of Northumberland, made an inroad into the Merse of Berwickshire, and laid waste that fertile district with fire and sword. He was at length encountered, and totally defeated by the Earl of Angus; a thousand of the English were left on the field, and seven hundred were taken prisoners, and the merciless renegade was again compelled to take refuge in England. The Earl of Angus was rewarded for the important services he had rendered to the crown, by a grant of the lordship of Douglas, and the extensive estates appended to this dignity; and the numerous and powerful vassals of the Douglasses immediately recognized this rising noble as their chief. The imprudent liberality of the king thus rendered the house of Angus nearly as powerful and as formidable as the elder branch of the family had long been to the independence of the crown and the tranquillity of the kingdom. But probably the blame of this impolitic measure must be attributed not so much to the sovereign, as to the feudal constitution of the country, which left him no other way of securing the assistance and rewarding the services of the loyal barons, in the frequent struggles which took place between the aristocracy and the crown.

About this period, the tranquillity of the country was threatened by a dispute with the Norwegian court, respecting the payment of the money due by the Scottish king, for the Western Isles, and the little kingdom of Man. These islands had been purchased by Alexander III. in 1266, for the sum of five thousand marks, and in 1426, the treaty was renewed by James I., who agreed to continue the annual payment of a hundred marks to the Norwegian monarch. A complaint was now made by Christian, King of Norway, not only that a large amount of arrears was due, but that the Scottish authorities had violated the treaties between the two countries, by seizing and casting into prison the Lieutenant of Iceland, with his wife, and his attendants, who had been compelled by a storm to take refuge in one of the Orkney islands.* Fortunately for the welfare of both kingdoms, it was ultimately agreed to refer the dispute to the arbitration of their mutual friend and ally, Charles VII., of France; but his final decision was not pronounced till the year 1460.

The Scottish king thus freed from foreign quarrels and hostilities, devoted his attention to the important work of providing for the security of his kingdom, by cultivating the warlike character of his people, and carrying into effect various parliamentary enactments for the defence of the Borders against the attacks of England. In a meeting of the national council held at Edinburgh, on the 19th of October, 1456, various enactments were passed respecting the defence of the country, the value of the current coin, the administration of justice, and the 'governance of the pestilence,' which it appears was now for the fifth time desolating the kingdom. It was ordained, that all the subjects of the realm, possessed of lands or goods, should provide themselves with armour and weapons, according to the value of their property, and that on the first intelligence of an invasion, all the males between the ages of sixteen and sixty should hasten to join the muster, except those who were unable from extreme poverty to furnish themselves with weapons. It was also ordered, that every man worth twenty marks should furnish himself at least with a jack and sleeves, close to the wrist, or a pair of splints, together with a prickit-hat, a sword and a buckler, a bow and a sheaf of arrows, if he can procure them; if not, he was to have an axe and a targe, made either of leather or of wood, with two straps in the inside. The proper officers were instructed to warn the inhabitants of every county to provide themselves with the proper weapons, and to attend the 'weapon-schawing,' or armed muster before the sheriffs, bailies, or stewards of regalities, on the morrow after the 'lawe days of Christmas.' A curious enactment followed, which we give in the words of the statute. "It is thought speedful that the king make request to certane of the great burrowis of the land, that are of ony might, that they make carts of war, and in ilk cart twa guns, and ilk ane to have twa chambers with the remanent of the graith (tackling), that afferis thairto, and ane cunning man to shoot them; and gif they have no craft (skill) in the shooting of them, they may learn or the tyme come that will be needful to them."* It was declared to be the opinion of the parliament, that the defence of the Borders did not require to be provided for this season at the public expense, as the inhabitants of these districts were better able to defend themselves than at any former time, while their enemies were worse provided than before, having suffered great losses in the war during this summer, and will, it is hoped, experience the same cost and labour in the summer which is approaching.† With regard to the pestilence which was now committing its fearful ravages in the kingdom, an attempt was made to prevent the spread of this dreadful scourge, by shutting up the people for a season within their houses. It was declared, that no person who had provision enough to maintain himself and his servants should be expelled from his own residence, unless he will not remain in it; but should he refuse to keep himself in his own dwelling, he was to be expelled from the town. Those who were too poor to maintain themselves, or to remove their families from the town, were to be supported at the expense of the citizens, so that they might not wander through the kingdom, and carry infection, or 'fyle the countre about thame.' It was also directed, that those who attempted to escape from the station where they had been shut up, should be brought back and punished, and compelled to remain in durance. The houses which had been deserted as infected, or in which the whole inhabitants had died, were not to be burned, unless this could be done without injury to the neighbouring tenements; and finally, the bishops were directed to make general processions throughout their dioceses twice in the week, for the stanching of the pestilence, and to grant indulgences to the priests who exposed themselves by walking in these processions.*

The parliament then proceeded to take into consideration the important subject of the money and coinage of the kingdom. A previous meeting of the Three Estates, held at Stirling, in the year 1451, had passed an act fixing the value of the coins, both foreign and domestic, then current in Scotland, but it appears that this value had been found to be too low, so that the merchants and traders, discovering that the coins were worth more than the price fixed by parliament, had kept them up and exported them to other countries. To put a stop to this exportation of the precious metals, which seems to have been viewed with great alarm by the statesmen of this period, an act was now passed raising considerably the value of the current coins both of foreign countries and of home coinage.† It was also provided that in time of fairs and public markets goods and wares of so small a bulk as to be carried to the fair, either in the arms or on the backs of men, or on barrows and sledges, should be exempted from imposts, but that a temporary tax should be levied upon the proprietors of merchandise of a larger quantity and value; which however was to be restored to them, provided they had committed no trespass, nor excited any disturbance during the continuance of the fair.‡

Soon after this, the clemency of the king was implored by John, Lord of the Isles and Earl of Ross, the associate of the Earls of Douglas and Crawford in their formidable conspiracy against the throne. This turbulent chief, now finding himself alone in rebellion, became alarmed for the consequences, and sent a submissive message to his sovereign, entreating forgiveness, and promising the most devoted loyalty and obedience for the future. To this application James returned an ambiguous answer, neither wholly forgiving the suppliant nor yet shutting out all hope of pardon. "The Earl of Ross," he said, "did not deserve remission at his hands, for his many and aggravated offences against the state, but, as it became all men, especially kings and princes, to show mercy to the penitent, he was willing to extend forgiveness to the humbled rebel. It was the prerogative of God alone, however, to discern the inward thoughts and hearts of men; these could be made known to their fellow men only by outward tokens and signs. Now Ross had as yet given no proof of any change in his disposition. If therefore he wished his professions of penitence to be believed, he must evince his sincerity by repairing the injury done to the fortalices, villages, and towns which he had burned and destroyed, restoring the 'goods and gear' which he had plundered, and performing some notable exploit which might obliterate the memory of his former crimes." On these conditions he was to be absolved from the consequences of his rebellion, and reinstated in the royal favour.* By what 'notable exploit' the earl evinced the reality of his repentance has not been recorded, but his appointment, in 1457, to the important office of Warden of the Marches, and his presence in the royal army, three years later, at the siege of Roxburgh, with a body of three thousand of his vassals, sufficiently show that he had by some means or other succeeded in effecting a reconciliation with the king.

A meeting of the national council was held at Edinburgh, on the sixth of March, 1458, and, after lengthened deliberation, enacted a considerable number of judicious and important laws. The regulations adopted by the previous parliament, respecting the supreme court of judicature, were revised, and it was decreed that the committees of parliament for the administration of justice should consist of nine members, three being chosen from each Estate, and that they should sit three times in the year, for forty days at a time, in Edinburgh, Perth, and Aberdeen; but it was unwisely and unjustly ordered that the judges should defray their own expenses.† The parliament next proceeded to take measures for the defence of the country, and ordered 'weapon-sehawings,' or military musters of the whole fighting population of a district, to be held four times in the year. In order to encourage the practice of archery, the games of foot-ball and golf were peremptorily forbidden, and strict injunctions were issued, that, adjoining to each parish church a pair of butts should be erected, where shooting should be practised every Sunday; that every man was to shoot six shots at the least, and that if any person refused to attend he was to be amerced in the fine of two pence, to be given to those who came to the bow-marks, for drinking. maker, and 'a fledger,' or arrow-maker, who were to be furnished by the town with the requisite materials for their trade, so that every man within the parish, between the ages of twelve and fifty, should be furnished with his weapons, and practise shooting. The next subject to which the estates directed their attention, was the alleged impoverishment of the realm, by the sumptuous dresses of men and women, and the necessity of a revision of the laws against immoderate costliness in apparel. A curious sumptuary law was passed, regulating the dresses which ought to be worn by the different classes of the community, and enjoining all men within burghs, that lived by merchandise, to take especial care to make their wives and daughters to be habited in a manner correspondent to their estate.* Several praiseworthy statutes were enacted for the promotion of agriculture, and it was ordained that with regard to 'feu-farms' and other leases, the king should begin and set a good example to the rest of his barons, so that the tenants on estates in the hands of the crown, upon which leases had been granted, should not be removed, but remain upon the land, paying to the king the rent which had been stipulated during the currency of the lease. It was declared that all rights and privileges belonging to 'regalities' should be interpreted by the strictest law, and that every lord of regality, who abused his privileges, to the breaking of the king's laws and the injury of the country, should be rigorously punished.†

The parliament then proceeded to take into consideration the grievances arising out of the manner in which the itinerant chamberlain courts of the king were held, and peremptorily forbade the king's constables and other officers to levy any tax upon the merchants and tradesmen who brought their goods to market during the sitting of parliament, and of the session unless, the right of exaction belonged to the constable 'of fee,' for which he must show his charter.‡ The custom of entering into 'bands or leagues,' which had been productive of the most pernicious consequences to the prosperity of the country, was forbidden under the penalty of forfeiture of life and property. Lawless and 'wasteful persons' who seized other men's lands by force of arms were to be summarily expelled from the ground by the sheriff, or committed to the king's ward, on their refusal to obey his summons. All persons who attended the justice ayres or sheriff courts, whether barons, lords spiritual, or simple freeholders, were enjoined to come with their ordinary attendants, and to take care that on entering their inn or lodging they laid aside their harness and warlike weapons, using for the time nothing but their knives. When any persons at deadly feud happened to meet at such assemblies, —an incident which must have been of very frequent occurrence, the sheriff was directed to take pledges of both, binding them to keep the peace, and for the better maintenance of order among the great and mixed multitude which assembled at the period when the courts were held, the king's justice was commanded to seek out and apprehend all wasteful beggars, all idle sorners, all itinerant bards, and feigned fools, and either to banish them from the country, or commit them to the common prison. Dyers were forbidden to buy or sell cloth; and for the purpose of restricting the multitude of sailors, it was decreed that no persons should be allowed to sail or trade in ships but such as were of good reputation and ability, who should have at least three serplaits of goods, either belonging to themselves, or entrusted to them by others; and that those who traded by sea in merchandise ought to be freemen and indwellers within burghs.*

It appears that the operations of husbandry were neglected amid the almost incessant feuds by which the kingdom was distracted; hence the parliament found it necessary to issue injunctions that certain quantities of wheat, pease, and beans should be regularly sown by every tenant possessed of a plough and of eight oxen, and by every baron in his own domain, under the penalty of ten shillings for each offence. In consequence of the disappearance of the woods and forests of the country, all freeholders, both spiritual and temporal, were recommended to make it a provision in their leases, that their tenants should plant woods and trees, make hedges, and sow broom in places best adapted for these purposes.† Stringent regulations were made for the preservation of partridges, plovers, wild ducks, and such other birds and wild fowls as 'are gainful for the sustentation of man;' while, on the other hand, encouragement was given to all manner of persons utterly to extirpate all 'fowls of reiff,' such as erns, buzzards, gleds, mytalls, rooks, crows, wherever they might be found to build and harbour, and the whole population of each district were commanded to assemble three times in the year to hunt the wolf and the fox. The well-known statute of James I. against leasing-making, or the crime of propagating false reports between the king and the people—an enactment which afterwards became in the hands of the government an instrument of great oppression, was re-enacted and confirmed; as were also the statutes of the same monarch respecting the non-attendance of the smaller freeholders in parliament; the use of one common measure throughout the kingdom; the restriction of 'muir-burning' after the month of March, till the corn had been cut down; and the publicity to be given to the acts of the legislature by the sheriffs and commissaries of burghs.

The enactments of this important meeting of the Estates concluded with a peroration remarkable for the affectionate spirit, and the tone of honest freedom by which it is pervaded. "Since," it declared, "God of his grace had sent our sovereign lord such progress and prosperity that all his rebels and breakers of justice were removed out of his realm, and no potent or masterful party remained there to cause any disturbance, provided his highness was inclined himself to promote the peace and common profit of the realm, and to see equal justice distributed among his subjects; his Three Estates with all humility solicited and required his highness so diligently to devote himself to the execution of these acts and statutes above written that God may be pleased with him, and that all his subjects may address their prayers for him to God, and give thanks to their heavenly Father for his goodness in sending them such a prince to be their governor and defender.* It has been conjectured with great probability that in this solemn exhortation and prayer there is an allusion to the unjustifiable proceedings of James regarding the earldom of Mar, which had occasioned some unquiet surmisings in the minds of his nobility, that he possibly intended to imitate the designs of his father in seeking to augment the power of the crown at the expense of the rights and privileges of the aristocracy.†

In the short space of two years, the hopes so earnestly expressed by the estates were unhappily blighted, and Scotland was once more subjected to all the evils of a long minority. Amid his exertions to promote the peace and prosperity of his kingdom, James unwisely suffered himself to be entangled in the contests between the rival houses of York and Lancaster. The faction of the Yorkists had exhibited, throughout, an inveterate antipathy to the Scottish king, and by their intrigues with the Douglasses, and other rebel barons, had done everything in their power to disturb the tranquillity of the country. On the other hand, the Lancastrians had shown the utmost anxiety to cultivate the friendship of James, and to maintain the peace between the two kingdoms. In the year 1459,

Secret treaty with Henry VI. Henry the Sixth, for a brief period, regained the ascendancy, and succeeded in expelling his enemy, the Duke of York, from the kingdom. Shortly before this event James had despatched an embassy to England for the purpose of conferring with the English monarch upon certain 'secret matters' affecting their mutual interest, and at a private conference between the English and Scottish commissioners, it was agreed that the counties of Northumberland and

Durham, along with some adjoining districts which were anciently the property of the Scottish crown, should be transferred to James, on condition that he should assist the English monarch in his contest with his domestic foes.* In fulfilment of the terms of this secret treaty, the Scottish king assembled a numerous army in James invades the, month of August, 1459, and England. breaking across the English frontier, ravaged the country with fire and sword, and in the short space of a week destroyed seventeen towns and fortalices.† Henry soon found that the presence of the Scottish army in England was calculated to injure rather than to assist his cause, and sent a message to the camp of James, to inform him that he trusted to be able, in a short time, to put down his enemies without requiring the assistance of his ally, and requesting him therefore to withdraw his forces into his own kingdom; a request with which James readily complied. ‡

On the retreat of the Scottish army, the Duke of York and the Earl of Salisbury, Abortive expedition with other English nobles, led to the Duke of York. borders a body of more than forty thousand men; but owing to the dissensions amongst the leaders, they returned home without performing a single exploit.§ In the course of a few months, the civil war between the Yorkists and the Lancastrians broke out again with redoubled fury, and the desertion of the Duke of York by his army, at Ludlow, on the 14th of October, 1459, gave a temporary triumph to the party of the king. James lost no time in despatching the Bishops of Glasgow and Aberdeen, with the Abbots of Holyrood, Melrose, and Dunfermline, and the Lords Livingston and Avondale, as his ambassadors to the English court, to congratulate his ally on his success, and to renew the truce between the two kingdoms. But within the course of a few weeks the Yorkists gained a complete victory over their opponents, at Northampton, the unfortunate Henry was a second time taken prisoner, and the queen, with her son, Prince Edward, after many adventures, found refuge in Scotland.

James received the royal fugitives with the greatest cordiality, and treated them James prepares again to invade England. with the consideration due to their misfortunes and their rank. He immediately proceeded, in accordance with the terms of the recent treaty, to take measures for the assistance of his friend and ally, and with this view he issued writs for the assembling of an army, and commanded the Earl of Huntley, his lieutenant-general, to superintend the organization of the troops. The Scottish barons promptly obeyed the summons of a prince whom they respected and loved. Even John, the Lord of the Isles, eager to atone for his former crimes, and to prove himself worthy of the clemency and favour of his sovereign,

There can be no doubt that the claim of Erskine was just and legal, but by a verdict given in 1457, which was founded upon a gross perversion both of the facts of the case and of the ancient law of the country, the earldom was wrested from the hands of its lawful possessor and awarded to the king. appeared in the royal camp with a powerful body of his vassals, armed with shirts of mail, two-handed swords, bows, and battle-axes, and offered to take the vanguard of the army, and to march a mile before the main body, in their intended invasion of England, so as to encounter the danger of the first onset.* James, finding himself at the head of a powerful force, well provided with cannon and other warlike machinery, resolved to commence his campaign by attempting the reduction of the important border fortress of Roxburgh, which had remained in the hands of the English since the disastrous battle of Durham, and was now commanded by Lord Fauconberg, a relative of the famous Earl of Warwick, the King-maker, and the main pillar of the cause of the Yorkists.† This castle was strongly situated on an eminence, near the junction of the Teviot and the Tweed; and James, finding that the garrison, confiding in the strength of the fortress, were determined to offer a most strenuous resistance, resolved to proceed by a regular siege. He therefore established, on the north bank of the river Tweed, a battery of such rude pieces of ordnance as were constructed at that time, and caused them to play upon the castle. After the siege had lasted some time the Earl of Huntley arrived, with a gallant body of fresh troops, and the king, who entertained a peculiar regard for his faithful adherent, in company with the Earl of Angus and others of the nobility, conducted him to see the battery. One of the pieces of artillery was a huge gun of Flemish manufacture, rudely constructed of iron bars, girded with metal hoops, which were made fast by strong oak wedges, and as the king was standing in its vicinity, watching the effect of the discharges, the clumsy piece, which through the ignorance of the engineer had been overcharged, suddenly burst, and one of the wooden wedges unfortunately striking the king of remarkable talent and energy, in the prime of life, and exposed it to all the confusion and perils of a long minority, was deeply bewailed by all classes of the community. The combined wisdom and vigour which James displayed in the administration of public affairs—his zealous efforts to promote the agriculture and commerce of the country, and to protect the middle and lower classes of his subjects against the oppressions of the nobles—the success with which he had crushed the formidable rebellions that threatened the very existence of his throne,—the good sense which he displayed in choosing wise councillors, and in following their advice—the kindness of his disposition and the affability of his manners, gained him both the respect and esteem of his people, and entitled him to an eminent place on the roll of wise and good princes. That his natural temper was hasty and violent, was lamentably proved by his unjustifiable assassination of the Earl of Douglas; but his disposition was by no means implacable, and his clemency to the Earl of Crawford and the Lord of the Isles, in spite of their aggravated offences against his authority, sufficiently shows that he knew how to temper justice with mercy, and does equal honour to his judgment and to his heart. The person of James was vigorous and robust, and he is said to have excelled in manly and warlike exercises. His countenance was handsome and intelligent, but partly disfigured by a red spot which procured him among his contemporaries the name of 'James with the fiery face.' He left three sons—James, his successor; Alexander, Duke of Albany; and John, Earl of Mar; with two daughters—Mary, wedded to Lord Boyd, and subsequently to Lord Hamilton, and Margaret, who married Sir William Crichton, son of the Chancellor. Another son, named David, and a daughter, died in early infancy.

CHAPTER XX.

JAMES THE THIRD.

JAMES the Third was only seven years of age when the death of his father called him to the throne. His coronation, however, took place without delay. His mother, stifling her grief, to meet the sudden emergency in the spirit of the age, hastened with him to Roxburgh, where her chivalrous appeal to the troops, aided by the presence of their youthful sovereign, produced such an impression, that the siege was immediately renewed with enthusiasm; and the fortress surrendered, it is said, on the very day of her arrival in the camp. In the Coronation of James III. crowned at Kelso* with the usual solemnities. The court then returned to Holyrood, to perform the funeral rites of the late king; and the army taking the field again, reduced Wark castle, and terminated with honour a campaign which had opened so disastrously. Soon after, the parliament met, and was numerously attended, both by the loyal and by the turbulent of the nobility; the former desirous to provide against, and the latter eager to profit by, the evils consequent on the tender age of the king. The administration of the government during his minority was the principal matter requiring attention; and it was not settled without controversies which nearly terminated in violence and bloodshed. The claim of the queen-mother to the regency, and the tutelage of her son, received the support of a considerable party; but many of the proud barons could not brook the idea of submitting to the sway of a woman, though high-born, energetic, and able, as Mary of Gueldres was. The dispute was ultimately Appointment of a regency. Bishop of St. Andrews, with her in the guardianship of the young monarch, investing the Earl of Angus with supreme military power as lieutenant-general of the kingdom, and adding a small cabinet council, selected from among the partisans on both sides.† This arrangement was probably the best that could have been adopted in the existing circumstances of the country. At all events it wrought well: and harmony being restored, the vigour of the queen, the wisdom of the prelate, and the high martial reputation of Angus, made the commencement of the new reign fair and promising.

It may be questioned whether peace with neighbouring countries conduces to the stability of the throne during a minority, when the elements of intestine discord in a nation are so numerous and active as they then were in Scotland. But the rulers, at times, have scarcely the liberty of a choice. The wars of the Roses were still raging among the English with unabated virulence, and varying success. The late king had espoused the cause of the Lancastrians, and bound himself by a secret treaty to aid them against the house of York. The expedition in which he fell had been undertaken with this view, and his death drew the hearts of his mourning kinsmen and subjects with quickened sympathy towards Henry the Sixth. Nor had that feeble and unfortunate prince ever been in greater need of prompt and energetic assistance. The battle of Towton had terminated in the total defeat of his army, and compelled him to take refuge within the Scottish territories; where the spectacle of his misfortunes, and the influence of his high-spirited consort, Margaret of Anjou, made a powerful appeal in his favour, which he was prepared to confirm, by ceding to James the valuable frontier-towns of Berwick and Carlisle. Besides, Edward of York had been tampering with the loyalty of some of the Scottish nobles. By the aid of the exiled Douglas, he had induced the Earl of Ross, and others, to conclude a treaty with him, which contemplated the subjugation of Scotland under the English sceptre, and the investiture of the traitorous chiefs with the feudal sovereignty of the greater part of the realm.* In the face of all these considerations, Bishop Kennedy stood forward as the zealous advocate of peace. Convinced that the cause of Henry was well-nigh hopeless, and deprecating the expenditure of the national resources on a foreign war, when the authority of the new administration called loudly for support and enlargement at home, he urged his pacific counsels on his coadjutors in the government, and would gladly have persuaded them to seek a cessation of hostilities. But the position of affairs, and the martial temper of the nobility, proved too strong for him. The queen and Angus cast the weight of their influence into the preponderating scale, and it was resolved that the struggling house of Lancaster should continue to receive the countenance of the Scottish court, and, if occasion was presented, the succour of a Scottish army. Animated by this prospect, Margaret of Anjou, whose courage and energy had so often compensated for the imbecility of her husband, passed over to the continent, and after visiting her father, the King of Sicily, carried the tale of her calamities to the Duke of Bretagne, and Louis the Eleventh, at the court of France. Successful in her appeal to these potentates, she made her appearance again on the coast of Durham, with her exchequer replenished, and accompanied by an army of two thousand men, under the command of Sieur de Breze, the Seneschal of Normandy. Her landing was unopposed, and the principal strongholds of the district surrendered to her arms. But her rival was neither unprepared nor inactive. Hastening northwards with a large body of troops, Edward turned the tide of victory; and Margaret was compelled to take refuge in her ships, leaving the greater part of her adherents to defend themselves behind the fortifications of Bambergh and Alnwick. All this passed so rapidly, that the issue was decided before the Scottish auxiliaries could reach the scene of conflict. But Angus was not the man to retire and disband his army without attempting to strike a blow for the honour of his country, and in support of a cause which he had zealously advocated. His wardenship of the Marches had made him familiar with the tactics of border-warfare: and there were many under his command who loved nothing better than a raid into the lands of the Southron. With a chosen company, he swept across the country, appeared unexpectedly before the walls of Alnwick, and brought off the French troops, who had been left to garrison the town, from under the eyes of the astonished Yorkists.* This brilliant exploit seems to have been the last triumph of Earl of Angus. The doughty earl, who died soon after, leaving a son too young to succeed him in his military rank and influence.

The death of Angus was a serious loss to the war-party in Scotland; and other events occurred about the same time still more unfavourable to the interests of Henry. The reputation of Mary of Gueldres, the queen-mother, who was still in the prime of life, and possessed of great personal attractions, began to suffer in connexion with the names of the Duke of Somerset,† and Hepburn, of Hailes,‡ ancestor to that Earl of Bothwell who brought so dark a cloud over the good name of another more beautiful and more unfortunate Mary. Her partiality for the house of Lancaster also was weakened by the intrigues of the celebrated Earl of Warwick, who came as the ambassador of the victorious Edward, to flatter her with a proposal of marriage from that accomplished prince. At length her sudden death, on the sixteenth of November, 1463,§ threw the whole power into the hands of Bishop Kennedy, who found it an easy matter, after the departure of Henry, and his disastrous defeat at Hexham, to carry out the pacific policy for which he had constantly laboured. Negotiations were opened without delay, and a truce was concluded between commissioners from the two kingdoms. The capture of the Duke of Albany, the eldest brother of James, by an English vessel, while he was on his way to Guelderland, under a safe conduct from Edward, threatened to interrupt the friendly compact almost as soon as it was established. But the danger passed by. Kennedy assumed an attitude of resolute resistance, his peremptory demands procured the speedy release of the prince, and the truce was finally ratified for a period of fifteen years.||

Meanwhile the seditious spirit, fomented by Edward in the wild north-western districts of the country, had broken out in a revolt, which, after assuming a serious aspect, had terminated without shaking the stability of the government. Donald, Earl of Ross—Rebellion of the Earl of Ross— and Lord of the Isles, obtaining possession of Inverness by stratagem, had assumed the state as well as the title of an independent sovereign, and marching southwards with a considerable army, had ravaged the lands of the Earl of Athole as far as Blair castle, which he attacked and stormed. If he had been seconded by an invasion on the side of England, under the conduct of the Earl of Douglas, as had been stipulated in their secret treaty with the Yorkist prince, the throne of James would have been in imminent danger. But Douglas had not the means in his own hand; and Edward failed to supply them, either because his affairs at home required all his attention and forces, or because he had resolved to try the effect on the mind of the queen-mother of a more wily and less hazardous policy. The insurgent islander was left to his own resources, and speedily lost the advantage which his rapid and merciless inroad had gained. His downfall is said to have been accompanied by tokens of the wrath of heaven, consequent upon a sacrilegious act, which he committed in the pride and power of conquest. The chapel of St. Bride, in the neighbourhood of Blair, then enjoyed the reputation of distinguished sanctity. Thither Athole had fled when his castle was taken; but the excited passions of the victor were as deaf to the terrors of superstition, as to the dictates of humanity. Violating the sanctuary, he seized the persons of the earl and his countess, transported them to a dungeon in one of the Hebrides,* and even attempted to destroy the sacred edifice in which they had vainly sought shelter. From that time forward misfortune tracked his footsteps, notwithstanding a humiliating and painful penance performed by him at the shrine which he had outraged. His fleet was shattered by a fearful tempest; the greater part of his booty —his overthrow and miserable fate. went down into the depths of the sea; he was compelled to liberate his prisoners without ransom; distraction and remorse unhinged his reason, and he retreated to spend a few miserable years at Inverness, and to perish there by the dagger of an assassin.†

In 1466, died James Kennedy, Bishop of St. Andrews; and Scotland mourned the loss of her ablest and most upright counsellor. Death of Bishop Kennedy. The great influence which he had so long exercised in the kingdom may have been owing, in some degree, to his high birth, and the magnificence which he exhibited on all public occasions. But it had a better and more stable basis in the simplicity of his private life, his unquestionable probity and patriotism, and his distinguished reputation as an ecclesiastic, a scholar, and a statesman. An old chronicler calls him 'vondrous godlie and wyse, weill learned in divine sciences, and in the civill lawis,'—an encomium not unmerited by one who seems to have outshone in learning and piety his brethren of the episcopate, as much as he excelled in integrity and prudence his coadjutors in the government. Sensible of the abuses which had crept into the church, he ruled his diocese with resolute fidelity; visiting regularly the various parishes under his inspection, and urging upon the inferior clergy the conscientious discharge of all their pastoral functions. Nor was he less anxious to promote other interests nearly connected with the national prosperity. The story of a wonderful ship, which he caused to be constructed for trading purposes, and on which he is said to have expended an immense sum, may be taken as an indication of his desire to foster the industrial arts and commerce of the country; while the College of St. Salvador's, which he founded at St. Andrews, and richly endowed out of his episcopal revenues, furnished a more lasting memorial of his zeal in the patronage of education and literature. But it was chiefly as a statesman that he rendered important service to his king and country. Gifted with a strong intellect, which he had improved by study, and furnished with stores of useful knowledge, he brought to the conduct of political affairs other qualifications, then more rare and always more valuable. Moderate in his views, firm of purpose, upright, public-spirited, zealous for peace, averse to intrigue and faction, he had effectually aided James II. in many a critical conjuncture; and he did more than any other man in the realm to benefit the throne and the nation during the minority of his successor.*

For some time previous to the death of Bishop Rize of the Boyd Kennedy, Robert, Lord Boyd, family. High Justiciar of Scotland, had been secretly working his way to prominence and power in the state. Taking advantage of his frequent access to the royal presence in the discharge of his official duties, and aided by the address of his brother, Sir Alexander Boyd, of Duchol, whose knightly reputation and skill in military exercises had preferred him to the superintendence of that department of the young king's education, the ambitious baron had insinuated himself into the good graces of James, whose disposition was peculiarly susceptible of flattery and favouritism. Having further strengthened his family influence by a close alliance with some of the leading members of the nobility, he was on the watch for a suitable opportunity of seizing the supreme administrative authority, when the death of the bishop removed the only remaining obstacle from his path. He at once determined to get possession of the royal person; and this he speedily effected, by an act in unison with the rude and lawless temper of the times. The king was at Linlithgow, presiding in a session of his Exchequer Court, when Boyd, with a strong band of his confederates and retainers, appeared before the palace, entered the council-chamber in the middle of the deliberations, and broke up the assembly, by carrying off James to Edinburgh. There seems to have been no remonstrance or opposition to this outrage, except on the part of Lord Kennedy, elder brother of the deceased bishop; but his interposition was in all likelihood merely to save appearances, for he, as well as Lord Livingston, the chamberlain, whose office devolved upon him the guarding of the Exchequer Court, was bound to the interests of the Boyds by a previous compact of mutual aid and advancement.* The audacity of the deed, however, and its treasonable character, were too flagrant to be passed over without some semblance of reparation. At an early meeting of the parliament, the offender, kneeling before the throne, intreated an indemnity, which he easily obtained.† The king having declared that he left Linlithgow with his own free will, a formal pardon was made out under the great seal; and by a further enactment of the assembly, Boyd was legally confirmed in the power which he had usurped, being appointed governor of the king and his two brothers. Not long after, he also obtained the control of the public revenues, by procuring his investiture with the office of lord chamberlain, and put the copestone on his family honours by marrying his son and heir to the Princess Mary, the king's eldest sister; the bridegroom being created Earl of Arran, and gifted with large estates in several of the western and midland counties.

The meeting of parliament in October, 1466, which proved so lenient to the crime of Lord Boyd, and so subservient to his ambitious designs, passed various enactments for the regulation of the trade and commerce of the country. With reference to the church, while its general privileges were ratified, the old law, forbidding Englishmen to hold livings in Scotland, was revived, and some regulations were adopted to restrict pluralities, and the purchase of benefices. On account of the scarcity of coin, it was decreed, that no money should be taken out of the kingdom, except in the case of travellers, who were permitted to carry with them what was sufficient for their necessary expenses. Merchants who exported hides and wool, were enjoined to bring to the mint a proportionate amount of silver, for which a certain price would be allowed; and it was resolved that a new coinage of copper farthings should be issued, to supersede the rude old custom of cutting the silver penny into quarters. For the repression of feuds and outrages in the land, it was ordered, that castles held against the king, or his eldest brother, the Duke of Albany, should be reduced by force, unless immediately surrendered on a royal summons; and that heavy fines should be exacted from guarantees, if assault were committed on person or property by those for whom they had given pledge. At a subsequent meeting, in January, 1467, some laws were added for the regulation of commerce. None but freemen of burghs were to have the right of engaging in foreign trade,—an exception being made however in favour of the nobility and clergy, who might sell abroad the produce of their own lands. Artisans were excluded from mercantile pursuits, unless they had previously and wholly abandoned their handicraft. Shipmasters were forbidden to put to sea during winter, or to take a freight without a written agreement; by which they bound themselves to have their vessels properly manned, to make good all loss resulting from careless or insufficient stowage, to supply their merchant-passengers with water, fire, and salt, while at sea, and to refer all cases of dispute with their employers to the burgh-court of the town to which the vessel was chartered. The ports of France and Norway were declared open to the Scottish traders, but those of the Netherlands were interdicted, with the exception of Middleburgh. It would appear from this last-mentioned enactment, that an unfriendly feeling existed at the time between the Scottish court and Charles of Burgundy, who then held the sovereignty of the Low Countries. The cause and extent of the misunderstanding are not exactly known; but it cannot have been very serious, as the act of parliament refers to intended negotiations for the purpose of putting the trade between the two kingdoms on a better footing.*

James was now approaching an age, which drew the serious attention of the state-councillors to the question of his marriage; and a chain of previous events clearly indicated with which of the royal families of Europe a matrimonial alliance might be most advantageously formed.

Christiern, King of Denmark and Norway, had been insisting for many years on the payment of a sum due to him from Scotland on account of the Hebrides, the sovereignty of which had been ceded by one of his predecessors to the Scottish crown for an annual quit-rent of one hundred marks. In 1456 the matter had been referred to the arbitration of the King of France; the arrears and fines being estimated by Christiern at more than four hundred thousand marks; while it was urged on the part of James II. that the debt was proscribed and the claim void by desuetude. Various delays having occurred, it was not till 1460 that the umpire, unable to obtain a sight of the original documents, recommended an amicable adjustment of the dispute by a marriage between the heir of the Scottish crown and Margaret, daughter to the King of Norway. The proposition was favourably entertained by the commissioners on both sides; and although the sudden death of James II. before Roxburgh prevented a formal ratification of the compact, enough had been done to preserve a friendly understanding between the two courts, till the prince and princess reached a marriageable age. Such was the position of affairs in 1468, when the chancellor, Lord Evandale; the grand almoner, Martin Vans, and Thomas Boyd, Earl of Arran, with the Bishops of Glasgow and Orkney, were appointed by the parliament to repair to Norway, and renew the suspended negotiations respecting the proposed alliance. They found Christiern ready to give the hand of his daughter to their king; nor did he make any objection to renounce at the same time all claim to past arrears and future tribute for the Hebrides. Their commission, however, included another matter, which required more delicate and careful management. Orkney and Shetland belonged to Norway, but the earldom of these isles had passed by marriage into the Scottish family of St. Clair, or Sinclair. Occasional disputes could hardly be avoided under this arrangement; and it may have been doubtful at times whether the feudal baron, in the event of a war, would choose to endanger his possessions and honours in his native land, by rendering military service to the Norwegian crown, or prefer to risk the loss of his Northern earldom by marshalling his retainers under the opposite banner. Peace, however, had been maintained between the two countries, and had proved highly beneficial to Scottish interests. The Sinclairs clung firmly to their national partialities; many of their countrymen were induced by their influence to settle in their insular domains, and the population there had generally acquired a strong bias in favour of the Scottish kingdom, with which they seemed to be also naturally connected by local proximity. Accordingly the commissioners entrusted with the settlement of the royal marriage were instructed to negotiate with the Danish monarch respecting these islands, that the cession of them might be included in his daughter's dowry. Christiern, with all his liberality of spirit and desire for the proposed union, hesitated to part with territories of such extent and value; but the terms to which he ultimately agreed issued in the annexation of these islands to the Scottish crown. The portion of the bride was fixed at sixty thousand florins, in addition to the relinquishment of the long-pending claim on the Hebrides; and as the exhausted state of the Danish exchequer could only furnish two thousand florins, the Orkneys and Shetland were pledged for the remainder, which was never paid, so that the islands have thenceforward belonged to Scotland.* Meanwhile the winter had come on, and as it was not thought proper to expose the princess to the perils of a voyage during the stormy months, the ambassadors returned alone. But the following spring saw the Earl of Arran again at the Danish court, with a gallant retinue of Scottish nobles, to do honour to their future queen; and in the month of July, 1469, the 'Maiden of Norway' landed at Leith in the presence of an immense crowd of spectators, and amid the general rejoicings of the nation. The

The marriage of the king followed, and gave occasion to prolonged festivities in the metropolis, and plentiful congratulations throughout the kingdom. Nor was the flattering welcome undeserved by the queen; in the bloom of youth and beauty, amiable and virtuous, educated in all the feminine accomplishments of the age, and so richly dowered, she brought as valuable an accession of lustre to the court, as of territory to the kingdom.*

The influence of the Boyds was now in the last stage of its decline. Their ambition and arrogance had rendered them objects of dislike to many of the nobles, and they had found the favour of the inexperienced and capricious monarch too feeble a prop to sustain their overgrown power. During the absence of the Earl of Arran in Denmark, his father and uncle had been unable to stem the tide of opposition which then set in with increased force against their ascendancy,—and when he arrived in the Frith of Forth with the royal bride, the prejudices awakened against him had become so obvious and powerful that he did not venture to land. Warned of his danger by his wife, the Princess Mary, he escaped with her to the continent, and avoided by a voluntary exile the personal injury to which he was exposed. His flight only hastened the downfall of his relatives. The aged lord justiciar, after a vain attempt to retrieve his fortune by arms, took refuge in England, where he soon afterwards died. Sir Alexander Boyd was brought to trial on a charge of treason, for the part which he had taken in the seizure of the king's person at Linlithgow, and, notwithstanding the formal pardon granted under the great seal, was found guilty and executed.† The fate of Arran is not so well known. He seems to have attacked himself to the Duke of Burgundy, and to have acquired considerable distinction in the service of that prince. But he did not long survive his banishment from his native country. His large estates and numerous titles were transferred to the eldest sons of the Scottish monarchs; and his wife, recalled from the continent by her royal brother, and compelled to submit to a divorce, was re-married to Lord Hamilton, whose descendants became by this alliance the nearest heirs to the crown of Scotland.‡

The parliament which was convened, 20th Nov. Laws enacted by 1469, to give a legal sanction to the parliament. the proceedings against the Boyds, made some additions to the statute-book of the kingdom. The following were the principal laws passed in this and in the following parliament, held on the 6th of May, 1471.—The officers of justice were empowered to seize manslayers, who had fled to sanctuary, that they might be brought to trial before a jury and punished according to their guilt.

Insolvent debtors, whose lands had been brought to a judicial sale, were to have the right of redeeming them within seven years. The property of a tenant was not to be liable for his landlord's debts, except to the amount of the rent due by him at the time. The provosts, baillies, and councillors of burghs were to continue in office for a year, and to have the privilege of nominating and appointing their successors. The church was empowered to elect its dignitaries, but the clergy were forbidden to collect for the papal treasury more than the usual statutory tax, or to seek from the papal court the gift of any benefice which had not been previously at its disposal. Judges were enjoined to be considerate of the poor, and to grant them in all cases an impartial measure of protection and justice. An attempt was also made to encourage and improve the fisheries, by ordering certain of the nobles and wealthy ecclesiastics, together with some towns, to equip efficient vessels for that important branch of the national resources—but this act was left incomplete, and speedily sank into oblivion. One part also of the enactments respecting the church soon became a dead letter: within two or three years the monks at Dunfermline having exercised their privilege of choosing a successor to their deceased abbot, the king, instigated it is said by a pecuniary bribe, annulled the election, made another appointment, obtained its ratification from the pope, and thenceforward claimed the prerogative of nominating all the superior ecclesiastical dignitaries.*

Freed from a control which he had latterly felt to be irksome, and roused to manlier thoughts by his happy marriage, the young king, though he had not yet reached his majority, began to assume a more prominent position in the government, and to discharge in his own person many of the functions of royalty. But elegance of form and a refined taste, both of which he possessed, were very inadequate qualifications for the rule of a martial nation in unsettled times. He had no proper conception of the regal prerogatives and responsibilities, no wise discernment of the national wants and dangers; and even if his political plans had been formed on sounder and more comprehensive principles, he would in all likelihood have sadly failed in the execution of them, for his facile and fickle temper, joined to his avarice and love of pleasure, were destructive of that energy and perseverance, without which no great and arduous enterprise succeeds. Patrick Graham, the successor of Kennedy in the bishopric of St. Andrews, was one of the first who had bitter reason to lament these serious defects in the character of his sovereign. This learned and virtuous prelate, anxious to vindicate the independence of the Scottish church, which, having no primate of its own, was claimed by the Archbishop of York as subject to his jurisdiction in matters ecclesiastical, had visited Rome and procured from the pope a bull, erecting his see into an archbishopric, and constituting him metropolitan, papal nuncio, and legate a latere in Scotland. His character and position marked him out as the fittest person to enjoy these prerogatives, which he had sought not less on public than on private grounds; but he could not help feeling that he occupied an insecure position, and he had lingered for some time on the continent, hesitating to make known the results of his mission in his native country. The event justified his apprehensions; no sooner had he returned home and assumed his honours, than a spirit of bitter envy and opposition broke out violently against him. Though the inferior clergy rejoiced in his advancement, the dignitaries of the church became his inveterate enemies, and they found a clever and unscrupulous partizan in William Schevez, Archdeacon of St. Andrews, who had a private pique against his diocesan, and was prepared to push the matter to the most violent extremities. The dispute being ere long brought under the king's cognisance, the course adopted by James was neither a wise nor an honourable one. Accepting a bribe from the discontented bishops, and giving way to the resentment which they excited in his bosom, by charging Graham with an infringement of the royal prerogative, in having applied to the papal court without his license, he drove the archbishop into a state of degradation and indignity, which rapidly shortened the days of the unfortunate prelate, and bestowed his honours upon the able, but unprincipled and profligate Schevez.*

At this period, proposals were made for the renewal of pacific relations with the English court, which, fortunately for the interests of both countries, were ultimately brought to a successful termination. The battle of Tewkesbury had seated Edward the Fourth firmly on the English throne; and his designs with respect to France made it important for him to secure the friendship, or at least the neutrality, of James in the anticipated struggle. This object at first threatened to be difficult of attainment, for the politic Louis had anticipated him by the mission of the Sieur Conersault to Scotland, for the purpose of persuading James to invade the county of Brittany, which he promised to assign to the Scottish crown;† and a levy of six thousand men was already ordered there for the conquest and occupation of that province, to which the ambitious views of the English monarch were particularly directed. But an influential party among the Scottish barons and prelates threw impediments in the way of the projected expedition;‡ and Edward, taking advantage of the consequent delay, stepped in with an offer which appealed not less powerfully to the cupidity of James than to his patriotism. The proposal of the English king was, that his youngest daughter Cecilia, then in her fourth year, should be betrothed to the Prince Royal of Scotland, an infant only two years old; and that her dowry of twenty thousand marks should be paid by annual instalments, commencing from the date of the contract. On this basis a peace was concluded, the ceremony of its ratification being performed, along with that of the betrothal, in the church of the Gray Friars, at Edinburgh, where the Earl of Lindsay and Lord Scrope appeared as the representatives of their respective sovereigns.

Meanwhile, John Earl of Ross and Lord of the Isles, undeterred by the miserable fate of his father, and by his own solemn promise of submission to the authority of the crown, thinking this a favourable opportunity to pursue his ambitious schemes, had renewed his confederacy with the banished Earl of Douglas, and entered into a treasonable league with the English court, by which he became the sworn vassal of Edward, and agreed to assist him in all his wars. As soon as the terms of this nefarious treaty came to light, it was determined by the Scottish government to proceed against Ross, as an avowed traitor and rebel. He was accordingly summoned to appear before the parliament to be held in Edinburgh, in December, 1475, to answer for his numerous acts of rebellion committed in 1455 and 1461, as well as for his more recent intrigues with the enemies of his country. Having failed to obey the summons, a sentence of forfeiture was immediately passed against him, and an order issued for the equipment of a strong naval and military force under the Earls of Crawford and Athole, for the purpose of assailing the rebel chief, both by sea and land, in his insular and mountainous strongholds. He had sufficient prudence however to avoid the hopeless contest; and by a timely submission he saved the lordship of the Isles, but not the earldom of Ross; which, with his other dignities and estates on the mainland, was taken from him and annexed to the crown.

This was almost the last act that reflected any honour and advantage on the administration of James III. In 1477, he attained his full majority of twenty-five, and the whole of the regal authority passed into his own hands. But the defects of his character were of a kind which commonly increase with the augmentation of liberty and influence. Sacrificing to his taste for the fine arts, and his love of adulation, the time and attention which he owed to the responsibilities of his office and the interests of his kingdom, he withdrew himself more and more, not only from the stirring exercises of the chase and the tilting-yard, but also from the graver duties of the cabinet and the council-room, to spend his time in the society of ignoble favourites, who speedily acquired an influence in the realm, to which they had no title by hereditary rank, and as little claim on the ground of personal merit.

Cochrane, an architect; Rogers, a musician; Torphichen, a fencing-master; Andrews, an astrologer; Hommil, a tailor; and Leonard, a smith, were the principal persons on whom he bestowed such an injudicious and dangerous preference. A high-spirited and arrogant nobility could not but feel the slight thus put upon them: alienated from their sovereign, they attached themselves to his brothers, the Duke of Albany and the Earl of Mar, who were distinguished by their brave and active disposition, their delight and skill in military exercises, their open-handed generosity, and the splendid array of friends and retainers with which they surrounded themselves. Hence arose jealousies and contentions in the royal family, which issued ere long in the exile of Albany, the death of Mar, and the bitter mortification which James experienced at Lauder. For some time, however, the kindled spark smouldered among the embers without awakening any anxiety, or indeed, attracting much attention. Various measures were adopted for composing the feuds which still existed among the leading families of the nobility and gentry; and an attempt was also made to strengthen the foreign relations of the kingdom by marrying the Duke of Clarence, brother of the English king, to the Princess Margaret, James' youngest sister, and the Duke of Albany to the Duchess of Burgundy, whose husband had recently fallen at Nancy. At length, the king's jealousy of the popularity acquired by his brothers, and his fear of the treasonable designs which he suspected them of cherishing, became so strong, that he ordered their arrest. Albany was put in ward in the castle of Edinburgh, and Mar found a prison in the castle of Craigmillar. There is no evidence that these princes had as yet entertained designs inconsistent with their allegiance. Certainly they had not, up to this period, been guilty of any overt act of rebellion. The intrigues of the Homes and Hepburns, who were dissatisfied with some of Albany's proceedings in his wardenship of the eastern Marches, the illwill of the royal favorites towards the powerful princes, who were known to be strongly dissatisfied with their influence at court; and the predictions of an astrologer, who had practised upon the superstitious credulity of James by foretelling that the lion would be devoured by his whelps, seem to have precipitated a measure of imprudent and unjustifiable severity, which afterwards bore bitter fruits of disquietude and danger.

Albany effected his escape from his prison in a manner highly characteristic of his daring spirit. The captain of a small trading vessel, laden with French wines, cast anchor in the Frith of Forth, near the quiet port of Newhaven, and landed two casks of Malmsey as a present to the imprisoned duke. These being admitted into his chambers without examination were found to contain a coil of rope, and a paper of instructions, enclosed in a cake of wax, exhorting him to lose no time in making his escape, as his enemies were resolved to put him to death. The duke did not hesitate to avail himself of the mode of escape thus pointed out to him, though surrounded with considerable difficulty and danger. Inviting the captain of the guard to sup with him, he and his chamberlain succeeded in reducing both the officer and the three soldiers, who kept watch in the outer room, to a helpless state of intoxication, in which they were easily overpowered and secured, or, according to some accounts, slain. The fugitives then made their way, unnoticed, to a sequestered part of the outer wall, and prepared for their descent. The darkness, however, prevented them from seeing that the rope was too short; and the trusty attendant, claiming the first trial, slid down to the lower end, and letting himself drop to the ground, had his leg broken by the fall. With wonderful self-possession and hardihood, Albany at once returned to his sleeping apartment, took the sheets from his bed, and knotting them to the end of the rope, effected his descent in safety. His first care was to convey his disabled chamberlain to a friendly shelter; after which he hastened to the shore, and on making the preconcerted signal, was taken on board the vessel which had brought him the means of deliverance, and set sail for the castle of Dunbar. This fortress, however, had been invested by the royal troops; and as there was no probability of its long resisting the siege, the duke was speedily compelled to flee to France, where he was hospitably received at the court of Louis, and treated with the distinction due to his rank. A different fate befel his younger brother, the Earl of Mar, who was accused of having employed magical arts to accomplish the king's destruction. He was not brought to a public trial, and some uncertainty has been cast on the closing scene of his brief career. It is asserted by Lesley and Buchanan, that he mysteriously death was secretly removed from Craigmillar to a house in the Canongate of Edinburgh, and placed in a hot bath with his veins opened, where he bled to death—this unusual mode of execution being, it is said, the result of his own choice.* But a different and more probable account is given by Drummond of Hawthornden, on the authority of Bishop Elphinstone. According to his version of this mysterious transaction, Mar, being attacked with fever, was removed to Edinburgh, and placed under the care of a physician, who prescribed bleeding and the hot-bath for the disease; and the unfortunate earl, being neglected by the attendants, tore off the bandages from the lancet-wounds, in his delirium, and expired from loss of blood before the fatal act was detected.†

volved in considerable obscurity. It will be readily imagined that the French monarch was far from unwilling to see the strife rekindled, for he had reason to fear that the peace which he had concluded with Edward a short time before, stood on no secure basis, and would be readily overthrown by the latter, at the first favourable opportunity. To divert the thoughts of the English prince from foreign conquest, by the necessity of defending himself against the incursions of a less distant foe, accorded with the line of policy which Louis loved to pursue; and it seems that the mission to Scotland (A.D. 1479), of Dr. Ireland, a learned ecclesiastic, of Scottish extraction, who had been educated in France, was designed, not only to plead for the pardon of the Duke of Albany, but also to sow the seeds of renewed hostility between James and his southern neighbour. The ambassador was courteously received, but it may be doubted whether the influence of France, so soon after the honourable treatment of the refugee duke in that country, would have been sufficiently powerful with the Scottish court to produce another war with England, if the way had not been paved for a rupture by the conduct of the English monarch himself. He had ceased to remit the annual instalments of the dowry which he had promised with his daughter Cecilia, on her betrothal to the Prince Royal of Scotland; he had also returned an evasive answer to the proposal of marrying his sister, the Duchess of Burgundy, to the Duke of Albany, and his brother Clarence to the Princess Margaret; nor was a subsequent project for the union of this princess with the Earl of Rivers likely to reach a more favourable termination, although the negotiations had gone so far that the passports of the bride were made out, and a sum of money voted by the Scottish parliament, to defray the expenses of the nuptials. The cordiality of the friendship between the two governments being thus shaken, the immediate occasion of hostilities was probably furnished by disputes among the borderers, whose restless national antipathies, and inveterate habits of marauding, made them ever ready to break through the restraint of treaties, and eagerly to welcome every opportunity of resuming their favorite pursuits of war and plunder. It is more certain that the first ostensible military movements were on the Scottish side: in 1480, the Earl of Angus crossed the Marches, attacked and burnt Bamfborough, ravaged hastily the adjacent districts, and carried off a large spoil of prisoners and property from the surprised and unresisting Northumbrians.

The die was now cast, and James prepared for the consequences. At a meeting of parliament, held in the month of April, 1481, instructions were issued, ordering that all lieges liable to military duty should hold themselves in readiness for immediate service; directing the wardens of the marches and the commandants of fortresses, without delay to put the frontier and the sea-board into an efficient state of defence; and making particular provision, by a tax of seven thousand marks, for the security of the town of Berwick, which was likely to be one of the first and most important points of attack.* But the Scottish forces did not take the field in earnest until an envoy had been sent to Edward, to remonstrate with him on account of the aid which he was granting to Burgundy against France, and to offer an adjustment of the border grievances on the principle of mutual acknowledgment and redress. This overture was treated by the English monarch with frigid and insulting indifference. Having appointed his brother, the Duke of Gloucester, his lieutenant-general, in the north, and taken measures to weaken the hands of the enemy at home, by opening negotiations with the Lord of the Isles and the Duke of Albany, Edward was willing to try once more the fortune of war: and his army was already under marching orders, with a special view, in the first instance, to the capture of Berwick. The collision being thus inevitable, both parties prepared for the conflict with considerable spirit; but the season passed without important successes on either side. The Scottish army as it entered England, was met by the papal legate resident in that country, who denounced and forbade, on pain of excommunication, the infringement of the European peace, at a time when Christendom was threatened by the impetuous Turkish hordes, whose shouts of triumph over the fall of Otranto had already wakened ominous echoes in the Vatican.† It was the obvious interest of James to disregard this mandate. If he had pushed on resolutely he might have secured important advantages before the forces of his adversary could traverse the longer distance which separated them from the scene of conflict. But both he and his followers were too much under Romish influence to venture on such a step; and he consented to disband his troops, expecting that the English would find themselves similarly constrained to abandon for the time their hostile intentions. Edward, however, had no such design: the interposition of the papal legate is said to have been merely a stratagem of his, for the purpose of gaining time and disconcerting the measures of the enemy. At all events, his army continued to advance, and entering the Scottish territories, committed some devastations, though not of a very important character; while a fleet of English ships appeared in the Frith of Forth, burned the village of Blackness, captured a few vessels, and would have inflicted more serious injuries on the shipping and the coast, if it had not been defeated and driven off by Andrew Wood, of Leith, a rising officer, whose name, better known under the subsequent title of Sir Andrew Wood of Largo, is associated with many daring and gallant exploits in the naval warfare of his country.

In the following year the intrigues of Edward effected more for him than his arms. The Scottish parliament indeed, which met in March, displayed a zealous spirit of loyalty, designating the English monarch a usurper and a robber, recording their resolution to stand by their own sovereign to the death, and enlarging their former ordinances to call forth the military resources of the nation in full efficiency. But the attachment of some of the leading barons to James was far from strong; and his rival hazarded little by making their lingering attachment to the Duke of Albany the means of alienating their zeal for the prosecution of the war. That nobleman, having married in his exile a daughter of the Count D'Auvergne, had at first built his hopes on the good offices of the French monarch; but the early death of his wife, and the obvious interest of Louis to maintain friendly relations with the Scottish court, speedily convinced him of the vanity of expecting effective aid from that quarter, and he now threw himself into the arms of Edward, who gladly welcomed him to England, persuaded him to aim at the acquisition of his brother's throne, and artfully shifted to this new ground his ostensible reason for prosecuting the war. A treaty was concluded between them at Fotheringay castle, in virtue of which Albany took the title of Alexander, King of Scotland, promising to do homage to the English crown for his sovereignty, to break off the hereditary friendship with France, to give up Eskdale, Annandale, and Liddesdale, with the town of Berwick, and the castle of Lochmaben to Edward, and to cement the projected union of the two countries by a matrimonial alliance with the royal family of England.* This compact, which committed the duke to an unjustifiable attack on the birth-right of his elder brother, and a disgraceful sacrifice of the honour and independence of his country, would hardly have found favour, for a moment, with any influential portion of the Scottish nobility, if they had not been goaded to angry disaffection by the continued preferment and increasing arrogance of the royal favourites.

Arrogant and imprudent behaviour of Cochrane. Dignities and emoluments were still showered upon them—particularly upon Cochrane, who was distinguished by a form of noble proportions and great bodily strength, together with undaunted courage and an insinuating address, qualifications sufficient to have secured for a man of higher birth or humbler pretensions a secure and prominent place in the council-room and the battle-field. But his ignoble extraction could not be overlooked by the arrogant nobles, and his overweening presumption justified, while it provoked, the keen jealousy and dislike with which he was now regarded by all classes. His unpopularity had been lately aggravated by the adulteration of the coin in a season of scarcity, for it was more than suspected that the unwise and injurious policy had been adopted by his advice;* and, still more recently, the cup of odium and resentment against him had been filled to the brim by his unseemly investiture with the revenues of the late Earl of Mar, in whose death he was generally believed to have had a willing, if not the principal, hand.

No one bore all this with more indignant impatience than Archibald, Earl of Angus, the head of the new house of Douglas, whose haughty, martial spirit prompted him to regard the literary tastes of James as the tokens of an effeminate and most unkingly temper, and to chafe at the preferment of the upstart favourites as an insufferable affront to the whole nobility. Nor did he fail to find others, among the heads of the baronial families, who were fully prepared to sympathize with him in his discontent. The Earls of Argyle, Huntley, Crawford, Orkney, and Lennox, with Lords Home, Fleming, Hailes, Gray, Seton, and others of the barons, with certain of the higher clergy, whose names are not recorded, joined the conspiracy which was organized by Angus, in conjunction with Edward and Albany, and had for its object the destruction of the royal favourites, and the delivery of their unsuspecting sovereign into the hands of his enemies. There is no evidence, indeed, to prove that any considerable number of these nobles actually gave their approval and adherence to the treasonable paction of Albany with the English monarch, and it is probable that they were, for the most part, kept in ignorance of the ulterior designs of the exiled prince and his confidential associates, for men in their position had no motive to induce them to disparage the hereditary rights of their sovereign, or to surrender the independence of their country. The majority of the malcontents, in all likelihood, were only prepared to take advantage of the plot arranged at Fotheringay, in so far as it might facilitate the accomplishment of their own more moderate and less guilty designs. But a dark cloud of infamy hangs over the characters of Angus, Lord Gray, and Sir James Liddel of Halkerston, on whose full concurrence and co-operation Albany counted so confidently that he had appointed them his commissioners, to carry out the provisions of his treaty with Edward. They did not scruple to act, afterwards, on the powers granted them in that commission; and the presumption is that they were already contem-

* The debased coin was called 'the Cochrane plack;' and the story goes, that when the haughty favourite, from whom its nickname was borrowed, was told that it would be speedily recalled, he answered contemptuously, 'The day I shall be hanged;' 'Whilk prophetic came to pas hereafter,' adds Pitscottie—the prediction probably suggesting its own accomplishment.

plating a revolution which would transfer the sceptre of James to his brother Albany.

Such was the position of affairs, when the Scottish forces were ordered to assemble on the Borough-muir, in the immediate neighbourhood of Edinburgh:

Muster of the Scottish army. and thither the conspirators repaired with their retainers, giving no signs of their base intentions, or of the dangerous spirit that rankled in their breasts, save by the gloomy looks which they directed to the spot where Cochrane, who had assumed the title of Earl of Mar, magnificently arrayed, and attended by a body-guard of three hundred halberdiers, had taken his station as captain-general of the artillery.

It was Midsummer of 1481, when the gallant army of fifty thousand men defiled from the muster-ground beneath the walls of the ancient capital, and directed their march across Soutra-Hill towards the border, with the prospect of plunging into a fierce and protracted struggle; for Richard of Gloucester, with Albany, and the banished Douglas was at no great distance, leading a well-appointed force nearly equal in numbers. But a single day sufficed to make a total change in the aspect of affairs. It was in war rather than in peace, in the camp rather than in the parliament, that the Scottish barons felt themselves in a condition to cope successfully with the royal authority, and to wring from their reluctant sovereign the redress of their grievances, or the concession of their demands. Angus and the other malcontents perceived that a favourable opportunity to carry their nefarious schemes into effect had arrived, and they were not slow in making use of their advantage. The army halted for the first night at Lauder; and next morning the principal conspirators held a secret council in the church to arrange for the immediate execution of their designs. After some discussion it was resolved, that the person of the king should be seized, and that summary vengeance should be inflicted on Cochrane and his compeers. It was evident, however, that the execution of the plot must be attended with considerable danger, and while they were hesitating as to the best mode of proceeding, Lord Gray quoted the well-known fable of the mice, who, being grievously annoyed by the persecution of the cat, resolved in solemn council, that for the common safety a bell should be suspended round the neck of the enemy to give warning of her approach, but were sorely puzzled to find any one willing to undertake the perilous office. The pause of uncertainty and hesitation which followed this pointed apologue was broken by Angus, who with characteristic boldness exclaimed, 'I shall bell the cat'; an expression which procured for him the appellation of Archibald Bell-the-Cat, by which he was ever afterwards familiarly designated. While the conspirators were thus engaged, Cochrane, who as well as his royal master, seems to have been entirely unsuspecting of the plot which had been concerted for his destruction, came to ascertain the object of the meeting. "Clad in ane ryding-pie of black velvet," says Pitscottie, "with ane great chain of gold about his neck, to the value of fyve hundred crowns, and ane fair blowing horn in ane reckle of gold, borne and tipped with fyne gold at both endis, and ane precious stone called ane berryll, hanging at the midst thereof;" the favourite rode stoutly to the entrance of the church, and knocked at the barred door with the impetuous manner of one who came by authority and in haste. Sir Robert Douglas of Loehleven, who guarded the entrance, inquired who it was that knocked so rudely. 'It is I, the Earl of Mar,' was the proud reply. Admission was immediately given to the unhappy favourite, who was totally unsuspecting of the fate that awaited him, and carried only a riding whip in his hand. On advancing into the midst of the assembled peers with his usual arrogant air, he was met by Angus, who tore the chain from his neck, with the taunt that a halter would better become him; while Sir Robert Douglas, of Loehleven, snatched his hunting-horn from his side, telling him that he had been too long a hunter of mischief. 'Is it jest or earnest, my lords?' exclaimed Cochrane, in sudden surprise at this contemptuous and violent treatment. 'Earnest it is, and earnest you shall find it,' was the reply; 'you have too long abused the king's favour; you shall do so no longer, but receive the recompense you have deserved.' Having secured with such unexpected ease and speed the principal object of their aversion, the conspirators kept him quietly in durance within the walls of the building till a small party had proceeded to the royal quarters, and seized without greater difficulty Rogers,* Hommil, Preston, and the rest of the obnoxious parasites; and they were all hanged, without trial, or remorse, or delay, over the parapet of the bridge. It is mentioned by Pitscottie, that Cochrane besought those who were hurrying him to the place of execution not to bind him with a hempen rope, like a thief, but to use one of the silken cords of his pavilion. But even this was denied him by his brutal murderers, who told him that he was worse than a thief, he was a traitor, and deserved no better; and for the purpose of inflicting additional pain and disgrace on their unfortunate victim, they hanged him with a halter of horse-hair, as the most degrading mode of execution which they could invent. The only one of the royal favourites, who escaped, was

* Rogers was an eminent English musician, who accompanied the ambassadors of Edward IV. into Scotland in 1474. James was so delighted with his performances, that he persuaded him to remain at his court, and conferred upon him the honour of knighthood. "Under the instruction of this man, the most celebrated of his profession," says Ferrerius, "numerous eminent musicians arose in the Court of Scotland; and, even so late as 1529, many great musicians boasted that they were of his school."

John Ramsay of Balmain, a youth of sixteen years of age, who probably owed his life more to his tender years and honourable extraction than to the earnest intercession of his royal master.* After these cruel and infamous transactions the confederated nobles returned to the capital, carrying with them their unhappy sovereign, and committed him a close prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh.

This tragic and guilty scene closed the second act in the historic drama of James the Third. The prosperous part of his administration may be said to have terminated when he emerged from his minority; during which he had seen an honourable peace concluded with England under the auspices of Bishop Kennedy—a severe blow struck against the turbulent spirit in the northern and western districts of this kingdom, which never wholly recovered the humiliation—a matrimonial alliance, at once popular and advantageous, formed with one of the most powerful of the European monarchies—and a valuable addition made to his dominions by the acquisition of the Orkney and Shetland Isles. At Lauder the curtain fell on a subsequent period of six years, characterized by culpable and fatal errors; his abetting of Schevez against the worthy successor of Kennedy in the see of St. Andrews, his impolitic conduct towards his brothers, his concurrence in the interested and artful suggestions of the French king, and above all, his alienation of the hearts of the nobility and the people by his blind attachment to his ill-chosen favourites—a series of culpable and fatal errors, which overgrew and cast into deep shadow the desultory and feeble efforts which he made to promote the fine arts, encourage commerce, and heal up the sores of feudal strife among his half-civilized and turbulent subjects. Another period of six years is to follow, darkened by misfortune and weakness: with his influence abroad waning, and his power at home circumscribed—an object of mistrust to his nobles, and of cold indifference to the rest of his people—grieved by the death of his amiable consort, the renewed rebellion of his brother, and the secession of his son to the ranks of his enemies, the unhappy monarch passes on to conclude his inglorious reign by perishing under the hand of an obscure assassin, on the field of Sauchie.

In consequence of the base betrayal of their Berwick is taken country's interests by the confederacy of the English. derated Scottish nobles, the English obtained possession of the important fortress of Berwick, which never afterwards returned to the dominion of Scotland; and the Duke of Gloucester, who, along with Albany, commanded the English forces, advanced to the capital without opposition. They soon discovered, however, that although their accomplices among the Scottish nobility had readily united with Angus for the purpose of destroying the royal favourites, they were not disposed to support that ambitious noble in his treasonable schemes for the deposition of their rightful sovereign; and no sooner were his real intentions made known, than the more loyal of the barons immediately separated themselves from his cause, and, taking up arms, assembled a considerable force near Haddington, in order to maintain the rights of the crown, and the independence of the kingdom.* The infamous treaty which Albany had entered into with the English court was probably not yet fully known to any but his own confederates, and finding it at present hopeless to carry its stipulations into effect, they readily entered into a compromise with the royal party. A reconciliation was accordingly effected between Albany and his brother, through the intervention of Schevez, Archbishop of St. Andrews; Livingston, Bishop of Dunkeld; Evandale, the chancellor; and the Earl of Argyle.† It was agreed that Albany should be pardoned, and restored to his estates and honours on his return to his allegiance, and that his friends, with a few exceptions, should be included in the indemnity. It was also stipulated that these conditions should be ratified by the king, and by the three Estates at their next meeting.‡ The Earls of Athole and Buchan, however, who commanded the castle of Edinburgh, in which the unhappy monarch was imprisoned, refused to concur in the terms of this negotiation;§ and not only retained possession of the person of their sovereign, but, according to the assertion of James himself, would actually have put him to death, had not Lord Darnley and other barons remained in his apartment by night and day for the purpose of protecting him. Albany, after his reconciliation with his royal brother, collected an army and laid siege to the castle, which, after a short resistance, was surrendered into his hands.||

Meanwhile, the English forces had returned to their own country, and in order to facilitate the maintenance of peace between the two kingdoms, the provost and merchants of Edinburgh agreed to repay the sum which had been advanced as the dowry of the Princess Cecilia, if her father should think proper to break off the marriage between his daughter and the eldest son of the Scottish king. Two months after, intimation was given by Edward that the proposed alliance was not to be completed, and the money was accordingly repaid.¶

§ These nobles were the sons of Sir James Stewart, the Black Knight of Lorn, by Joanna, queen dowager of James I. Mr. Tyler thinks it highly probable that the faction of Athole and Buchan, instead of having a separate interest from Albany, were only branches of the same party, and kept possession of the king's person, that the duke, by the éclat of delivering his sovereign from imprisonment, might regain somewhat of the popularity which he had lost.—History, vol. iv. p. 237.

The reconciliation between the king and Albany was now apparently so complete that the two royal brothers used the same chamber, the same table, and the same bed, and on one occasion they rode together, mounted on the same horse, from the castle of Edinburgh along the principal street of the city down to the abbey of Holyrood.* James was, however, in reality entirely under the control of the duke, who, in concert with his confederates, assumed the sole direction of public affairs. The chancellor, Ervendale, one of the few friends of the king, was deprived of his office, which was conferred upon Laing, Bishop of Glasgow; while the bishopric of Moray, along with the office of keeper of the privy seal, was bestowed upon Andrew Stewart, brother to the Earls of Athole and Buchan; and all the principal offices of the government were filled by the creatures and supporters of Albany. A meeting of the three Estates was held at Edinburgh on the 2nd of December, 1482, and all the proceedings were conducted according to the directions of Albany.† The king was constrained to express his deep obligations to his brother for his delivering him from imprisonment, and to confer rewards upon the confederates of the duke for their alleged services to the state. The unfortunate monarch was also made to entreat the usurper to accept the office of lieutenant-general of the kingdom, with a suitable allowance for the support of his dignity. In addition to this high office, which virtually conferred upon him the supreme authority of the country, he received the grant of the extensive earldom of Mar and Garioch as a reward (to use the words of the royal charter which are evidently dictated by Albany) "for the faith, loyalty, love, benevolence, brotherly tenderness, piety, cordial services, and virtuous attention" manifested in delivering the sovereign from imprisonment.‡

The possession of these high honours and dignities, however, served only to whet the ambition of this unprincipled noble, and he speedily showed the inherent baseness of his character by renewing his treasonable intrigues with the English monarch, while, in order to save appearances, he issued orders to the lieges to make preparations for hostilities with England. His traitorous accomplices, the Earl of Angus, Lord Gray, and Sir James Liddal, were despatched to negotiate a secret treaty with the commissioners of Edward, by which it was stipulated that there should be good amity, love, and favour between the King of England and the high and mighty prince Alexander, Duke of Albany, and between the subjects of either prince dwelling within the one realm or the other—that the King of England and the Scottish ambassadors should not only preserve inviolate the truce between the two kingdoms, but, if need be, should assist Albany in the conquest of the crown of Scotland 'to his proper use,' while he in his turn engaged to annul for ever the league between Scotland and France, to renounce all right or title to the town and castle of Berwick, to restore the banished Earl of Douglas to the possession of his lands and dignity in Scotland, and after obtaining the crown to marry one of the daughters of King Edward as soon as he could make himself 'clear of other women.' It was also agreed by Angus, Gray, and Liddal, for themselves and their confederates, that in the event of Albany dying without heirs they would maintain their castles and strongholds against James, now King of Scots, and 'live under the sole allegiance of their good and gracious prince the King of England.' Edward on his part undertook to promote these base and treasonable designs of Albany and his accomplices by sending them the immediate aid of three thousand archers, paid and provisioned for six weeks, and placed under the command of his brother, the Duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III., and his cousin, the Earl of Northumberland, and to help them with an army sufficient for their protection if there should happen 'a great day of rescue,' or any other immediate danger.*

As soon as this infamous transaction transpired, it excited deep indignation among the great body of the nobility and gentry, who, though they had taken part in the plot against the king's favourites, were yet hostile to all attempts to subvert the rights of the crown, and the independence of the country. They showed their detestation of the designs of Albany, by rallying once more around the king, and enabling him to make a successful stand against the plots of his enemies. Albany was deprived of his office as lieutenant-governor of the kingdom by the parliament which assembled at Edinburgh about the close of the year 1482, and the most powerful of his accomplices were at the same time stripped of their dignities and offices. Angus was compelled to resign his office of great justiciar on the south side of the Forth, his stewardry of Kirkcubright, his sheriffdom of Lanark, and his command of the castle of Trief. The office of great chamberlain was taken from the Earl of Buchan, and bestowed upon the Earl of Crawford, while John of Douglas, another of the conspirators, was superseded in his sheriffdom of Edinburgh. Albany and his associates, the Bishop of Moray and the Earls of Athole and Angus, were at the same time interdicted from coming within six miles of the court, while the Earl of Buchan, Lord Crichton, and Sir James Liddal, were banished from the realm for three years. Albany, however, by a culpable act of weakness and inconsistency on the part of the king and his advisers, was permitted to retain the important office of warden of marches, and on confessing his manifold treasons, engaging to give his letters of warrant and allegiance to the sovereign under his seal and subscription, and pro-missing to discontinue his illegal combination with Angus, Athole, Buchan, and the rest of his traitorous confederates, 'not holding them in dayly household in time to come,' he received a full pardon for all his offences, and was permitted to retain the whole of his castles and vast estates.*

It is difficult to decide whether this misplaced Impolitic lenity lenity is to be ascribed to the of the king. king's affection for his brother, or to the consciousness of weakness on the part of the government; but the result demonstrated the folly of half measures, and a wavering line of policy. In the course of a few weeks Albany resumed his treasonable intrigues with the court of England. At his invitation an English army invaded Scotland, and advancing to Dunbar, that important stronghold, the key of the eastern marches, was delivered up to the enemy by Gifford, of Sheriffhall, the governor to whom it had been committed by Albany for the purpose of being betrayed into the hands of the English. The duke himself meanwhile fled into England, and in concert with Edward IV. and the banished Earl of Douglas, organized the plan of a more formidable invasion.†

The death of the English monarch, which occurred at this critical moment, and the seizure of the crown by his brother Richard the Third, unexpectedly disarranged the plans of the conspirators, and afforded to James an interval of rest, of which he availed himself with unusual firmness and vigour. A parliament was assembled at Edinburgh.

Forfeiture of Albany and his adherents. Albany was summoned to answer for his treasonable practices, and having failed to appear, he and his principal adherents were declared guilty of the crimes laid to their charge, and their lives, lands, offices, and all other possessions, were forfeited to the crown.‡ All the lieges fit to bear arms were ordered to hold themselves in readiness to march to the borders for the purpose of defending the kingdom against the invasion of the enemy. And in order that all parties might cordially unite in the defence of the country at this emergency, the king was advised to call into his presence those barons who were at feud with one another, and to persuade them to lay aside their differences. Soon after these energetic measures a truce was concluded with Richard III., who was too much engrossed with his own complicated affairs to have leisure or inclination to continue the war with Scotland; the ancient league between France and Scotland was confirmed and ratified, and the French monarch engaged to assist his ally, the Scottish king, in the expulsion of the English from the country, and the reduction of his rebellious subjects.§

Strengthened by these alliances, James found it no difficult matter to resist the last Inroad of Albany desperate effort of Albany and Douglas.

Douglas to disturb the tranquillity of the kingdom. Although the English monarch had received them courteously, and had even increased the pension paid to the banished earl, they soon discovered that the state of his affairs did not permit him to undertake the invasion of Scotland; and becoming impatient of their exile, they resolved at once to raise the standard of rebellion, trusting to their own resources and the expected aid of their confederates in the recent conspiracy. Having vowed that they would present an offering on the high altar of Lochmaben upon St. Magdalen's day (22nd July), when an annual fair was held there, they advanced to that town at the head of five hundred horse, expecting that they would be joined by the tenantry and vassals of the Douglas family in that district. In this, however, they were grievously disappointed. The hawkers and merchants, all of whom carried arms, offered a stout resistance to the invaders; and just as they were on the point of being overpowered, Charteris of Amisfield, Crichton of Sanquhar, and several other border barons, arrived with a reinforcement of their own retainers, and attacked the English with great fury. After a stubborn conflict, which lasted for several hours, the Their defeat, and capture of Douglas. rebels were completely defeated.

Albany escaped by the swiftness of his horse; but the aged Earl of Douglas was taken prisoner by Kirkpatrick of Kirkmichael, who had once been his own vassal. Kirkpatrick shed tears at the sight of his old master's distress, and even offered to set him at liberty, and fly with him into England. But Douglas was weary of exile, and rejecting the generous offer, informed his captor that he was now resigned to his fate. There was very little in the character or conduct of this once powerful baron which could entitle him either to respect or sympathy, but his years and misfortunes seem to have excited the compassion of the king, who treated him with praiseworthy leniency, and merely commanded him to be confined in the monastery of Lindores. The aged prisoner, who had undergone such strange alternations of fortune, submitted calmly to his sentence, only replying with a popular proverb, 'He that cannot do better must be a monk.' He survived his ultimate defeat about four years, and with him expired the principal branch of that formidable house, whose rank and power, gained by the inflexible loyalty and invaluable services of its founders, were forfeited through the wicked ambition and treasonable practices of its later chiefs. The Duke of Albany, after a brief residence in England, passed over to France, where, after a few years, he was accidentally hurt in a tournament by the splinter of a lance, and died of the wound. Duke of Albany, who was afterwards regent of Scotland during the minority of James V.

Soon after the final overthrow of Albany and Truce with Douglas, James despatched an embas- England. sassy, consisting of the Earl of Argyll, the chancellor, Lords Evandale and Lyle, and Whitclaw, his own secretary, for the purpose of negotiating a truce with England. The English monarch, whose power was constantly in danger from the plots and intrigues of his enemies in his own kingdom, was anxious to cultivate friendly relations with Scotland, and received the ambassadors at Nottingham with great state and honour. In a conference between them and the Archbishop of York, the chancellor and the Duke of Norfolk, who acted as commissioners on the part of England, a truce was agreed upon for three years; and to strengthen the amity between the two kingdoms, it was arranged that the heir of the Scottish crown, James Duke of Rothesay, should wed Lady Anne de la Pole, daughter to the Duke of Suffolk, and niece of the English king.* It was stipulated that the castle of Dunbar, which was still garrisoned by the English, should be included in the truce for the space of six months; but after the expiry of that period, the Scots were to be at liberty to recover it, if they could, by force of arms.

In a meeting of the three Estates, held 4th February, 1485, the renewal of the ancient league with France, and of the truce with England, was solemnly ratified and confirmed, and it was resolved to send an embassy to York at the expense of the clergy, barons, and burghs, for the purpose of concluding the marriage between the Duke of Rothesay and the niece of the English monarch. Shevez, the Archbishop of St. Andrews, was despatched on an embassy to the papal court, to obtain from the pontiff the confirmation of the alliance with France, and of the treaty with Denmark; and this embassy the archbishop offered to undertake at his own expence,—an arrangement which, taken in connection with the stipulation respecting the expediture of the commissioners sent to England, unequivocally betrays the impoverished condition of the royal exchequer at this time. The envoy was instructed also to request his holiness to confirm the royal nomination of Alexander Inglis, the king's 'tender clerk and counsellor,' to the bishopric of Dunkeld, and especially to entreat that, in consequence of the distance of the realm of Scotland from the court of Rome, the pope would grant to the Scottish kings the power of superseding for six months the disposition to vacant benefices, that there might be time to make application to the pontiff for the promotion of such persons as were agreeable to the sovereign,—a matter of great importance to the stability of the government, since the bishops had the first vote in parliament, and were members of the privy council. To render still more evident the determination of the king to support his royal prerogative against the encroachments of the papal see, the statute of James II. which forbade, under the penalties of treason, the purchase of benefices in the court of Rome, the presentation to which belonged to the crown, was re-enacted, and all who supported the ecclesiastics that had violated this law were ordered to be punished as severely as the principal offenders. Provisions were also adopted in this parliament for the improvement of the administration of justice, and the maintenance of tranquillity and the authority of law throughout the country. The lords and head men of the kingdom were enjoined to bring to trial and execution all notorious offenders, and the king came under obligation to grant no pardon or respite to criminals of this class for the space of two years.*

Soon after this, Richard the Third was defeated and slain in the battle of Bosworth, and the Earl of Richmond ^{Renewal of the truce with England.} ascended the English throne under the title of Henry the Seventh. The position of the new monarch rendered it highly desirable that he should maintain the most amicable relations with Scotland, in order that he might devote his whole efforts to the consolidation of his recently acquired power. Within a month, therefore, after his accession to the crown, overtures were made by him to the Scottish monarch for the establishment of a lasting peace between the two kingdoms.† Commissioners were accordingly appointed on both sides to conduct the negotiation; and after various conferences a truce was agreed on for three years, with a view to a permanent treaty, and proposals were made for a marriage between the Marquis of Ormond, second son of the King of Scotland, and the Lady Catherine, daughter of Edward the Fourth, and sister-in-law to King Henry. James had in the mean time succeeded in expelling the English garrison which had so long kept possession of the important fortress of Dunbar; but this event did not interrupt the negotiations for the establishment of peace.

About this time the queen died, in the thirtieth or thirty-first year of her age; and though James possessed no high ^{Death and character of the queen.} reputation for conjugal attachment and fidelity, he could hardly fail to feel the loss of one whose powerful connections had added much to the dignity and stability of his throne, and whose personal attractions were well fitted to grace his court, and promote the happiness of his domestic life. The annals of the period furnish very scanty materials for an estimate of her character; but no suspicion has ever been cast on her name, and the few brief notices of her history that remain warrant the assertion, that she wisely kept aloof from political intrigues, and sought in a quiet, virtuous course, an honour more congenial to her feelings, as well as more suitable to her sex.

She died in the prime of life; but she may be counted happy in having closed her earthly career before her eldest son's unnatural rebellion and her husband's tragical end.

The elements of discord were still strong among the nobility and great landed proprietors; for the middle and lower classes had at that time no separate political status, and seem to have never dreamt of any independent political action, being entirely under the control of their feudal superiors in the rural districts, and little less so in the towns, where the craftsmen depended chiefly on the custom of the neighbouring gentry, from among whom also their provosts and patrons were usually selected. The aristocracy formed the only counterpoise to the monarchial power; and many of its members continued to cherish the restless, turbulent spirit which had so often embroiled them with each other and with their sovereign. This was especially the case with those who had taken part in the revolt at Lauder, or countenanced the subsequent ambitious schemes of the Duke of Albany, and who felt that they were obnoxious to a charge of high treason, on which the king would in all likelihood bring them to trial and to punishment, whenever he obtained an opportunity of doing so with success. Yet for a little longer the embers of the strife smouldered among the ashes of its former conflagrations. The parliament, which met in October, 1487, was very numerously attended, and discharged its legislative duties with laudable zeal and unanimity. The disaffected party, indeed, attempted to procure an amnesty for all past outrages; but they did not offer any violent opposition to an act of a contrary purport, which was passed, requesting the king to refuse all applications for the pardon of capital crimes during seven years thereafter, because the land had been 'greatly broken and distressed' through the want of 'sharp execution on traitors and murderers.' The use which might be made of this decree against themselves was too obvious to be overlooked: but they were little skilled in the weapons of argument and debate; the platform of the deliberative assembly was not their vantage-ground, and they trusted principally to other means of defence, which they were quite ready to employ, should they be pushed to extremity. Besides the act in question was expressed in general terms, ostensibly for the benefit of the 'poor lieges,' and eager opposition to a measure, so reasonable and just in itself, would have seemed to argue a consciousness of their own misdemeanors. The law accordingly was passed with little opposition; as were some others of a similar tendency.* Justices-general were appointed for the northern and southern districts of the kingdom, with injunctions to proceed without delay to the vigorous discharge of their judicial functions; while it was further resolved, that all peers, prelates, barons, and commons, should give prompt and effective aid to the officers of the law in their several sheriffdoms, refusing harbourage to known criminals, and arming their vassals, when requisite, for the capture of offenders whose power enabled them to set the ordinary means of arrest at defiance. At the same time a committee was appointed for the revision of the old statutes: and it was ordered that the titles and estates of the Duke of Albany should be confiscated and annexed to the crown. Regarding commerce, there was a re-enactment of some former provisions restricting the privilege of foreign trade to burgesses of a certain class; to which was added a decree for the encouragement of imports by merchants from abroad. The necessity for thus repeating under successive administrations, and even from time to time, in the course of the same reign, not only the laws which were passed for the suppression of rapine and bloodshed, but those which were designed to regulate mercantile transactions, presents a painful picture of the state of society at this period. It appears that the government had no effective control over any class of the community, and was accustomed to see its authority contemned and its restraints broken through, by the middle and lower orders, as well as by the feudal chieftains.

The strength which accrued to the king and his party, from the tone of feeling displayed by the parliament, and the acts which were passed for the repression of disorders, received a further accession, before the close of the year, from a friendly negotiation with England. It was agreed at Edinburgh, between the Bishop of Aberdeen and Lord Bothwell on the part of James, and the Bishop of Exeter and Sir Richard Edgecomb as ambassadors from Henry, that the truce between the kingdoms should be prolonged for two years. The commissioners also entertained favourably a proposal to lay the basis of a more permanent union by three marriages; one, between James and the widow of Edward the Fourth; another, between the heir to the Scottish crown and a daughter of that monarch; the third, between James's second son and another princess of the same family.* These matrimonial projects, indeed, were afterwards broken off, in consequence of the Scottish king's insisting peremptorily on the restoration of Berwick, a condition to which Henry gave an equally decided refusal; but, in the mean time, the prolongation of the truce, and the hopeful aspect which the other negotiations at first assumed, were calculated to strengthen the hands of the royalists and to damp the spirits of the opposite faction. The latter, however, wanted neither courage nor resources; and immediately after the prorogation of the parliament they began to lay the train of a formidable conspiracy against the king. The Earl of Angus and Lord Gray, who had been most deeply implicated in the former outbreaks, seem to have been the principal instigators of the new rebellion. It was easy to gain the co-operation of Argyle, Lennox, Hailes, Home, and others, who perceived that the recent parliamentary measures, if not directed specially against them, were likely to be turned to their serious injury, on the ground of their participation in the previous insurrection. Nor was it much more difficult to attach a considerable body of the prelates to the meditated enterprise, for the king had begun to manifest a decided opposition to the claims of the Holy See over the ecclesiastical affairs of his realm. Apparently an attempt was also made to draw the aged Earl of Douglas from his monastic seclusion at Lindores into another conflict with the regal power from which he had so long and so severely suffered; but without success—physical infirmities, or the weariness of a broken spirit, made him decline to leave the retirement in which he had now learned, it is said, to think less of time than of eternity. The malcontents seem to have been more successful with Henry the Seventh, for there is on record a safe conduct granted by him soon afterwards to a number of Scottish lords, with a view to their visiting England;* and as all the persons named in it belonged to the disaffected party, while it suspiciously conceals the object of their visit, there is reason to believe that it was in some way connected with their treasonable designs. But their most politic, and at the same time most heartless device, was to alienate the affections of the prince royal from his father, and to add the influence of his name to their projected enterprise. It has been asserted, indeed, by some historians that he joined them by constraint, but others have not hesitated to accuse him of actively concurring in the designs of the conspirators—a charge which he himself strongly confirmed, by the high tone which he assumed in the subsequent conference at Blackness, by his failing to detach himself from the rebel party when the temporary pacification there gave him an opportunity of doing so, by the judicial proceedings which he instituted after his accession against some of the more distinguished royalist barons, and by the remorse which he felt and manifested in later years for the part which he had taken in his father's death.

Such were the varied and formidable influences which the conspirators employed to gain their guilty ends; and by the close of 1487 they were busily at work arranging their plans, collecting their resources, and striving to win over the several parties whose assistance they anticipated. But as yet they had not declared their intentions, or lifted the veil from their preparatory movements. Accordingly, when the parliament, which had been prorogued to the January of the following year, met again in the course of that month, they were found in their places, to watch the further procedure of the king and his party. If the steps which James now took, were adopted under a suspicion of the confederacy forming against him, and intended to check its progress, they did much more credit to his courage than to his wisdom, for their effect must have been to confirm the hostility of the malcontents, and to strengthen their hands. His second son was created Duke of Ross, Marquis of Ormond, Earl of Etdirdale, and Lord of Brechin and Novar—a measure which would be viewed by the elder brother of the favoured prince with no other feelings than those of jealousy and dissatisfaction, and which was susceptible of being disascribed to a purpose of ultimately changing the succession to the crown. Several of the gentry, who were known to be strongly attached to the king, were at the same time raised to the peerage,—a proceeding which the old hereditary nobles are always ready to contemplate with aversion, and which, in this case, would at once be ascribed to a design of augmenting the royal influence in the national assembly. Another impolitic act was the annexation of the lands and revenues of the Coldingham priory to the royal chapel at Stirling, which James had resolved to distinguish as the seat of a very sumptuous ecclesiastical service. Some of the powerful border families were certain to resent this as an injury, and to make it a ground for cherishing a deeper spirit of discontent. Nor were the dignitaries of the church less likely to be offended by the manner in which their sovereign proceeded to deal with its affairs, when he asserted his right of presenting to all vacant benefices, forbade any appeal to Rome without his sanction, and proclaimed that no emissary from the pope would be permitted to enter his kingdom, unless the object of the visit had been previously announced to him and his council. He is said to have attempted at the same time a still more questionable blow at the power of the party opposed to him: inviting the Earl of Angus to a private conference, he sought, not only to detach that powerful baron from the confederacy, but to make him the instrument of arresting its other chief supporters, as they were then in the capital for the discharge of their parliamentary duties, with comparatively few of their retainers at hand.* If such a scheme was really formed, which, however, is very doubtful, it was not likely to prove successful, and by its failure must have greatly widened the breach between the king and the disaffected chiefs, to whom the project was speedily made known.

These ill-timed and imprudent measures filled the cup of discontent and irritation to the brim, and hastened the outbreak of the meditated revolt. No sooner was the parliament dissolved than the conspirators assembled their forces, and prepared to try the issue of a struggle on the battle-field. The heir to the crown joined them from Stirling, where he had been placed by his father, under the guardianship of Shaw of Sauchie, who, nevertheless, had secretly united himself to the malecontents, and was, in all likelihood, the principal agent in corrupting the mind of his youthful ward.* The prince was welcomed with open arms, and placed, nominally at least, at the head of the confederacy, which was then declared to have taken up arms for the purpose of placing him on his father's throne; on the ostensible ground that the king had been negotiating with England to the detriment of his country's honour, and the sacrifice of its independence. This charge was undoubtedly false; for James was so far from contemplating any surrender of territory or prerogative to Henry, that he had made the restoration of Berwick a primary and indispensable condition of the permanent alliance projected by the commissioners at Edinburgh in the previous year.

The sudden outbreak took the king by surprise; but there was no want of promptitude and energy in the preparations which he made to meet it. A trusty emissary was sent to his son, to detach him, if possible, from the ranks of the conspirators; ambassadors were despatched to the courts of England, France, and Rome, to request aid; and, on the first movement of the rebels towards Edinburgh, James secretly quitted the city, for the purpose of heading, in person, the forces of the loyal barons on whom he could depend. Having embarked in a vessel belonging to Sir Andrew Wood, which was usually employed in the trade with Flanders, a report was circulated that he had fled to that country; and the alarm which arose in consequence enabled the insurgents, with little difficulty, to capture Dunbar, and occupy Leith. But the king had landed in Fife, and hastened northwards to Aberdeen; where his uncle, the Earl of Athole, with the Earl of Huntley and other nobles, mustered their followers in force around his standard. Returning at the head of this army to Perth, he was there joined by the martial array of Fife, Angus, and Strathern, under their feudal chieftains, among whom were conspicuous Lord Ruthven, along with a thousand men-at-arms, a thousand archers, and a thousand infantry; and Lord Lindsay, of the Byres, whose distinguished military reputation, acquired in the French wars, enhanced the value of the powerful force which he led to his sovereign's assistance. Passing on to Stirling, James found himself attended by an army of thirty thousand men, and a large number of the barons and gentry, among whom, besides those already mentioned, were the Earls of Buchan, Crawford, and Errol; Lords Glamis and Kilmaurs; the Barons of Tullybardine and Pourie; Innes of Innes; Collace of Balnamoson, and Somer of Balyard. The hostile armies met at Blackness, in West Lothian; but the prospect of a battle could not be agreeable to either party, and negotiations were entered into, chiefly, it is said, by the instigation of the king, whose natural repugnance to civil war was heightened by his grief at the thought of his son directing an armament against him. The hope of an amicable adjustment, however, was nearly overturned by the impetuosity of the Earl of Skirmish at Buchan, who attacked, and, after Blackness. a sharp encounter, drove back the forces of the insurgents. But this advantage was counterbalanced by the defection of Huntley and some others of the royalist barons, who drew off their followers and departed homewards, to their respective estates, in displeasure at the infringement of the armistice and the favour shown to Buchan, who was eager for an immediate and general engagement. Their respective losses probably disposed the leaders on both sides to listen to moderate counsels: the negotiations were resumed and brought to a favourable issue, Temporary the king pledging himself for the pacification. honourable treatment of his son, and the free pardon of the insurgent barons, while they promised, on their part, to return to their allegiance, and to maintain the just rights of the crown, as well as the peace of the country.

The calm which followed was not of long continuance: the pacification at Blackness took place in April, and May Fresh insurrection. saw the rebels again in arms, with the prince at their head, their declared object still being to obtain the king's abdication in favour of his son. Heralds were sent to require their submission; but the summons met with a contemptuous refusal, and the messengers with personal injury. James, equally grieved and indignant, saw no way of preserving his crown but by a vigorous armed resistance; and for this he could only trust to his own resources, for neither England nor France was disposed to lend him any aid; and if he knew of the nuncio despatched by the Holy See, for the purpose of mediating between him and the insurgents, it was to be feared that the mediation would be either too late or too weak to render him effective service. He had no choice but to repel force by force. Without delay, therefore, he sent to summon his adherents and their retainers, whom he had unfortunately dismissed to their estates after the pacification at Blackness; and, meanwhile, entrenched himself within the walls of Edinburgh castle, which contained his treasure and principal military stores. Sound policy should have led James to avoid the risk of a battle till his expected troops had mustered in sufficient strength for offensive operations. But as he depended chiefly on the loyalty of the northern parts of his kingdom, it was deemed necessary to secure the passage of the Forth, at Stirling. Thither accordingly, he proceeded with the friends who had already rallied around him, and effected a junction with considerable detachments from the Western and Midland counties. The forces now under his command, however, were by no means sufficient to justify him in risking a pitched battle against the formidable array of the rebels; and as the gates of Stirling castle were closed against him by the treachery of Shaw the governor, it should have been his policy to keep the left bank of the Forth, and to defend the passage of that river, till he received the accession of strength which he still expected from the more distant northern districts. Unfortunately a different course was adopted: intelligence being received next morning, (18th June, 1488,) that the forces of the enemy were approaching from Falkirk by the Torwood, the king advanced to meet them, and the two armies encountered at a place called Little Can-

The vanguard, commanded by the Earls of Huntley and Athole, was composed of the Highland clans, armed with swords, long daggers, bows and targets; in the rear were the Westland and Stirlingshire troops, led by the Earl of Monteith, with the Lords Erskine and Graham; while the king himself was in the centre at the head of the burghers and commons. On his right hand was the Earl of Crawford, who, for his eminent services, had recently been created Duke of Montrose; with Lord Lindsay of the Byres, at the head of the chivalry of Fife and Angus; while the left wing was composed of five thousand spearmen from Perthshire, under the command of Lord Ruthven. On the other hand, the rebels, who were greatly superior in numbers, advanced also in three divisions. Lord Hailes and the Master of Home led the van, consisting of the spearmen of East Lothian, and the Merse, and Teviotdale. The second division was composed of the savage Galwegians and the fierce Borderers of Liddesdale and Annandale, under the command of Lord Gray; while the chief of the insurgent barons, along with the prince, whom their wicked arts had enticed to rebel against his father, were stationed in the main body.†

On the first encounter, the royalists drove back the vanguard of their opponents with considerable loss; but when the hardy and well-disciplined western Borderers advanced to the rescue, the Highlanders, under Huntley and Athole, were unable to resist the shock, and, after a fierce struggle, were compelled to retreat in confusion upon the main body, which made a vigorous but unsuccessful effort to retrieve the fortunes of the day. Overborne by numbers, and compelled to give ground, the royalists retired slowly towards Stirling; and still fighting with obstinate valour, protracted the struggle till the approach of night, when, under cover of the darkness, they decamped in haste, and disbanded their forces, leaving among the slain the Earls of Glencairn and Bothwell, with the Lords Semple, Ruthven, and Erskine. The victorious army passed the night on the field of battle, and next day returned to Linlithgow.

James had quitted the field before the conflict was finally decided. As soon as the prospect of the issue became first doubtful, then adverse, the barons who surrounded the king reminded him of the paramount importance of his personal safety, and earnestly recommended him to avert, by an immediate retreat, the danger of his fall or capture, in comparison with which the loss of a single battle was of little moment. Yielding to this advice, James galloped off in the direction of Stirling bridge, either alone, or at such a pace as left his attendants far behind. He was mounted on a powerful grey horse, which had been presented to him a few days before by Lord Lindsay, with the assurance that whether he had 'to flee or follow, advance or retreat,' the animal 'would waur (beat) all the horse of Scotland if he would sit well.' But this highly-valued gift proved the means of the king's destruction. On crossing the brook Bannock, at a hamlet called Milltown, about a mile from the battle-ground, he came suddenly upon a woman drawing water from a well by the roadside, who, alarmed at his appearance, threw down her picher and fled into the house. The horse, which was at full speed, startled by this noise, swerved aside, and the king losing his balance fell to the ground before the mill door, and was so much bruised by the fall and the weight of his armour, that he swooned away. The miller and his wife, though ignorant of his name and station, carried him into the mill,* and administered to him such cordials as their house afforded. When he had somewhat recovered, he inquired for a priest, to whom, as a dying man, he might make confession. Being asked who he was, he answered 'This day at morn, I was your king.' On hearing this, the miller's wife ran out, wringing her hands, and calling for a priest to confess the king. At this moment some of the pursuers came up, and one of them, who is asserted to have been an ecclesiastic named Borthwick, in the service of Lord Gray, on hearing Murder of the woman's exclamation, said, 'I king. am a priest, where is the king?' On his admission to the mill, he found the unfortunate monarch lying in a corner of the building, covered with a coarse cloth; and kneeling down under pretence of reverence, inquired if his grace thought he could recover if he had medical assistance. The king answered 'He trowit (believed) he might,' but in the meanwhile he wished a priest to receive his confession, and to give him the sacrament. 'That shall I do hastily,' replied the ruffian; and pulling out a dagger, stabbed his unresisting victim repeatedly to the heart. According to Pitcottie, the murderer carried off the body of his sovereign, 'but no man knew what he did with him, nor where he buried him.' This, however, is a mistake, for a corpse, ascertained to be that of the unhappy monarch, was afterwards found in the neighbourhood, and buried with royal honours in the abbey of Cambuskenneth.*

James III., who thus perished in the prime of his life by the dagger of an assassin, like most of the princes of his unfortunate house, was possessed of great personal accomplishments, and was, in some respects, far in advance of the age in which he lived. He was passionately fond of the study of mathematics, of judicial astrology, and of the science and practice of music, while his architectural taste was displayed in the erection of the many noble and splendid buildings with which he adorned his kingdom. His devotion to these pursuits, which bespoke a refined and cultivated mind, and would, in other circumstances, have been highly praiseworthy, and his love of seclusion and repose, led him to select as his familiar friends the professors of literature and of the fine arts, to the exclusion of his rude and ignorant nobility, whom he regarded as barbarians, and who, in turn, looked with contempt on what they considered the weak and effeminate character of their sovereign. This mutual aversion between the king and his nobles became gradually stronger and stronger, and at length led to the most fatal results. Immersed in his favourite pursuits, James neglected the duties of his government, obstinately refused to listen to the complaints and remonstrances of his nobility,† and not only admitted architects, painters, musicians, and astrologers to that familiar intercourse, from which even the highest nobles were excluded, but had the weakness and indiscretion to confer on these associates the rank and distinctions hitherto appropriated exclusively to the feudal barons and knights. It is not to be wondered at that a rude and haughty nobility should have been disgusted with such conduct, and should have readily entered into conspiracies against a monarch whom they neither feared nor loved. In a more civilized country, and in a less warlike age, James might have swayed the sceptre with great credit to himself and advantage to his people; but his lot had fallen on evil days. The fierce and turbulent barons by whom he was surrounded were ignorant, illiterate, and unpolished, and regarded with supreme contempt every pursuit, except those connected with the warlike and knightly exercises, in which they were almost exclusively occupied; while the middle classes of the community had not yet risen into sufficient importance and power to be able to support their sovereign against the opposition of his factious barons. At this period, too, a revolutionary and anti-feudal movement of the aristocracy against their king had taken place in England, Germany, the Netherlands, and in almost every other kingdom in Europe with which Scotland was connected; and though the struggle was not in all cases successful, yet the spectacle of a monarch deposed and imprisoned, or put to death by his nobles, had become so familiar as greatly to diminish, in public estimation, the sacredness of the royal person, and the respect for hereditary succession. The restless and rapacious aristocracy of Scotland were not slow to imitate the example of the members of their order in other countries, and to seek the increase of their power and privileges at the expense of the throne. The factious and selfish character of their rebellion is clearly proved by the remarkable fact that though the revolutionary barons proclaimed themselves the champions of law, of liberty, and of the people, and denounced the king as a tyrant and an oppressor; yet the middle classes and the great body of the nation refused to join in their base and treacherous designs, and, so far as they did take part in the struggle, followed the example of the clergy, and united themselves to the party of the sovereign.*

The personal appearance of the unfortunate prince was highly prepossessing; his complexion was dark; his countenance handsome and intelligent; and his person tall and athletic. By his queen he left three sons,—James, his successor; a second James, created Marquis of Ormond and Duke of Ross, and who afterwards became Archbishop of St. Andrews; and John, Earl of Mar. At the time of his death he was in the thirty-fifth year of his age, and the twenty-eighth of his reign.

CHAPTER XXI.

CONDITION OF THE PEOPLE.

DURING the period which elapsed between the death of James the First and the accession of James the Fourth, Scotland presented a scene of almost incessant turmoil and disorder. In addition to the usual evils of a long minority in these unhappy times, the miseries of the country were greatly aggravated by the struggles of a turbulent and factious nobility to recover the privileges and power of which they had been deprived.

The wise and benevolent measures ^{Distracted state} of the country which James the First had enacted for the equitable administration of justice and the protection of the poorer classes against the oppression of the great, remained a mere dead letter on the statute book as soon as the hand of that vigorous and sagacious monarch was withdrawn; and, in a brief space, the power of the feudal barons throughout the kingdom became as exorbitant and was as injuriously exercised as ever. Rapine and outrage everywhere prevailed. The poor and unprotected were oppressed and robbed with impunity. The most flagrant crimes went unpunished, and the country was again torn asunder by the fierce disensions and sanguinary feuds of the nobility. The misery which the people suffered at this period is thus bewailed by Bower, the historian, who flourished during the minority of James the Second.

“Long appears to us, O king, the time of thy arrival at majority, when thou mayest be able to deliver us, confounded as we are with daily tyranny, oppressed with rapine and spoil; when thou mayest dietate laws, and exercise justice, that the poor, who among us have no helper but God and thee, may be freed from the hand of the powerful. Mayest thou remember that thou art a legislator, in order that thou mayest crush the robber, and restrain those who deal in rapine. The groans of the humble, and the miseries of the poor, whom I myself, who write this, have seen this very day, in my own neighbourhood, stripped of their garments, and inhumanly spoiled of their domestic utensils, constrain me to exclaim with him who says, ‘I have seen the injuries which are done, the tears of the innocent and no comforter; and that the destitute cannot resist violence. I have praised the dead more than the living, and happier than both have I esteemed the unborn, the sole strangers to the evils of this world.’ And, in another passage, comparing the reign of James I. with his own times: ‘Woe to us, miserable wretches! exposed to rapine and injury: how can we endure to live who enjoyed such prosperity in the days of that illustrious king, and now, by a sad change of fortune, experience the complete reverse?’”

This deplorable account of the state of Scotland in these ‘troubled times,’ is fully corroborated by Pitseottie, who says, that “meikle hership and stouth was in land and burrowis, and great cruelty of nobles among themselves; for slaughter, theft, and murder were then potent, and so continued day by day, so that he was esteemed the greatest man of renown that was the greatest brigand, thief, and murderer. There were so many widows, bairns, and infants seeking redress for their husbands, kindred, and friends that were cruelly slain by wicked murderers, that it would have pitied any man to have heard the same.” No wonder that “the people began to weary and to curse that ever it chanced them to live in sic wicked and dangerous times.” “But,” he significantly adds, “they were the cause of this mischief that were governors and magistrates of the realm.” Throughout the whole of this period, indeed, those, who from their station and office ought to have been the guardians of the laws and the protectors of the people, were, in most cases, the worst oppressors of the poor, and the first to violate the statutes which they had assisted to frame.

One fertile source of the lawlessness and confusion which prevailed in Scotland ‘Bands’ among at this time, was the custom of the nobles. entering into ‘bands or leagues,’ by which the feudal barons became bound to stand by each other in all causes and quarrels in which they might engage. The precise nature of these confederacies among the Scottish nobles may be learned from the remarkable agreement entered into between Robert Lord Fleming, on the one side, and Gilbert Lord Kennedy and Sir Alexander Boyd of Duchol, on the other. The indenture, which is dated at Stirling on the 10th of February, 1465, declares that the said lords had solemnly “bound and obliged themselves, their kin, friends, and men, to stand in a full kindness, supply, and defence, each to the other in all their causes and quarrels moved and to be moved, for all the days of their lives, against all manner of persons that live or die may,” reserving, however, their allegiance to their sovereign, and especially excepting from the operation of this clause the Lords Livingston and Hamilton, with whom, it would seem, Lord Fleming had already entered into a similar covenant. On the other hand, Kennedy and Boyd except from the obligation to consider as their adversaries every enemy of Fleming, a list of friends with whom they had entered into a similar bond, including the Earl of Crawford, Lords Montgomery, Maxwell, Livingston, Hamilton, and Cathcart, along with Patrick Graham, afterwards Archbishop of St. Andrews. With regard to the services which the parties entering into this league were mutually to perform, it was stipulated that Lord Fleming was to remain a member of the king’s special council so long as Lord Kennedy and Sir Alexander Boyd themselves continue in the same office, on condition that he became bound, in no possible manner either by active measures, or by consent and advice, to remove the king’s person from the keeping of Kennedy and Boyd, or of any person whom they may have left in charge of the sovereign during their absence. It was also stipulated that Lord Fleming should engage that he would earnestly advise the king, "with his good counsel, to be heartily and kindly to Lord Kennedy and Sir Alexander Boyd, with their bairns and friends, and they that belong to them at the time." In return for these services it was declared that if any office in the king's gift happened to fall vacant, which is a reasonable and fit thing for Lord Fleming's service, he should be promoted thereto for his reward; and "if there happens a larger thing to fall, such as ward-relief, marriage, or other perquisite, as is meet for the Lord Fleming's service, he shall have it for a reasonable composition before any other." It was finally agreed that for Lord Fleming's sake, and for their service done and to be done, Tom of Somerville and Wat of Tweedy, two of Lord Fleming's friends, should be received by Kennedy and Boyd in special maintenance, supply, and defence, in all their actions, causes, and quarrels: and the deed was solemnly ratified and confirmed by the oath of the contracting parties taken upon the holy gospels.*

This instructive document will serve to illustrate the unworthy methods which were attempted to remedy these evils. The Scottish barons to promote their own selfish interests at the expense of the peace and prosperity of the country. It was in vain that the legislature declared that 'within the burghs throughout the realm' no bands or leagues were to be permitted, and that no persons who dwelt within burghs should either enter into 'man-rent,' or ride, or 'rout' in warlike apparel with any leader, except the king or his officers, or the lord of the burgh within which they dwelt, under the penalty of forfeiting their lives, and having their goods confiscated to the king.† The evil was too deep-rooted to be reached by mere legislative enactments which the sovereign and his ministers had no power to enforce. In defiance, both of the threats of the law, and the efforts of the government, the Scottish aristocracy continued and extended their illegal confederacies, which were equally at variance with the rights of the community, and the independence and stability of the throne. And the frequent repetition in the statute-book of the same enactments against the formation of 'bands or leagues'—the making of private war—laying violent hands upon the person of the sovereign—plundering the king's lieges—'great and masterful theft,' and other flagrant crimes of a similar kind, plainly shows the utter impotence both of the legislature and of the government to restrain or punish the acts of oppression and robbery perpetrated by those turbulent barons, whose ferocity and selfish ambition filled the country from one end to the other with scenes of bloodshed and rapine.

The reign of James the Second was fertile in judicious and salutary enactments, and the statutes enacted for the purpose of securing the more speedy punishment of offenders and their abettors—the suppression of rebellion against the king's person and authority—the appointment of learned and upright judges, and the equal administration of justice—the security of life and property, and the preservation of the 'king's peace,' in every part of the country—the protection of the rights of 'the poor people who labour the ground,' by the positive prohibition of all attempts to eject any tenant during the currency of his lease, or in the case of those who held church-lands, on a vacancy of the benefice, reflect the highest credit on the sagacity and firmness of this monarch, and the able and enlightened prelates who were his chief advisers; and serve also to throw great light on the state of the country, and the difficulties which he had to encounter in his wise and benevolent efforts to ameliorate the condition of his subjects. It would appear that the stringent enactments of his father against 'sorning and masterful beggars' had failed to arrest this grievous abuse, for a statute, which gives us a curious picture of the times, was passed by the parliament of 1449, for the 'putting away of sorners, outlyars, and masterful beggars,' who travelled through the country with horses, hounds, and other goods, extorting charity from those who were afraid to resist their demands, especially from the farmers and the monks. All sheriffs, barons, aldermen, and bailies, either without or within the burgh, were directed to confiscate the property, and to seize the persons of these sturdy mendicants, as well as of "any pretended fools, bards or such like vagabonds," who were to be kept in prison or in irons as long "as they had wherewith to live, and when they had not, their ears to be nailed to the Tron or to a tree, and then cut off, and they themselves banished the country, to which if they returned again they were to be hanged." By another statute these 'sorners' were to be punished with death.

The same anxious desire to promote the peace and prosperity of the country, and the maintenance of law and order, appears in the peremptory injunctions issued by James to the sheriffs to make immediate inquiry into all invasions of property, and to compel the offender to make instant restitution; in the directions given to these officers, along with the justices, chamberlains, coroners, and other magistrates, not to travel through the country with those numerous trains of attendants, which grievously oppressed the people; and in the penalties denounced against any lord of regality who should abuse his privileges to the breaking of the king's laws, and the injury of the country. A striking proof of the frequency of brawls and riots among the unruly followers of the nobility is afforded by a subsequent statute, which enjoins all persons of every degree to attend the justice ayres or sheriff courts with no more than their ordinary train of attendants, and to take care on entering their inn or lodging to lay aside their harness and warlike weapons, and to use for the time nothing but their knives. As an additional security against violence and bloodshed, when persons at deadly feud happened to meet at such assemblies, the sheriff was directed to take pledges from both, binding them to keep the peace.* Any person who had reason to apprehend violence from another—an event of constant occurrence in these lawless times—was directed to go to the nearest magistrate, and make oath that he was in dread of his violence, after which the officer was to take pledges for the keeping of the peace according to the ancient statutes upon this subject.† The person who refused to grant such security, that he would abstain from offering violence to the person, or invading the property of his neighbours, was liable to heavy penalties. In order to put a stop to the alarming prevalence of crime and oppression, a subsequent statute inflicted severe fines upon the borrows or sureties of those persons who had violated their pledges. “Concerning law-borrows it is enacted,” to use the language of the statute, “that if they be broken upon any bishop, abbot, prelate of the church, earl or lord of parliament, the sureties of the infringer shall pay to our sovereign lord a fine of one hundred pounds; if upon any baron, knight, squire, or beneficed clerk, fifty pounds; if upon a burgess, yeoman, or priest, thirty pounds, together with due compensation to the party injured, unless the sureties produce the offender before the king or sheriff within forty days.”‡

Among the numerous judicious measures which distinguished the reign of James the First, was the appointment of a committee, consisting of six wise and able men best acquainted with the laws, chosen from each of the three Estates, for the purpose of examining the books of the law; that is to say, ‘Regiam Majestatem’ and ‘Quoniam Attachamenta,’ who were directed to ‘mend the laws that nedis mendyng,’ to reconcile all contradictory and explain all obscure enactments. A similar measure was adopted by the parliament of 1469, in which the three Estates, after having concluded their deliberations, elected a committee of prelates, barons, and commissaries of the burghs, to whom, among other important matters, was entrusted ‘the reduction of the king’s laws, comprehending the “Regiam Majestatem,” the acts, statutes, and other books, into one code or volume,’ while the rest, meaning probably those statutes which had either fallen into desuetude, or been abrogated, were to be destroyed. These injunctions, however, seem not to have been carried into effect, for in 1473, the lords and barons besought the king to select from each Estate two persons of wisdom, conscience, and knowledge, who were to labour diligently towards ‘the clearing up of diverse, obscure matters, which existed in the books of the law, and created a constant and daily perplexity,’ and were directed to ‘find good inventions, which shall accord to law and conscience, for the decision of the daily pleas brought before the king’s highness, and concerning which there was as yet no law proper to regulate their decision.’ It was further recommended by the lords and barons, that after such rules of law had been selected they should be laid before the next meeting of parliament, and upon being ratified and approved, all the laws of the realm should then be written in a book, which was to be kept in an accessible place where it might be copied, and that no other books of the law should be permitted thenceforth to be quoted but those which were copies from this original, under the penalty of personal punishment and perpetual silence, to be inflicted upon all who practised in the laws and infringed these injunctions.*

In order to promote the due administration of justice in all parts of the kingdom, it was directed by the parliament of 1457, that the Court of Session should be composed of nine judges, who were to have votes in the decision of causes; three being chosen from each Estate along with the clerk of the register; and that these lords of session should sit three times in the year for forty days at a time, in Edinburgh, Perth, and Aberdeen. The impoverished state of the public exchequer at this period is manifested by a subsequent statute, which states that since the lords of session are to hold their court for so short a time, and that they are not likely to be called upon to undertake such a duty more than once every seven years, they ought out of their benevolence to pay their own expenses; and upon the conclusion of the three yearly sessions, the king and his council promise to select other lords from the three Estates, who should sit in the same manner as the first, at such places as were most convenient.† The settlement of all causes not exceeding minor causes.

The sum of five pounds, was intrusted to a committee, selected by the privy council, and consisting of eight or twelve persons, according to the size of the town. Frequent references occur in the statute book to the neglect or unwillingness of the judges, and law officers of the crown, to execute the laws, especially against powerful delinquents; no doubt from their natural apprehension of injury to their own persons or interests; and in the parliament of 1469, it was declared, ‘that if the justice, sheriff, steward, or other officer, refuse to execute justice,’ the complainant should repair to the king in council, who shall inflict summary punishment on the offending magistrate.

In consequence of the general insecurity of life and property in Scotland at this period, agricultural operations were so generally neglected, that it was deemed necessary to frame several regulations for the encouragement of husbandry, and to re-enact the statute of James I., by which every man possessed of a plough and of eight oxen was commanded to sow annually at the least a firlof of wheat, half a firlof of pease, and forty beans, under the penalty of ten shillings to the baron of the land for each offence; while the baron himself was enjoined to sow the same proportions of wheat, pease, and beans, in his own domains, under the penalty of ten shillings to the king for his own infringement of the law, and forty shillings, if he neglected to levy the statutory penalty from his tenants. In order to repair the waste of the woods and forests of the country, it was declared, that "the lords thought it advisable that the king should recommend all his freeholders, both spiritual and temporal, to make it a provision in their Whitsunday's lease, that all tenants should plant woods and trees, make hedges, and sow broom in places best adapted, according to the nature of the farm, under a penalty to be fixed by the proprietor; and that care should be taken that the enclosures and hedges were not constructed of dry stakes driven into the ground and wattled, or of dry worked or planed boards, but of living trees, which might grow and be plentiful in the land."* Enactments were also made at the same time prohibiting the burning of heath, from the month of March till Michaelmas, that the standing corn might not be injured; and recommending the extirpation of eagles, bustards, kites, hawks, and especially of wolves. The whole population of the district were commanded to assemble three times in the year for the purpose of hunting these destructive animals; and the man who slew a wolf, upon bringing the head to the sheriff, was to receive a penny from every householder in the parish; if he brought the head of a fox, he was to receive sixpence from the same officer.

Various other measures were adopted by James II. for the protection and encouragement of agriculture, and special mention should be made of the statute of 1449, which declared that husbandmen "who have taken or shall take lands in any time to come from lords according to a lease which is to run for a certain term of years, shall remain on the lands protected by their lease till the expiry of the same, paying all along the same yearly rent, and this notwithstanding the lands should pass by sale or by alienation, into the possession of other landlords,"—a just and wise act, which must have exercised a most important influence on the security of property and the improvement of the country. A subsequent statute of the same monarch permitting lands to be let in feu, free from military service, was also a judicious and most beneficial measure; but the act of 1469, freeing the property of the tenants who laboured the ground from liability for the debts of their lord, is by far the most important legislative enactment of this period affecting the rights and condition of this class of the community. It appears that among the many grievous hardships to which the husbandmen were subjected at this time, by the tyranny of the higher orders, they were frequently stripped of their whole property by the creditors of their landlord, in order to pay his debts. To remedy this gross injustice, an act was passed by which it was declared that "to prevent the great impoverishment and destruction of the king's commons and rentallers, and of the inhabitants of the estates of the nobles, which was occasioned by the brief of distress" sued out by the creditors of these nobles, the poor tenants should not be distrained for their landlord's debts farther than the sum which they were due to him in rent; so that if the amount of the debt exceeded the rent due by the tenants, the creditor was bound to have recourse against the other goods and property of the debtor. If the defaulter had no other property except his land, it was provided that the land should be sold and the debt paid, so that the poor tenants and labourers should not be distressed. The debtor, however, was to enjoy the privilege of reclaiming his land from the purchaser, if at any time within seven years he should pay down the price for which it had been sold.*

The distractions of the kingdom, and the incessant feuds among the nobles, by Famine and interrupting the operations of the pestilence. husbandman, and destroying the fruits of his labours, not unfrequently produced a scarcity of the necessaries of life, and subjected the devoted country to the miseries of famine. It is stated by an ancient contemporary chronicler, that in the year 1439 "was the dear summer, for the boll of meal was at twenty-four shillings, and the boll of malt at two marks, and the boll of wheat at thirty shillings,"† so that, according to the calculation of the learned Ruddiman, the price of provisions was increased by the scarcity about twenty-fold. The famine became so grievous, that multitudes of the poorer classes died of absolute want, and great numbers of those whom the famine had spared were cut off by a deadly pestilence, the consequence of scanty and unwholesome food. In the simple but graphic language of Pitscottie, "In this year there raise ane great dearth of victuals within the realm, partly because the labourers of the ground might not sow nor win the corn through the tumults and cumbers in the country, and partly because of the wrath and ire of God to cause us to know ourselves, and through that scourge to provoke us to amendment of life. There rang also at this time ane terrible pest in the countrie, for all men that were infected therewith died that same day they took it, but (without) any remedie or help."‡ Again, we are told by the contemporary chronicler quoted above, that in the year 1482, "there was ane great hungyr and deid in Scotland, for the boll of meal was four pounds;"

and the public distress was greatly aggravated by the issue of a debased currency, called 'black money'; or copper pieces mixed with a small quantity of silver; an unjust and impolitic device which raised the price of all the necessaries of life, and excited great discontent among the people. "And also," continues the chronicler, "there was great war betwixt Scotland and England, and great destruction, through the wars, was of corn and cattle, and thair twa things caused baith hunger and dearth, and mony poor folk deit of hunger."* The government of the day, acting upon those mistaken notions of political economy which were then universally prevalent, sought to prevent the recurrence of this grievous calamity, by issuing severe enactments against those persons who were in the practice of buying victual or corn and hoarding it up, in the expectation of a dearth. Strict injunctions were given to sheriffs, bailies, and all other officers, to discover, arrest, and punish all such persons, whilst the provisions which they had hoarded were to be confiscated. The keeping of old stacks of corn in the farm-yard later than Christmas was strictly prohibited; and burgesses and other persons who bought victual for the purpose of selling again, were allowed at this late season of the year to have only so much grain in their possession as was requisite for the support of themselves and their families.† By a subsequent statute, passed in August, 1452, it was ordered that all the corn in the kingdom should be thrashed out before the last day of May then next.

The trade and commerce of the country appear to have made little progress during the reigns of James the Second and Third. We learn from an old English poem, apparently written in the reign of Edward the Fourth, and entitled 'The Bibel of English Policy,' that the chief exports of Scotland, at this period, were fells or skins, hides, and wool; that the wool was manufactured at Popering, and Bell, or Baileul, towns on the coast of Flanders, between Dunkirk and Calais; that a mixture of English wool was necessary to make fine cloth; and, that the Scottish imports from Flanders were cart wheels and wheelbarrows, haberdashery, and a little mercery.‡ Large quantities of salmon still continued to be exported, and regulations were enacted by the legislature respecting the size of the barrels and the mode of measurement. An important statute passed in 1467, declared that, in future, no ship should be freighted by any of the king's lieges either within the realm or from a foreign port, without there being a formal charter-party drawn up, stipulating that the ship-master should provide a steersman and tymmerman (timber man), with a crew sufficient to navigate the vessel. The merchants who sailed with him were to be gratuitously furnished with fire, water and salt. If any quarrel arose between these merchantmen and the ship-master, its decision was to be referred to the court of the burgh to which the ship was freighted. No merchants' goods were to be injured or spoiled by ignorant or careless stowage, under the penalty of forfeiting the freight-money, besides making compensation to the owner for the damage. No goods were allowed to be placed upon the upper-deck, and none were to be stowed below which could injure the rest of the cargo in a tempest. It was ordered, that every ship carrying more than five lasts of goods, should pay to the Scottish chaplain in the port to which it was bound, one sack; and if under five lasts, half a sack, under the penalty of five pounds to the king. No drink money was to be paid to the shipmaster or his agents. Every ship, homeward bound, was to bring one ton of materials for the church-work of the town to which it was freighted. No master was to be allowed to sail his vessel during the winter months, from the feast of St. Simon and Jude to Candlemas; and all merchants were prohibited from trading to the ports of the Swyn, the Sluse, the Dam, or Bruges, and were ordered to pass with their ships and cargoes to the town of Middleburgh; probably in consequence of some temporary misunderstanding with the Flemings.* A judicious and equitable measure was enacted by James III. in his last parliament (A.D. 1487), for the protection and encouragement of foreign merchants. "For the common profit of the whole realm, and to excite strangers of other realms to visit the kingdom with grain and other mereliandize," it was ordered that, in future, all strangers should be treated honourably and with all favour, at whatever port they should arrive. The king's officers, and all other subjects of the realm, were prohibited from disturbing them, or arresting their persons, ships, or goods; and it was declared, that they should have full liberty to dispose of their goods, and to sell them to freemen, without compulsion or violence; and that there should not be any price set upon their goods, except in fair bargain and sale. It was ordered, that no new customs, impositions, or exactions, should be levied on them; but that they should pay the ancient duties alone, and that when any articles were wanted for the king, his comptroller or receiver, after the price had been settled, should have as much of the first and best as was required, for which, however, immediate payment was to be made, that the owners might not suffer by delay. It was peremptorily enjoined, that in future no person, under pretence of making purchases for the king's use, should take goods from strangers to sell again, under the penalty of banishment and escheat of moveables. Any strangers then in the kingdom making complaints respecting the seizure of their goods, or any other injury, should receive immediate payment and compensation, according to justice, against any person in the kingdom, "So that by the due administration of justice, and the favourable treatment of all strangers, they might be induced to return, to the great benefit of the whole kingdom." These enactments present a curious picture of the lawless state of the country at this time, which rendered such regulations necessary for the protection of foreign traders against the rapacious exactions and violence of the officers of the royal household, as well as of the feudal barons. Evidence is afforded by the statute-book, that the king's own 'poor commons' were exposed to similar oppressive exactions; and it appears, that during the sitting of parliament and of the session, the king's constables and other officers were in the habit of levying a tax upon the merchants and tradesmen who then brought their goods to market, encouraged by the greater demand for their commodities. This heavy grievance was removed by the parliament of 1457, which declared all such imposts henceforth illegal, unless the right of exaction belonged to the constable 'of fee,' for which he must show his charter.

Not a few of the statutes, however, which were enacted at this period, for the regulation of trade and commerce, were based on most erroneous principles, and were calculated to impede and injure, rather than to foster the industry of the country. The restrictions upon the export of cattle into England, and the transportation of gold and silver out of the country were renewed, and it was declared, that every merchant who exported hides or wools, should, for each sack which he sold in the foreign market, bring to the master coiner of the king's mint two ounces of current silver, for which he was to receive nine shillings and two-pence. A statute of James I. was re-enacted, which ordered that no person should be allowed to sail or trade in ships, but such as were of good reputation and ability, and who possessed, at the least, in property or in commission, the value of three serplaiths of wool. It was declared, that no litstar or dyer was to follow the trade of a draper, or to be permitted to buy or sell cloth. None but free burgesses, or dwellers within burghs, or their factors and servants, were allowed to sell or traffic in merchandise out of the realm; but an exception was made in favour of prelates, barons, and clerks, who were permitted to send the produce of their estates out of the country by the hands of their servants, and to purchase in return, such things as were needful for their personal use. Even burgesses, it would appear, were not allowed to engage in mercantile pursuits, unless they possessed, of their own property, half a 'last' of goods, or had this quantity, at least, under their own power and management; and handicraftsmen and artizans were not permitted to trade, unless they first entirely renounced their own craft. The prelates, and nobles, and even the king himself, still continued, as in the former reign, to freight vessels, and to engage in other private commercial speculations.

An important change took place in the coinage of the kingdom during the reign of James the Second. It was resolved by the parliament of 1451 that it was expedient there should be an issue of new coinage, conforming in weight to the money of England. Eight groats were to be coined out of the ounce of refined silver or bullion, and smaller coins of half-groats, pennies, half-pennies, and farthings, of the same proportionate weight and fineness. It was directed that the new groats should be reckoned of the value of eight-pence the piece; that the half-groat should be taken for four-pence, the penny for two-pence, the half-penny for one penny, and the farthing for a half-penny. The English groat and half-groat were fixed at the same value, but it was ordained that the English penny should only be received for such value as the receiver chose to affix to it. The exact value of the French and other foreign coins then current in Scotland, was fixed at the same time. It was declared that as soon as the new groat was struck and a day appointed for its issue, the value of the groat now current was to be lowered to four-pence, and of the half-groat to two-pence. It was next resolved by the parliament that there should be struck a new gold coin, having the figure of a lion on the one side, and on the other the image of St. Andrew, clothed in a side-coat, reaching to his feet. The value of this new piece, which was termed a lion, was fixed at six shillings and eight-pence of the new coinage, while the value of the half-lion was to be three shillings and four-pence. The coin called the demy, which had then a current value of nine shillings, was henceforth to be received only for six shillings and eight-pence, and the half-demy for three shillings and four-pence. It was declared that no man was to be obliged to receive this money if it should be reduced by clipping. The master of the mint was to be held responsible for all the gold and silver struck under his authority, and was invested with full power to select the coiners and strikers who worked under him and to punish them for any misconduct.*

It was soon found that the value affixed by these regulations to the various coins, both native and foreign, then current in Scotland, was too low, and that the merchants and traders having discovered that the real value of the money was greater than the statutory value fixed by parliament, were in the habit of 'keeping up' the coins and exporting them to other countries. To remedy this evil, which seems to have excited great alarm among the statesmen of this period, the parliament of 1456 ordained that the value of the demy should be estimated at ten shillings; that the new lion should 'have course throughout the realm' for the same sum, instead of its first value, six shillings and eight-pence, as directed in 1451; that the new groat should be raised from eight-pence to twelve-pence; and the half-groat from four-pence to six-pence. Special regulations were also framed respecting articles made of the precious metals, the standard purity of which was to be carefully ascertained and authenticated by a mark stamped upon them by the deacon of the craft.*

Certain gold pieces coined by James III. received the designation of 'unicorns,' from the animal now employed as the supporter of the royal armorial bearings. The copper coinage of Scotland commenced in 1466, when it was resolved by the parliament, that for the convenience of the king's lieges, and to encourage alms-giving to the poor, a coinage of copper money should be issued, four pieces or farthings to the penny, with the device of St. Andrew's cross, and superscribed Edinburgh on the one side, and a royal crown with the letters 'JAMES R.' on the reverse. A little silver was mingled with the copper, so as to constitute what was called 'billon.' The 'black money,' as the debased groats and pennies issued by this prince were termed, consisted of copper pieces mixed with a small quantity of silver. The groats were called 'placks,' and only passed for three-pence. The severe penalties, which were repeatedly denounced by the legislature against all false strikers of gold and silver, and all forgers of false groats and pennies, show that the crimes of false coining and forgery were not uncommon in Scotland at this time.

A minute description of the arms and armour worn by the different classes of the community at this period is given in the various statutes which make provision for the defence of the country. It was ordered by the parliament of 1456 "that all the king's lieges possessed of lands or goods should be ready mounted and accoutred, according to the value of their property, to ride for the defence of the country at the command of the king. All persons worth twenty marks were commanded to provide themselves, at the least, with a jack and sleeves down to the waist, or with a pair of splents, a 'sellat,'† or a 'pricket hat,' a sword and a buckler, a bow and sheaf of arrows, if they can procure them; if not, they were to have an axe and a targe made either of leather or wood, with two bands upon the inside."‡ In 1471 it was declared that no "merchant should import spears less than six ells in length, and that no bowyer in the kingdom should make them of shorter size; that every yeoman who could not use the bow should have a good axe and a targe of leather to resist the English arrows." In a subsequent parliament (A.D. 1481) a penalty was imposed on any soldier whose spear was shorter than five ells and a half; the jacks or leathern tunics were ordered to extend below the knee, and the targe of wood or leather was to be made according to a pattern to be sent to the sheriff of the county.§ The barons were arrayed from head to heel in plate armour of complete steel, which had now superseded the chain-mail formerly worn by the leaders of the army. Their horses were now also clad in complete armour. Considerable attention appears to have been paid both by James II. and his successor to the construction of cannon, or 'carts of war' as they are termed; and artillery-men and skilful artisans were procured from the continent for the management of the rude ordnance which were then employed by the Scots. The art of gunnery appears to have been very imperfectly understood in Scotland at this period. James, as it is well known, lost his life at the siege of Roxburgh castle by the bursting of a rudely constructed gun, which had been overcharged by the engineer; and Dunbar castle, which was besieged by James III. in 1479, withstood for several months the discharges of the royal artillery. The cannon of the garrison, however, appears to have been better served, for we are informed that a single ball from a gun, mounted on the ramparts of the fortress, struck dead at one moment three of the best knights in the army of the besiegers,—Sir John Colquhoun, of Luss; Sir Adam Wallace, of Craigie; and Sir James Schaw, of Sauchie.

In imitation of the example of James I., his successors sought, by every means in their power, to promote the practice of archery among their subjects. Stringent enactments were repeated at intervals throughout their reigns prohibiting the games of the foot-ball and golf, the favourite pastimes of the Scottish peasantry; and commanding that a pair of butts should be erected in the vicinity of each parish church, where shooting was to be practised every Sunday; that armed musters of the whole disposable force of a district, for the exercise of their arms and the inspection of their weapons, should be held four times in the year; and that there should be a good 'bowyer' and a 'fledger' or arrow-maker in every head-town of the county, who were to be furnished by the town with the requisite materials for their trade, so that every man within the parish might be provided with the requisite weapons, and practise shooting. But all these attempts to change the national habits completely failed, and the Scottish soldiery, in spite of reiterated legislative enactments, enforced by heavy penalties, could not be prevailed upon to substitute the bow for their favourite weapon, the spear.

In the reign of James II. we find the first mention made of the institution of a royal guard for the protection of the sovereign's person—a measure of precaution which was probably taken in consequence of the cruel assassination of that monarch's father. It appears to have been discontinued by James IV., who was exceedingly popular among all classes of his subjects; but was revived during the minority of his successor. With the exception of this guard, and a small body of soldiers occasionally maintained for the purpose of garrisoning the fortresses on the Borders, Scotland was a stranger to a standing army till the period of the Restoration.

The system of chivalry which made its way into

Scotland at a very early period, still continued to flourish among the barons and knights of that country. The ancient oath, administered with great solemnity to the youthful Scottish warrior on whom the honour of knighthood was conferred, has fortunately been preserved, and is a curious and interesting relic of an institution which, at one time, exercised a powerful influence on the character of our ancestors. The aspirant after knightly renown bound and obliged himself to defend the Christian religion to the uttermost of his power,—to be loyal and true to his sovereign lord the king, to all orders of chivalry, and to the noble office of arms—to support the administration of justice without favour or enmity, never to flee from his sovereign lord the king, nor from his lieutenants in the time of affray or battle—to defend his native realm from all aliens and strangers—to defend the just action and quarrel of all ladies of honour, of all true and friendless widows, of orphans, and of maidens of good fame—to do diligence to bring to justice all murderers, traitors, or masterful robbers, who oppress the king's lieges and poor people—to maintain and uphold the noble state of chivalry, with horse, armour, and other knightly habiliments, and to help and succour those of the same order at his power, if they had need—and, finally, he declared his determination to seek diligently to acquire the knowledge and understanding of all the articles and points contained in the books of chivalry.*

The tournament continued to be a favourite pastime of the Scottish barons and knights, who enjoyed a high reputation throughout Europe for skill in those spirit-stirring displays of martial accomplishments, which constitute such a striking feature of the times. A brief notice has already been given of the celebrated combat at outrance between three Burgundian champions and three Scottish knights, which occurred at the marriage of James II., in 1449; but the minute and graphic account of this noted combat, by Olivier de la Marche, a contemporary Burgundian writer,† deserves insertion on account of the light which it casts on the chivalrous character and manners of the knights of this period.

“When Messire Jaques de Lalain saw that there was no further occasion for him there, he returned and found the good duke of Burgundy in his city of Lille, who received him favourably; but he soon took leave of the duke and set out for Scotland. He was accompanied by Messire Simon de Lalain, his uncle, and Hervé de Meriadet and many other worthy men; and, so far as I understand, Messire James Douglas, brother of the Earl of Douglas, and the said Messire Jaques de Lalain had formerly wished to meet in arms, and had sought each other for that purpose. At the instance of the said Messire James Douglas, battle was permitted by the king between him and M. Jaques de Lalain, but the affair grew and multiplied, so that a conflict to outrance was concluded on, of three noble Scottishmen, against M. Simon and M. Jaques de Lalain, and Hervé de Meriadet, all to fight at once, before the king of Scotland. And when the day of the conflict came, the king most honourably received them in the lists, and though I was not myself a spectator, yet I must recount the ceremonies, for example to future times. For three memorable things occur besides the battle, which was most fiercely disputed on both sides.”

“The first was, that when the three belonging to the court of Burgundy were all armed, and each his coat of arms on his back ready to enter into battle, M. Jaques de Lalain spoke to M. Simon, his uncle, and to Meriadet, and said, ‘Messieurs and my brothers in the conflict, you know that it is my enterprise which has led us into this kingdom, and that in consequence the battle has been granted to M. James Douglas; and although each of us may assist his comrade, I beg and request you, that whatever befall me this day, none of you attempt to succour me, for it would seem that you had passed the sea and entered into this conflict only to assist me; and that you did not hold or know me a man able to sustain the assault and combat of one knight, and hence less account will be held of me and my knighthood.’

“After this request, sallied from the pavilions the champions in armour, furnished with axes, lances, swords, daggers, and they had leave either to throw or push their lances as they chose.”

“The two Messires James Douglas and Jaques de Lalain were in the middle, to encounter each other, which they did. On the right was M. Simon de Lalain, who was to engage a Scottish squire, and Meriadet was to meet a knight of high power and fame; but they found themselves transverse, so that the knight was opposite to M. Simon, and then Meriadet (who desired to assail him who was appointed, without regard to the strength or fame of his antagonist) passed across to place himself before M. Simon, and meet his man. But the good knight coldly and firmly turned towards Meriadet and said, ‘Brother, let each keep himself to his opponent, and I shall do well, if it please God.’ So Meriadet resumed his rank before his antagonist, and this is the second thing which I desired to commemorate.”

“The champions began to advance each against the other, and because that the three on the part of Burgundy doubted lest the place might be too confined for so many lances, they all three threw their lances behind them (the third cause of my recital), and seized their axes, and rushed on the Scots, who came within push of lance, but that availed them nothing. Though all fought at once, I shall rehearse the adventures one after the other.”

“The two Messires James Douglas and de Lalain met each other, and approached so nigh, that of all their weapons there remained none save a dagger, which the Scottish knight held. The said M. Jaques de Lalain seized him by the arm near his hand, which held the dagger so closely, that the Scot could not avail himself of it; and he held the other arm below the arm-pit, so that they turned each other round the lists for a long time."

"M. Simon de Lalain and the Scottish knight were strong champions, and neither of them killed in warding blows of the axe; like two valiant knights they attacked each other so often, that in a short time they had crushed the visors of their basinets, and their weapons and armour, with mutual blows, and the fight seemed equal."

"On the other side was Hervé de Meriadet, whom the Scottishman attacked with the push of the lance; but Meriadet turned off the blow with the butt-end of his axe, so that the lance fell from the Scot's hands; and Meriadet pursued him so keenly, that before the Scot could undo his axe he came within his guard, and with one blow felled him to the earth. Meriadet then left the Scot to arise, who was quick, light, and of great spirit, and arose speedily and ran to Meriadet for the second time. Meriadet (who was one of the most redoubted squires of his time for strength, lightness, coolness, and skill in arms and in wrestling) received the assault with great composure, then returned it, and again struck him to the ground with his axe; when the Scot again attempted to rise, but Meriadet struck him on the back with his hand and knee, and made him fall flat on the sand. And notwithstanding the request which Messire Jaques de Lalain had made, the said Meriadet, seeing the struggle of the two knights, advanced to assist the said Jaques, but the king of Scots threw down his baton and they were parted. Now, though it be against my plan, and though I write of this combat without having seen it, I nevertheless report it truly by the report of the Scots and of our party."

A vivid and interesting picture of the evil dresses of the times is given in the various sumptuary laws enacted by James II. and his successor, in consequence of the alleged impoverishment of the realm by the sumptuous apparel of men and women. The same subject had attracted the attention of the legislature in the year 1429, and strict injunctions were issued that the king's lieges should array themselves in such grave apparel as befitted their station. But it would appear that these statutory regulations had failed to remedy the evil complained of, for it was deemed necessary, by the parliament held in 1457, to re-enact the laws against immoderate costliness in apparel still indulged in, especially by the burgesses and their wives. "Seeing," it declared, "that each estate has been greatly impoverished through the sumptuous clothing of men and women, especially within the burghs, and amongst the commonalty, to 'landward,' the lords thought it speedful that restriction of such vanity should be made in this manner. First, no man within the burgh, that lived by merchandise, except he be a person of dignity, as one of the aldermen or bailies, or other good worthy men of the council of the town, should either himself wear, or allow his wife to wear, clothes of silk, or costly scarlet gowns, or furring of mertricks." Strict injunctions were also issued, that the wives and daughters of the burgesses should be habited in a manner correspondent to their estate, "that is to say, on their heads short cureshes with little hoods, such as are used in Flanders, England, and other countries; and as to the gowns, no woman should wear mertricks, or letvis, or tails of unbecomming length, nor trimmed with furs, except on holydays." At the same time it was ordered that "poor gentlemen, living in the country, whose property was within forty pounds of old extent," should regulate their dress according to the same standard. As to the clergy, no one was to wear a scarlet gown or mertrick furs, unless he was a dignitary in a cathedral or college church, or a doctor, or a person having an income of two hundred marks. And with regard to the commonalty, it was enacted "that no labourers or husbandmen were to wear on their work-days any other stuff than grey or white cloth; and on holydays, light blue, green, or red, and their wives the same, with kerchiefs of their own making. The stuff they wore was not to exceed the price of forty pence the ell. No woman was to come to the kirk or market with her face 'mussalit,' or covered, so that she might not be known, under the penalty of forfeiting the curch."*

Another statute was passed during the reign of James II., for the purpose of regulating the dresses to be worn by earls, lords of parliament, commissaries of burghs, and advocates, at all parliaments and general councils. The earls were directed to use mantles of 'brown grany,'† open before, lined with white fur, and trimmed in front with the same of a hand's breadth, and reaching down to the belt, surmounted by little hoods of the same cloth, pendant on the shoulder. The other lords of parliament were enjoined to have a mantle of red cloth, open in front, and lined with silk, or furred with 'Cristy grey, griee, or purray,'‡ with a hood of the same cloth, and furred in the same manner; whilst all commissaries of burghs were commanded to have each 'a pair of cloaks' of blue cloth, trimmed with fur, and made to open on the right shoulder, and having hoods of the same colour. If any earl, lord of parliament, or commissary of the burghs, appeared in parliament or at the general council without this dress, he was to pay a fine of ten pounds to the king. All men employed as 'forespeakers,' or advocates, were to wear a dress of green cloth, made in the form of a 'tunykil,' or short tunic, with the sleeves open like a tabard; under the penalty of five pounds to the king, if they appeared either in parliament or before the general councils without it. It was also directed that in every burgh where meetings of parliament or general councils were held, there should be constructed, 'where the bar uses to stand,' a platform, consisting of three tiers of benches, each tier higher than the other, upon which the commissioners of burghs were to sit.* This act was confirmed by a subsequent parliament (A.D. 1458); and the king was advised to order patterns of all the dresses to be made. It was enacted by James III., in the year 1471, that, considering the great penury of the realm, and the expense of importing silk, no one should wear it in doublets, gowns, or cloaks, who was not possessed of land yielding an annual rent of one hundred pounds Scotch money, excepting knights, minstrels, and heralds; and that women, whose husbands did not belong to one or other of these classes, should not use silk in the linings of their dresses, but only in making the collar and sleeves. The accounts of the Bishop of Glasgow, who held the office of treasurer to James III., furnish us with a number of minute and interesting details respecting the dress and personal expenses of the royal family of Scotland at this period. We find that, in 1474, James Hommel, the king's tailor, and one of the unfortunate favourites afterwards murdered at Lauder, received four ells of French black, at forty-two shillings the ell, to make a long gown for the king, with ten ells of fustian for lining. Among the articles provided for the king, mention is made of hose of white cloth; shirts of fine holland; chamlet gowns, lined with lamb-skin; socks of white cloth; doublets and hose, lined with broad-cloth; a pair of spurs valued at four shillings; two ells of velvet to make two tippets, and furs to line

The first division contains on one side the king, the prince, afterwards James IV., and St. Andrew; on the reverse is a representation of the Trinity. The other compartment represents the queen kneeling, and behind her is a personage in plate armour, supposed to be intended for her father, in the character of Canute, the patron saint of Denmark. On the reverse is an ecclesiastic kneeling, and behind is an organ, with two angels. them; a long mantle of velvet; a bonnet at fifteen shillings, and two hats at ten shillings each; a satin jacket lined with lamb-skin; grey cloth for long socks; black satin to cover a prayer-book; velvet for a 'chesabel' to his closet, and for his brigintynis; knobs of gold for his saddle; a chymna or grate for his closet; ribbons for his doublet and sleeves; gloves, muchis or caps; pillows covered with broad cloth; drugs from Flanders; an ell of scarlet for his petticoat; a gown of cloth of gold, lined with satin, presented to an English herald, who attended the embassy.

Among the things purchased for the queen are patterns and corks; livery gowns lined with grey for six ladies of her chamber on a pilgrimage to Whithorn; satin for her 'turrats'; black cloth for a 'sliding gown'; velvet for another gown; leathern gloves; a cloak and 'capite bern,' of black, lined with Scottish cloth; eight ells of broad cloth to cover a bathing-vat, and three for a sheet, to put around her while bathing; hose of black cloth; seven ells of crimson satin for a kirtle, and to cover 'bonnets of tire'; a grate for her closet; 'band leather' for furring her gloves; five ells of 'cristy gray,' at thirty shillings the ell, to line a gown of black damask; blue velvet to cover her stirrup irons; half an ell of double tartan to line her riding collars; satin for tippets and collars; a year's shoes costing upwards of seven pounds; satin for stomachers, and ermine to line them; twenty-six 'bestes of greece' to line a tippet; ten pounds thirteen shillings and fourpence for a mass-book to her altar.

The chief articles provided for the prince, then only two years of age, are shirts and caps of holland cloth, coats of brown lined with white cloth, and some of the latter for his cradle; fine broad cloth for his sheets, or rather blankets; white hose and petticoats, and lawn caps; French brown cloth, and tartan with buckrum binding for his cradle; English russet for a gown to his nurse; white fustian for blankets, and broad-cloth for sheets; a coat of satin, and a gown of cloth of gold, lined with blue tartan.*

The state banquets of this age were characterized by a display of rude magnificence and plenty, and were frequently conducted on an extravagant scale. An interesting account is given in the annals of De Coucy, a contemporary Burgundian writer, of the feasting and revelry which took place on the occasion of the marriage of James II. to Mary of Gueldres. On the arrival of the youthful princess at Leith, she was welcomed by a great concourse of all classes of people, whom the polished Burgundians regarded as little better than barbarians. Seated on horseback behind her brother-in-law, the Lord of Campvere, and encircled by the nobles of France, Burgundy, and Scotland, she proceeded to Edinburgh, where she was lodged in the convent of the Greyfriars. On the day after her arrival, the king visited her and remained three hours, and on the following Wednesday he sent to appoint the next day for the wedding, and presented her with two hackneys, worth about thirty French crowns. On the wedding-day the king arrived on horseback, dressed in a grey robe, lined with white cloth, and wearing boots and spurs. The queen was clothed in a robe of violet colour, lined with ermine; in a strange fashion, says De Coucy, if compared with those of France; and her long hair hanging down. At the festival which followed the coronation, the first dish consisted of the figure of a boar's head, painted and stuck full of 'hards,' or coarse bits of flax, served up in an enormous platter, surrounded with thirty-two little flags or banners, bearing the arms of the king and chief nobles. The flax was then set on fire amid the acclamations of the numerous and brilliant assembly in the hall. A ship of silver, of exquisite workmanship, was next introduced, probably containing salt and spices in distinct compartments. The first service was then ushered in, preceded by the Earl of Orkney and four knights, and every succeeding service was brought in by about thirty or forty persons, all bearing dishes. At the second table, the Countess of Orkney and other ladies sat with the Lord of Campvere. At the third was a 'patriarch,' says De Coucy, probably a papal legate, along with three bishops, an abbot, and other churchmen, the five dignitaries drinking out of a large 'hanap,' or wooden bowl, without spilling any of the wine; and other liquors being as abundant as sea-water. The dinner lasted about five hours, there being neither dancing nor supper. On the following day there was 'excellent cheer in their way,' says the chronicler, which was very rude and strange when compared with that of France. The dress and manners of the common people he describes as very barbarous. 'There are even,' he adds, 'many among them who seem to be altogether savages.'

The following curious incident related by the Anecdote of author of the 'Memorie of the James III. and Somervilles,' may serve to illustrate both the personal character of James III. and the manners of the Scottish king and his nobles at this period. About the year 1474, Lord Somerville being in attendance upon the court, James offered to pay him a visit at his castle of Cowthally, near the village of Carnwath, in Lanarkshire, where he then lived, in all the rude hospitality of the time, for which this nobleman was peculiarly remarkable. Like the other nobles of his age, Lord Somerville was more accustomed to handle the sword than the pen, and, on the occasions of his absence from home, it was his custom, when he intended to return to his castle with a party of guests, merely to write the words 'Speates and raxes,' that is, spits and ranges, for the purpose of intimating to his household that a great quantity of food should be prepared, and that the spits and ranges should be put into employment. Even the visit of the king did not induce Lord Somerville to send any other than his usual intimation, only he repeated it three times, and despatched it to his castle by a special messenger. The paper was delivered to Lady Somerville, who, having been newly married, was not yet skilled in her husband's hieroglyphics, and she made out the brief, and probably not very legible, writing to be, not 'speates and raxes,' but 'spears and jacks,' implements which she, no doubt, considered more likely to be required by her lord than spits and ranges. She immediately concluded that Lord Somerville was in some distress, or engaged in some quarrel in Edinburgh, and wanted assistance; and instead of making preparations for a feast, a body of two hundred horsemen were hastily collected, and despatched to their master's help. As they were marching with the utmost speed over the moors towards Edinburgh, they observed a large company of nobles and their attendants engaged in the sport of hawking on the side of Corsett-hill. This was the king and Lord Somerville, who were on their road to Cowthally, taking their sport as they went along. The appearance of a numerous body of armed men interrupted the pastime of the royal party, and excited no inconsiderable alarm; and the king, who saw Lord Somerville's banner at the head of the troop, concluded it was some rebellious enterprise against his person, and charged the baron with treason. Lord Somerville protested his innocence:—'Yonder,' said he, 'are indeed my men and my banner, but I have no knowledge whatever of the cause that has brought them here. But if your grace will permit me to ride forward, I will soon ascertain the reason of this disturbance. In the mean time, let my eldest son and heir remain as an hostage in your power, and let him lose his head if I prove a traitor.' The king accordingly permitted Lord Somerville to ride towards his followers, when the matter was soon explained by those who commanded them. The mistake was then only a subject of merriment, for the king looking at the letter, protested he himself would have read it 'Spears and jacks,' rather than 'Speates and raxes.' When the cavalcade reached Cowthally the lady was much out of countenance at her mistake. But the good-humoured monarch warmly praised her for the despatch which she had used in sending assistance to her husband; and said he hoped she would always have as brave a band at his service when the king and kingdom required them.*

An old poem, entitled 'The Three Tales of the Three Priests of Peblis,'† which appears to have been written before the year 1492, gives a curious view of the manners of the Scottish burgesses and merchants during the reign of

James the Third. The three priests are represented as meeting in the town of Peebles, and after enjoying a collation, consisting of three roasted capons with sauce, and many other meats, served upon a 'roundel,' or round table, covered with a fair cloth, and washed down with plenty of good liquor, they agreed that each in turn should tell a tale for their mutual instruction and amusement. The first story is narrated by father John, who 'hath been in monie an uncouth land'—in Portugal and in Seville, in the five kingdoms of Spain, in Rome, Flanders, and in Venice, and 'other lands sundrie up and down.' A certain king is represented as summoning the three estates of his realm, and requiring each of them to account for the degeneracy, which has taken place in the character and condition of the respective classes. The burgesses are first called upon to explain why it is that 'Burgess bairns thrive not to the third heir, but cast away all that their elders won.' After due deliberation they answer that the reason is, 'they begin not where their fathers began,' but that 'they aye begin where that their fathers left.' A minute and graphic description is then given of the manner in which a trader of those days rose by slow degrees from poverty to riches. He begins his career poorly, we are told, with good luck, and a halfpenny, and a lamb's skin; and goes from town to town on foot, oft wet-shod and weary, till at last out of 'monie smalls,' he makes up a good pack, and becomes a pedlar. At every fair the industrious chapman is found disposing of his goods, till, at length, his pack is worth forty pounds, when he finds it necessary to purchase a stout horse to bear it. By and by he acquires a cart to 'carry pot and pan,' and becomes the owner of Flemish coffers with counters and chest. The next stage in his upward course, sees him possessed of a shop in town, buying and selling wool. He goes to sea, according to the custom of the merchants of that day, comes home a 'very potent man,' and marries a rich wife. His voyages have been so frequent and so successful, that, at the last, he becomes the owner of a goodly ship, and 'waxes so full of world's wealth,' that he washes his hands in a silver basin, has hoards of gold and silver, and a cupboard of plate worth three thousand pounds.* He wears rich gowns and other gay garments, is clothed in silk on Sundays, and in green or grey cloth at other times, while his wife is arrayed in scarlet, and fares sumptuously every day. He dies, and his son succeeds to the possession of wealth, for which he never toiled, which never cost him either sleepless nights, or laborious days. He has been nurtured in luxury, 'his mother tholed not the reek (smoke) on him to blow.' He wears precious rings on his fingers, is ashamed to hear that his father sold sheepskins, keeps a train of idle servants, spends his time in the tavern or in playing at hazard, till, sinking into poverty, he becomes the follower of some lord's son at court. Drink and dice have stripped him of every farthing of his inheritance—he has not the skill to earn a morsel of bread, 'what ferlie (marvel) then that burgess' bairns beg.'

The lords are then called upon to say what is the cause why such worthy lords The barons. were in former days 'so full of freedom, worship, and honour, hardy in heart to stand in every stour,' while their degenerate descendants exhibit the very opposite qualities. They allege that the principal cause of this degeneracy was to be found in the mal-administration of justice, and the grievous oppression of the farmers, and husbandmen, by the coroners, justices, serjants, or mairs, of the king, who were in the habit of extorting sums of money from the more thriving yeomen, till they reduced them to poverty. Bribes alone could secure a favourable hearing of any cause, however just. The thief could easily escape the punishment due to his crimes, by bribing the judge, while the honest farmer was often accused of theft, or robbery, for the sake of the fine, the amount of which was made to depend on the extent of his ability.

'Thus leil men are hurt, and thiefs gets away.'

The gross oppression of the farmers impoverished their landlords, who found their tenants unable either to pay their rents during the time of peace, or to provide themselves with proper arms to attend their lords in war, and appeared at the muster with ragged cloaks, and rusty swords, more like a regiment of beggars, than a courageous, well disciplined host. The barons, thus reduced to poverty, were fain to replenish their coffers by degrading marriages with the illegitimate daughters of opulent priests, or the heiresses of merchants, or by selling the right of marriage of their sons to 'churles,'

'In whom is na nurture nor nobilness, Fredome, worship, manheid nor honours.'

There can be little doubt that these complaints respecting the gross partiality of the officers of justice, at this period, were well founded, and that the very laws intended for the protection of the poor, were thus converted into instruments of their oppression. It appears that the practice of selling the royal pardon, even for the most outrageous crimes, had been carried to such a shameless height during the reign of James III., that the Lords of the Articles, in the parliament held in 1471, were constrained to exhort and entreat his highness that 'he would close his hand for a certain time coming against all remissions and respites for murder.*'

Lastly, the clergy were required in their turn to account for the deterioration which —and the clergy. had taken place in their order, and to say why, in ancient times, the bishops and clergy abounded in all good works, and, through the influence of their prayers, the dumb spake, the blind received their sight, the deaf heard, and the lame were made to walk, while no such good deeds were done by their successors. The answer given was, that anciently the bishops were chosen by the people, after fasting and earnest prayer to God for the guidance of the Holy Spirit; and that the person best fitted for each particular see was selected, either from among the clergy of that chapter where the vacancy had occurred, or of the whole realm. But now bishops are not chosen by the people, but appointed solely by the king. No man now obtains a benefice by literature, science, virtue, or even birth, but by gold alone, simony being accounted no sin. In consequence of this love of filthy lucre the gifts of the Holy Spirit were not imparted. The bishops came not in by the door, but climbed in by the window; and he that came not in by the door was not a shepherd to keep the sheep, but a fox disguised in a lamb's skin. How could such wicked men work miracles unless it was by the help of Satan?

* Acts of Parliament, vol. ii. p. 104.

'This is the cause, the sooth to say,
Why holiness fra' kirkmen is away.'

It is but justice to state, that in the midst of general corruption in the church, there were not wanting at this time, even among the bishops, illustrious examples of eminent piety and faithful attention to duty. In delineating the character of the venerable Bishop Kennedy, Pitscottie says, "He caused all parsons and vicars to remain at their parish churches for instruction and edifying their flocks; and caused them to preach the word of God unto the people, and to visit them when they were sick. And, also, the said bishop visited every church within his diocese four times in the year, and preached to the parishioners the word of God truly, and inquired of them if they were duly instructed in the word of God by their parson and vicar, and if their sacraments were duly administered, and if the poor were sustained, and the youth educated and taught conformably to the order that was taken in the church of God. And where he found that order was not followed, he made great punishment, to the effect that God's glory might shine through all the country within his diocese, giving good example to all future archbishops and churchmen in general to cause the patrimony of the church of God to be used for the glory of God and the common benefit of the poor."*

The increase of crime among the higher classes at this period appears to have kept pace with the increase of luxury. Poisoning and adulteration of wine. The enactment, in 1450, of two statutes against domestic and foreign importers of poisons, shows that this crime, so widely prevalent at this time on the continent, had spread into Scotland. The adulteration of wine seems also to have been extensively practised, for, by a law passed in 1482, the penalty of death was denounced against any person who should import, or sell, or compose corrupted or mixed liquor.

CHAPTER XXII.

JAMES THE FOURTH.

1488—1513.

THE fate of James the Third was for some time unknown to the conspirators, for information had reached them that several of the wounded royalists

had taken refuge on board Sir Andrew Wood's ships, which were lying in the Frith of Forth, near the coast, where the battle of Sauchie was fought; and it was supposed that the king himself was among the number. The confederate barons therefore sent a message to Wood, inquiring whether or not the king was on board his ship. Not satisfied with his explicit declaration that he was not there, they summoned Sir Andrew to come on shore, and appear before their council, which he promised to do on condition that hostages should be given for his safe return. Lords Seton and Fleming accordingly went on board the ships, and Sir Andrew presented himself before the council and the young king in the town of Leith. According to Pitscottie,* as soon as the prince saw the brave seaman, who was a goodly person and richly dressed, he went towards him, and said, "Sir, are you my father?"† "I am not your father," answered Wood, the tears falling from his eyes, "but I was your father's servant while he lived, and shall be so to lawful authority until the day I die." The lords then asked what men they were who had come out of his ships, and again returned to them on the day of the battle. "It was I and my brother," said the undaunted captain, "who were ready to have spent our lives in the king's defence." They then demanded of him, whether the king was on board his ships? To which Sir Andrew replied, with the same firmness, "He is not on board my vessel; would to God he had been there, as I should have taken care to have kept him safe from the traitors, who have murdered him, and whom I trust to see hanged and drawn for their demerits." The members of the council were exceedingly indignant at those contemptuous replies, but they durst not attempt any violence against Sir Andrew, for fear that his sailors would retaliate upon the persons of the hostages. But as soon as the gallant commander had returned on board his ship and Lords Fleming and Seton had been sent on shore, the confederate lords sent for the best officers in the town of Leith, and offered to furnish them with men, artillery, and provisions, if they would attack Sir Andrew and his two ships, and make him prisoner, to answer for his contemptuous treatment of the council.

* Pitscottie, vol. i. p. 226.

† This statement appears extremely improbable, for the prince had been recently placed by his father in Stirling castle, and there is no reason whatever to suppose that James had not been brought up at court.

But the officers positively refused to undertake this perilous service; Captain Barton, one of the bravest mariners in Leith, informing the lords that though Sir Andrew had but two vessels, yet they were so well manned and furnished with artillery, and he himself was so experienced in war, that no ten ships in Scotland would be a match for him.

The confederate lords lost no time in seeking to turn to their own personal advantage the victory they had gained.

On the very day after the battle of Sauchie grants were bestowed on the powerful Border families of the Homes and the Hepburns; Sir William Knollys was instructed to take possession of the money found in the royal treasury; and the Earls of Angus and Argyle, with the Lords Hailes and Home, and the Bishop of Glasgow, repaired to the castle of Edinburgh, and secured and took an inventory of the jewels, plate, and apparel which belonged to the late king at the time of his decease.* After the discovery and interment of his father's body, the prince proceeded immediately to Scone, where he was crowned with the usual ceremonies. The government of the new monarch was then organized, and his confederates in the rebellion, which had raised him to the throne, were rewarded by their appointment to offices of influence and trust. The important office of chancellor was conferred upon the Earl of Argyle; Lord Hailes was made master of the household; the keeping of the privy seal was committed to the Prior of St. Andrews; the Lords Lyle and Glamis were appointed chief justiciars in the south and north of the Forth; and Whitelaw, Sub-dean of Glasgow, was made secretary to the king. Their next care was to conclude a three years' truce with England, then under the government of Henry VII.; and having thus secured themselves against foreign aggression, they proceeded to consolidate their power, and to provide for their safety by arresting and punishing their enemies, and distributing rewards among their friends.

It has sometimes been asserted that the youthful prince was unwillingly compelled to take part in the rebellion against his father, and that he was a mere passive tool in the hands of the conspirators. But James was now in the seventeenth year of his age; his talents and passions were highly precocious; and there seems no reason to doubt that, estranged from his father by the misrepresentations and calumnies of the insurgent chiefs, and flattered by their adulation, he was induced to place himself at the head of a movement which promised to gratify his ambition by elevating him at once to the throne. It is said, indeed, that on learning the miserable fate of his father, he was seized with overwhelming remorse, which returned at intervals throughout the whole of his reign; but it appears that the possession of the crown, the homage of the barons, and the gaieties and pleasures of the court soon stifled his repentant feelings. The unprincipled councillors, by whom he was now surrounded, strove to perpetuate their ascendancy over the youthful monarch, and to conciliate his affections, by basely pandering to his passions, and occupying him with narch, and to conciliate his affections, by basely pandering to his passions, and occupying him with a continual round of shows and gorgeous pageants, totally regardless of the degradation of character and the destruction of moral principle which such vain pursuits necessarily produced. In his progress through the country with the lord justiciars, when they held their courts in various parts of the kingdom, James was constantly attended, not only by his huntsmen and falconers, but by his fool, 'English John,' and his youthful mistress, Lady Margaret Drummond, daughter of Lord Drummond, to whom he seems to have become attached at an early period; and frequent notices appear in the treasurer's books of the sums paid to 'dansaris, gysaris, and players,' who were employed to minister to the amusement of the youthful lovers.

The course which the successful conspirators adopted for the punishment of the barons who had continued faithful to the late king, displayed a great deal of effrontery, combined with low cunning. If either of the two parties were justly liable to be denounced as rebels, it was evidently the confederate lords, and not their opponents; but the treason of the former had been successful, and, therefore, now boldly assumed the name of loyalty, and not contented with proclaiming their own innocence of the recent conflict, and the murder of the king, they threw the whole odium of the rebellion on the barons who had remained faithful to their allegiance, and actually had the audacity to summon them on a charge of treason. The Earl of Buchan, Lords Bothwell and Forbes, Ross of Montgrenan, the king's advocate, Sir Alexander Dunbar, and Sir Thomas Fotheringham, with the Lairds of Cockpule, Amisfield, Innermeith, and Innes, received summonses of treason for appearing 'in arms with the king's father against the king himself,' and were commanded to abide their trial in the next parliament. The meeting of the three Estates took place at Edinburgh on the sixth of October, 1488, and was numerously attended by the clergy, barons, and commissaries of the burghs. After the usual appointment of the Lords of the Articles, and the nomination of a committee, consisting of three members of each Estate, to act as a court of appeal for the decision of legal causes, the Earl of Buchan and the other friends of the late king, were summoned to answer for their alleged treason against their sovereign. The Earl of Buchan alone obeyed the summons; and, on making confession of his guilt, and submitting himself to the royal mercy, he was pardoned and restored to favour. The others were declared guilty of the crimes of having attempted to destroy the independence of the kingdom, and to reduce it under subjection to England, and of having advised their late sovereign, James, to violate the stipulations which he had entered into with the insurgent barons,—the very crimes which the conspirators had themselves committed.*

Sentence of forfeiture was therefore pronounced against them in absence, and their estates were divided among the leaders of the confederates. The lands and lordship of Bothwell were erected into an earldom, and bestowed upon Lord Hailes, the new master of the household; and Patrick Home, of Fastcastle, was rewarded for his services by a grant of the estates of Ross of Montgrenan, who seems to have been peculiarly obnoxious to the prince's party, on account of the bravery which he displayed in a skirmish at the bridge of Stirling, previous to the battle of Sauchie.

Those of the loyal barons who were in possession of hereditary offices, were deprived of them, for the period of three years, in consequence, as was alleged, of the high displeasure conceived by the king against all who, by their presence at the battle of Sauchie, were regarded by him as mainly responsible for the slaughter of his late father. The confederates next proceeded to investigate the causes of the recent rebellion, and voted their own acquittal from all blame in strong and significant terms. It was declared, that the three Estates were unanimously of opinion that the slaughter committed in the field of Stirling, where the king's father happened to be slain with others of his barons, was wholly to be ascribed to the offences, falsehood, and fraud practised by him and his perverse counsellors previous to the battle, and "that our sovereign lord that now is, and the true lords and barons who were with him in the same field, were innocent, quit, and free of the said slaughters, battle, and pursuit, and had no blame in fermenting or exciting them." It was recommended that the great seal of the kingdom, along with the seals of a certain portion of the bishops, barons, and burgesses, should be affixed to this declaration, and that it should be sent to the Pope, the kings of France, Spain, Denmark, and such other realms as were judged expedient by the parliament.† It was also resolved to send an embassy to France, Spain, and Brittany, to confirm the alliance between Scotland and these countries, and to search for a wife to the king; and the sum of five thousand pounds was directed to be levied throughout the kingdom to defray their expenses.

It appears that theft, robbery, and murder were exceedingly prevalent throughout the kingdom at this time, and for the repression of these crimes the kingdom was divided into certain districts, over which were placed various earls and barons, with full authority to apprehend and punish all offenders. Orders were issued, that all the goods and moveables belonging to the 'poor unlanded folk' which had been seized during the troubles, should be restored; that all houses, castles, or lands which had been plundered and occupied by either party during the struggle, should be again delivered to their owners; and, that the heirs of those who had fallen on the king's side in the battle of Stirling, should be permitted to succeed without impediment, to their hereditary estates and honours. All the grants made by the late king, since the 2nd of February, 1487, the day on which the prince took up arms against his father, were revoked, on the ground that they had been made for the benefit of traitors, who had caused the death of the king's father. The office of high chamberlain was bestowed upon Alexander Home, of Home, while the command of Edinburgh castle, with the custody of James, Duke of Ross, the king's brother, was intrusted to Lord Hailes, master of the household.* The castle of Dunbar was ordered to be entirely demolished on account of the injury which it had already occasioned to the country, and the danger that it might again fall into the hands of the enemies of the king. Besides these measures, which were adopted by the dominant party for their own security and the protection of the kingdom, various enactments were passed for the purpose of regulating the due administration of justice, the fineness of gold and silver, and the importation of bullion into the country; and the penalties of treason were denounced against the purchasers of presentations to benefices, at the court of Rome, whether clergy or seculars. These proceedings took place in four successive meetings of the national council, which were held between the 6th of October, 1488, and the 3rd of February, 1489.

One of the most strenuous supporters of the late unfortunate monarch was the stout Lord Lindsay of the Byres, who distinguished himself so zealously in the royal cause before the battle of Sauchie. He was, consequently, very obnoxious to the successful faction, who summoned him to answer on a charge of treason. Pitseottie has given a minute and interesting account of the trial of the rude but honest and loyal baron, which very strikingly illustrates the extraordinary character of the times, and the manner in which justice was at this period administered in Scotland.

On the appointed day† Lord Lindsay and his Trial of Lord associates were solemnly arraigned Lindsay of the before the king and council assembled in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh; Byres. Lord Lindsay's name being first specified in the summons, because, as it was alleged, he had been "the most familiar friend" of the late monarch, "and was frackest [freest] in his opinion, and used himself maist manfully in his defence aganes his enemies, wherefore the conspirators had greatest envy at him." . . . "Lord David Lindsay, of the Byres" so ran the "dittay," or bill of indictment, "answer for the cruel coming aganes the king at Bannockburn, with his father, and in giving him counsel to have devoured his son, the king's grace here present, and to that effect gave him ane sword and ane good horse to fortify him aganes his son. Your answer hereto!"

Now Lord Lindsay "being ane rash man, and of rude language, albeit he was stout and hardy in the fields, and weill exercised in war," was totally unacquainted with legal forms and usages, and knew not how to answer formally to this accusation, nor could he get any lawyer to speak for him, as they all declined the perilous office of pleading for a traitor. At last, however, wearied with hearing his name repeatedly called, and the dittay read, he started up, and spoke as follows:—

"Ye are all lurdanes,* my lords! I say ye are false traitors to your prince, and that I will prove, with my hands, on any of you whilk holds you best, from the king's grace down. For ye, false lurdanes! hes caused the king to come aganes his father in plain battle, where that noble prince was cruely murdered among your hands by your advice, though ye brought the prince in presence for your behoof, to make him the buckler of your enterprise. Therefore, false lurdanes! an the king punish you not hastily for that murther, ye will murther himself, when ye see time, as ye did his father. Therefore sir," he continued, turning to the young king, who presided in person at the trial, "beware of them, and give them no credence; for they that were false to your father, can never be true to yourself. Sir, I assure your grace if your father were yet alive, I would take his part, and stand in no awe of thir (these) false lurdanes; and likewise, gif ye had ane son that wald be counsellit to come in battle against you by evil counsel of false traitors like thir, I wald surely take your part, and fight in your quarrel aganes them; even with three aganes six of thir false traitors, wha cause your grace to believe evil of me. Time shall try (prove) me to be truer at length nor (than) any of them."

The chancellor, "hearing the gross, and rude speech, and sharp accusation" of Lord Lindsay, thought "he hit them over near; therefore to excuse the matter, he answerit and spake to the King in this manner:—"Sir Lord David Lindsay is but ane man of the auld world, and cannot answer formally, nor yet speak reverently in your grace's presence. Your grace maun (must) be guid to him, and I traist (trust) he will come in your will." And then turning to the incensed veteran, he recommended him to submit himself to the king's pleasure, and he should be well treated.

"Thir words," says Pitseottie, "were spoken purposely to cause Lord David Lindsay come in the king's will, that it might be ane preparative to all the rest that were under the summons of forfeiture (forfeiture) to follow, and to come in the king's will; and thought to have cuttled (tickled) them off that way.

† The 10th of January, 1489, according to Pitseottie. Fisherton is of opinion that the trial took place after the insurrection of the Earl of Lennox and Lord Forbes, which broke out in the summer and autumn of 1489.

"But ane Maister Patrick Lindsay, brother-german to the Lord David Lindsay," and the most eminent "forspeaker," or advocate of that day, "hearing his brother desiryt to come in the king's will, was not content therewith; to that effect he stramped (trode) sadly on his brother's foot, to gar (make) him understand that he was not content with the desire whilk the chancellor proponit to him. But the stramp of Maister Patrick was sa sad upon his brother's foot, wha had ane sair tae, that the pain thereof was very dolorous, wherfore he lookit to him and said, 'Thou art ower pert loon, to stramp upon my foot; wert thou out of the king's presence, I should take thee on the mouth.'"

Mr. Patrick, however, disregarding his brother's "vain words," "plat on his knees" before the court, and in the name of God, besought for leave to speak in his brother's behalf; "for he and I," said he, "hes not been at ane thir mony years, yet my heart may not suffer me to see the native house, wherof I am descendit, perish."

"Sa the king and the justice gave him leave to speak for his brother. Then the said Maister Patrick raise aff his knees, and was very blythe that he had obtained this licence with the king's favour. Sa he began to speak very reverently in this manner, saying to the haill lords of parliament, and to the rest of them that were accusers of his brother at that time, with the rest of the lords that were in the summons of forfaultry, saying: 'I beseeke you all, my lords, that be here present, for His sake that will give sentence and judgement on us all at the last day, that ye will remember that now instantly is your time, and we have had the same in times bygane, as we may also have hereafter; desiring you to know your awin estate, and that all things are changeable, but God's justice and judgement stands ever firm and stable; therefore now, do ye as ye wald be done to, in the ministratation of justice to your neighbours and brethren, wha are accused of their lives and heritages this day, whose judgement stands in your hands. Therefore, beware in time, and open not a door that ye may not steek (shut)."

The chancellor then bade him say something in defence of his brother, assuring him that he should have justice at their hands. Mr. Patrick replied by a protest against the king's sitting in judgment on the case, as a violation of his coronation oath that he would not sit in judgment on his lords and barons, in any action in which he was a party himself. "But here," he observed, "his grace is both party and was at the committing of the crime himself, therefore he ought not, neither by the law of God nor man, to sit in judgment at this time, therefore, we desire him, in the name of God, to rise and depart out of judgment while (till) the matter be farther disputit conform to justice."

"Upon this," continues the chronicler, "the chancellor and lords concludit that this petition was reasonable, therefore they desiryt the king to rise up and pass to the Inner Tolbooth, whilk was very unpleasant to him for the time, being ane young prince, sitting upon seat royal, to be raisit be his subjects. But the lords, thinking shame to break justice, removed him on this manner, and then callit upon Lord David Lindsay and his procurator, Maister Patrick Lindsay, to answer forward to the points of the summons and dittay therein contained."

Then Mr. Patrick, speaking "with humility," yet reminding them not the less "that we have been in the place wherein ye are now," proceeded to show that the summons required that the persons specified in it should appear within forty days, without continuation (prolongation) of days, "and that as forty-one had elapsed, they could not legally be compelled to answer till summoned anew."

The summons was examined, and found to run as Mr. Patrick stated; the prisoners were released, therefore, and no further steps were ever taken against them. Lord Lindsay, in particular, was "sablythe at his brother's sayings," that, forgetting his sore toe, and the heavy stramp of Mr. Patrick's foot, he rapturously "burst forth, saying to him, 'Verily brother, ye have fine pyet [magpie] words! I could not have trowit (believed) that ye had sic words. By Sancta Marie! ye shall have the Mains of Kirkforthar for your days' labour.'" The king, as may be supposed, was far from being equally captivated; he told Mr. Patrick that "he should gar him sit where he should not see his feet for a year," and accordingly threw him into the castle of Rothesay in Bute, where he remained in prison a whole twelvemonth ere he was released.*

In spite of the parliamentary acquittal of the young king and his accomplices from the murder of the late monarch, their innocence was far from being generally admitted. There was still, to use the language of a subsequent parliament, "heavy murmurs and noise of the people respecting the slaughter of our sovereign lord's father;" and scarcely had the national ^{Revolt of} council terminated its sittings ^{Lennox and} when Lennox, Huntley, Mareschal, ^{other barons—}

Forbes, and other powerful chiefs, broke into open revolt. They complained, and apparently on good grounds, that the youthful monarch was entirely in the hands of his father's murderers, who violated the laws with impunity, and carried on the government for the advancement of their own selfish purposes, without any regard for the public welfare. Lord Forbes, one of the malecontent barons, marched through the northern district of the country, displaying the bloody shirt of the unfortunate king suspended from a spear, and calling for vengeance on his murderers; and great multitudes of the people, roused by this appeal, flocked to his banner. The insurrection rapidly gathered strength, and seriously threatened the stability of the throne. But the young king and his advisers acted with great promptitude and decision. The Chancellor Argyle was despatched with all speed to attack the strong fortress of Dunbarton, into which Lord Lyle and Matthew Stewart, the eldest son of

* Pitscottie, vol. i. pp. 232-239.

Lennox, had thrown themselves; while James himself laid siege to the castles of Crockstone and Duchal, which had been occupied by the insurgents; and so vigorously did he carry on his operations, that within a short period he made himself master of both places. Meanwhile the Earl of Lennox had collected about two thousand men in the northern districts, and having descended into the low country, was marching toward Dunbarton, where the Earl Mareschal, with Lords Forbes and Crichton, and the Master of Huntley, waited his arrival. But on reaching the northern bank of the Forth, opposite to Stirling, he found that his enemies had seized the bridge and occupied the town in considerable force. He therefore marched to the westward with the view of crossing the Forth by a ford not far from the source of the river, and encamped at a place called Tala Moss, about sixteen miles from Stirling. Here he was surprised,

—its speedy and completely routed in a night suppression. attack by Lord Drummond; Dunbarton, Lennox's strongest hold, immediately surrendered, and the insurgent leaders laid down their arms, and were not only pardoned, but soon after reinstated in the royal favour.

Tranquillity was now restored to the kingdom, and the popularity of the government was greatly increased by a brilliant naval victory gained at this time by the celebrated Sir Andrew Exploits of Sir Andrew Wood. Wood. In spite of the truce which still existed between England and Scotland, the English privateers continued to infest the Scottish seas, obstructing the commerce, plundering the merchantmen, and committing great depredations upon the coast towns. Five of these pirate vessels had entered the Clyde, and after committing great havoc among the shipping, and ravaging the adjacent country, had the audacity to give chase to a vessel which was the king's own property. Indignant at this unprovoked outrage, James applied for assistance to Sir Andrew Wood, and urged him to undertake the duty of protecting the commerce of the country from these piratical attacks. Notwithstanding his devoted attachment to the late king, and his disapprobation of the course pursued by his son, the brave and patriotic officer could not refuse to comply with this request to vindicate the honour of his country. He immediately set sail with his two ships, the Flower and the Yellow Carvel, in search of the enemy, whom he found at anchor off the town of Dunbar; and notwithstanding his inferiority in force, after a stubborn conflict he captured the five piratic vessels, and brought them in triumph into Leith.*

Henry VII. was highly incensed at this defeat; and though he could not openly resent it or give countenance to hostilities during the continuance of the truce, he took care to make his wishes known to his naval officers; and Stephen Bull, his most active and experienced sea-captain, fitted out three stout vessels, well manned and fully equipped with cross-bows and other warlike implements, and proceeded in search of the Scottish commander. Bull having learned that Wood had sailed for Flanders, resolved to intercept him on his return; and directing his course to the mouth of the Firth of Forth, he cast anchor behind the small island of May, and waited the arrival of his enemy. In no long time, two vessels appeared off St. Abb's Head; and the English captain, having been assured by some fishermen, whom he had taken prisoners for that purpose, that it was Wood who was approaching, immediately prepared for action, and caused an allowance of wine to be served out to his sailors. The Scottish admiral drew near, totally unconscious that any interruption awaited him; but as soon as he perceived the English vessels, he ordered his ships to be cleared, and the gunners, pike and cross-bow men, and those who threw fire-balls, to repair to their several stations; and bore fearlessly down upon the enemy. "By this," says Pitscottie, "the sun begun to rise and shine bright on the sails, so the English ships appeared very awful in the sight of the Scots, by reason their ships were great and strong, and well furnished with great artillery. But the Scots, nothing effeired therewith, came stoutly forward upon the wind side, upon Captain Bull, and clipped fra hand, and fought there fra the rising of the sun till the going down of the same, in the long summer's day, while all the men and women that dwelt near the coast-side stood and beheld the fighting, whilk was terrible to see." Night parted the combatants, but next morning the trumpets sounded, and the battle was renewed with such fury, that the mariners forgetting everything else in their eagerness for victory, allowed their ships to drift with the ebb tide till they were carried to the mouth of the Tay. At length victory declared for the Scottish captain; the three English ships were captured and carried into Dundee, where they remained till the dead were buried and the wounded placed under surgical care. Sir Andrew then presented his prisoners to the king, who received them with great courtesy, and dismissed them without ransom. At the same time, however, according to Pitscottie, he sent a message to the English monarch, that if his captains "came again on sic form to perturb his coasts, it might be they would not be so weill entertained, nor loup (leap) home so dryshod.*" The brave Sir Andrew was liberally rewarded for his gallant achievement, and became the king's most honoured friend and trusted counsellor.

The English monarch Henry the Seventh, was remarkable for his sagacity, caution, command of temper, and love of peace; and as the English were the aggressors in the recent naval conflict, he could not make the defeat of Bull a matter of open complaint. But there can be no doubt that he was deeply mortified at the untoward result, and it is by no means improbable that the desire of vengeance for the dishonour thus done to the English arms was one of the causes that induced him to give his secret countenance to a foul conspiracy against the Scottish monarch, which was at this time fostered at the English court. The details of this disgraceful transaction are involved in considerable obscurity, but there is abundant evidence to prove the nefarious character of the plot and the complicity of the English king. It appears that the Earl of Buchan, Ramsay Lord Bothwell, the favourite of James the Third, who after the battle of Sauchie had fled to England, and a 'person designing himself Sir Thomas Tod, of the realm of Scotland,' with various other traitors, had entered into an agreement with Henry the Seventh to deliver into his hands the Scottish king and his brother, the Duke of Ross, and that to assist them in this enterprize Henry had advanced the loan of two hundred and sixty pounds, which, however, with his characteristic cantion and love of money, he carefully stipulated was to be repaid to him by a certain day.* The whole of this transaction seems to have been involved in the most profound darkness; and James and his ministers could have had no suspicion of the treacherous behaviour of the English monarch, for at the moment when this plot was concocted the Archbishop of St. Andrews had been despatched on an embassy to England, and commissioners were engaged in settling some complaints respecting the mutual violations of the truce upon the Borders, and in making arrangements for the prolongation of the amicable relations existing between the two kingdoms.

A meeting of parliament was held soon after this at Edinburgh, and various important measures were passed with the view of promoting the peace and prosperity of the country. It was resolved to send ambassadors to France and to Denmark, for the purpose of renewing the ancient commercial alliances between these countries and Scotland. The Earl of Huntley was appointed king's lieutenant north of the water of Esk, till the sovereign should reach the age of twenty-five. Punishment was denounced against all who were guilty of slaughter or rapine; leagues or bands among the nobles and their feudal tenantry were forbidden; and strict injunctions were issued, that the chancellor, with certain lords of council, or in their absence the lords of session, should sit three times a year for the administration of justice. It was also ordained that the profits and rents of the royal burghs should be spent according to the advice of the council of the burgh, upon things necessary for its security and increase; whilst the burgh rents, such as lands, fishings, mills, and farms, were not to be disposed of, except upon a three years' lease. Sheriffs, bailies, and provosts of burghs were commanded to take copies of the acts and statutes now passed, and to see that they were openly proclaimed within the bounds of their office.*

James had now attained his twentieth year, and began to exhibit considerable ability and energy in the administration of the affairs of his kingdom. Amid a love of pleasure, which his counsellors had basely fostered and indulged to serve their own selfish purposes, he did not so far forget himself as to neglect the duties of his office. His frank and generous disposition made him deservedly popular among all classes of his subjects, and he assiduously devoted himself to promote the impartial administration of justice, and the introduction of law and order into the remotest parts of his kingdom. By his judicious and energetic efforts many gross abuses were rectified, crime was punished and repressed, law vindicated, and the agriculture and the commerce of the country, the navy, the fisheries, and the manufactures, were all encouraged and developed. A pleasing picture of the character and habits of the youthful monarch is given by Pitscottie, who, however, does injustice to James III. in the contrast which he draws between his reign and that of his successor. "In this mean time," says that venerable chronicler, "was guid peace and rest in Scotland, and great love betwixt the king and his subjects, and he was weill loved of them all, for he was very noble, and thought that the vice of covetousness reigned over meikle in his father, whilk should nocht reign in him; nor yet no cowards nor pickthanks should be authorized nor advanced in his company; neither used he the counsel but of his lords, whereby he wan the hearts of the whole nobility, sa that he wald ride out—through any pairt of the realm, him alone, unknown that he was ane king, and wald lig (lie) in puir men's houses as he had been ane traveller through the country, and wald require of them where he ludged where the king was, and what ane man he was, and how he used himself towards his subjects, and what they spake of him through the country, and they wald answer to him as they thought guid. Sa, by thir doings the king heard the common bruit (report) of himself. This prince was wondrous hardy and diligent in the execution of justice, and loved nathing sac weil as able men and guid horses; therefore, at sundry times, he wald gar make proclamation through the land to all and sundry his lords and barons wha were able for justing or tourney, to come to Edinburgh to him, and there to exercise themselves for his pleasure; some to rin with the spear, and some to fecht with the battle-ax, some with the two-handit sword, and some with the hand-bow, and all other exercise. heard the knightly fame of the Prince of Scotland. But few or none of them passed away unmatched, and oftentimes overthrown.*

It was evident that as James grew older he became convinced of the fatal errors of his early years, and felt deep remorse for having lent himself to a selfish and unprincipled faction, who, under the pretence of the love of their country and of liberty, sought merely their own aggrandisement. But he had learned wisdom from the errors of his unfortunate father, and aware that he could not put down by force the powerful and triumphant faction which had placed him on the throne, he adopted the safer course of gradually withdrawing his confidence from them, and collecting around him the sagacious and trustworthy Sir Andrew Wood, and other friends and ministers of his father. He cautiously abstained, however, from manifesting his alienation from his early associates so openly as to drive them into opposition, and by a judicious combination of firmness with kindness, he succeeded in reconciling the various hostile factions among his nobility, and in maintaining his authority over them all, so that he was revered as well as beloved by all classes of his people. The haughty and turbulent Earl of Angus, who had been resented so highly the coldness with which he and his associates were now treated, that he withdrew for a season into England, and entered into a treasonable treaty with Henry VII. On his return, however, he was committed a prisoner to his own fortress of Tantallon, and, as the price of his pardon, was compelled to exchange the lordship of Liddesdale and the strong castle of Hermitage for the lordship and castle of Bothwell, which was a considerable diminution of the family greatness. The displeasure of the king was increased by the slaughter of Spens, of Kilspindie, a favourite courtier, who about this time fell in a casual encounter with Angus. The incident is thus related by Godscroft. "Spens, a renowned cavalier, had been present in court, when the Earl of Angus was highly praised for strength and valour. 'It may be,' answered Spens, 'if all be good that is up-comer;' insinuating that the courage of the earl might not answer the promise of his gigantic frame. Shortly after, Angus, while hawking near Borthwick, with a single attendant, met Kilspindie. 'What reason had ye,' said the earl, 'for making question of my manhood? Thou art a tall fellow, and so am I: and by St. Bride of Douglas, one of us shall pay for it!' 'Since it may be no better,' answered Kilspindie, 'I will defend myself against the best earl in Scotland.' With these words they encountered fiercely, till Angus with one blow severed the thigh of his antagonist, who died upon the spot. The earl then addressed the attendant of Kilspindie: 'Go thy way: tell my gossip, the king, that here was nothing but fair play. I know my gossip will be offended; but I will get me into Liddesdale and remain in my castle of the Hermitage till his anger be abated.' It was no easy task for a monarch of twenty to maintain the royal authority over such turbulent and lawless chieftains, who, if they possessed many of the virtues of the 'savage state, exhibited also much of its ferocity.

It appears that the injunctions given to the Bishop of Glasgow, and certain Theft of the barons, to place the jewels and royal treasure. treasure of the late king in the hands of faithful persons, had been very imperfectly obeyed, and that the greater part of the treasure had disappeared. Inquiry was now ordered to be made for the detection of the thieves by whom it had been embezzled or stolen; and the persons to whom the money had been entrusted were commanded to appear before the king's council, to answer for their neglect of their duty.† About this time, in consequence of the 'heavy murmurs' of the people respecting the impunity granted to the murderers of the late king, a reward of one hundred marks' worth of land in fee and heritage, was offered to any person who should discover the individual by whom the crime was perpetrated.‡ The sum was only to be paid, however, in the event of the persons being pointed out who slew the king 'with their own hands,' and as the reward was never claimed, the actual murderer of the unhappy monarch remains still unknown. James had applied in his distress to the Romish pontiff for assistance, and Innocent VIII., who then occupied the papal chair, formally excommunicated the rebels during the lifetime of the king. It appears that some time after the battle of Stirling, The rebels receive absolution from the pope. they petitioned the pope for absolution, acknowledging their guilt, and Innocent accordingly issued a bull, dated the 27th of June, 1491, empowering the Abbots of Jedburgh and Paisley, and the Chancellor of the Church of Glasgow, at their discretion, to absolve the penitents, restore to them the sacraments, and reunite them to the body of the church on due expression of contrition and pledge of penitence.*

The Scottish king showed himself as vigilant in guarding against the encroachments of the papal court, as he was resolute in maintaining his royal authority over his own subjects. In a parliament held at Edinburgh, in the month of May, 1493, various enactments were passed for the purpose of protecting the privileges of the Scottish church, and the rights of the king in the disposal of his ecclesiastical patronage. Regulations were framed with the view of preventing all interference upon the part of the pope with the king's appointment to vacant benefices; and all opposition to these regulations was declared to be an act of treason. The Bishops of St. Andrews and Glasgow had, a few years before, been raised to the archiepiscopal dignity—their privileges were now ratified, and they were empowered to confirm the election of abbots within their dioceses without waiting for the authority of the papal court. These rival prelates had been for some time engaged in a violent litigation before the pope, respecting their jurisdiction, the expense of which, it was declared, had been attended with 'inestimable damage to the realm,' and some apprehensions seem to have been entertained, that the one party or the other might be induced to make undue concessions to gain the favour of the Romish court. The parliament, therefore, requested the king to interfere, and to command the litigants to withdraw their suit from the foreign tribunal, and to submit to the decision of the king; under the penalty that, if they refuse to obey, their tenants shall be interdicted from paying their rents.† It would appear that at this time not a few, both of the clergy and laity, had pleas depending in the papal court, by appeals from the Scottish ecclesiastical tribunals; and the parliament recommended the king to join the litigants, by his ambassadors, to withdraw their pleas, and submit them to the ordinary judges in their own country, and impartial justice should be administered to them. The ancient law was re-enacted, which prohibited any papal legate from entering the realm, unless a cardinal or a native of Scotland. Some enactments were also passed at this time for the regulation of manufactures and commerce, and of the coinage and importation of bullion. For the encouragement of the fisheries of the kingdom, and on account of 'the great and innumerable riches' which are lost for the want of ships and boats, with their appropriate nets and tackling, the parliament judged it proper that ships and fishing boats, of not less than twenty tons, should be built and equipped by all the burghs and sea-coast towns; and that all stout, idle men should be pressed to serve on board these vessels, under the penalty of banishment in case of refusal. Great anxiety seems to have been felt that James should, without delay, form a matrimonial alliance; doubtless in expectation that such a union would operate as a restraint upon his licentious passions. The proposal was renewed to send ambassadors to France, Spain, and other countries to seek a suitable bride for the young king; and, in addition to the tax already agreed to for the purpose of defraying the expense of the embassy, it was declared that a thousand pounds additional should be given 'for the honourable home-bringing of a queen.'

The state of the Highlands now occupied much of the king's attention, and the measures which he adopted for the introduction of law and order into these wild and remote districts, were certainly wise and salutary. Some time before this, Alexander of Lochalsh, nephew and heir to John, the aged Lord of the Isles, had endeavoured to recover by force of arms the coveted earldom of Ross; and after ravaging the country, and carrying off a vast booty, was defeated by the Mackenzies at a place called Blairneparck, near the river Conan. It does not appear how far the Lord of the Isles was himself implicated in the rebellious proceedings of his nephew, but either on account of his connection with this rebellion, or because it was the object of the government to break up the confederacy of the islanders, which had so often disturbed the tranquillity of the country, the parliament, which met in 1493, deprived this powerful chief of his title and estates. In the month of January following he appeared before the king, and made a formal surrender of his lordship. The aged nobleman appears to have remained for some time in the king's household, but he finally retired to the Abbey of Paisley about the year 1498.*

Immediately after the forfeiture of the great island chief, James proceeded in person to the west Highlands, to receive the submission of his vassals. Experience had shown that the personal presence of the sovereign was calculated to exercise the most beneficial influence on the minds of the inhabitants of these wild and inaccessible regions; and on two different occasions, in the year 1490, James rode from Perth, across the chain of mountains known by the name of the 'Mounth,' which extends from the border of the Mearns to the head of Loch Rannoch. During the present visit he penetrated as far as Dunstaffnage and Mingarry in Ardnachurchan, and received the submission of Alexander of Lochalsh, the principal leader of the late insurrection; John of Isla; John Maclean of Lochbuy; Duncan Mackintosh, captain of the clan Chattan; and other powerful chiefs who were formerly vassals of the Lord of the Isles. In return, the king conferred on them, by royal charters, grants of the lands which they had formerly held under their feudal superior, thus rendering them independent of any subject; and the two former received the honour of knighthood.

As some of the most powerful of these chiefs had not made their submission, the king resolved to return next year with a force sufficient to overawe and reduce them to obedience. The voyage, which took place in April and May, 1494, was conducted with great pomp and ceremony. The king was attended by his chief ministers and household, many of whom had fitted out vessels at their own expense. The splendour of the armament impressed the islanders with a high idea of the royal wealth and power; the promptitude and vigour with which James punished those who braved his power, inspired terror, while the clemency he displayed towards those who submitted to his authority, and his condescension and familiarity with all classes of his subjects increased his popularity, and strengthened his authority. During this excursion, the youthful monarch gratified his passion for sailing and hunting, and thereby relieved the tedium of business by combining with it agreeable and innocent recreation.

In the course of the year 1494, James visited the Isles no less than three times, so great was his anxiety to establish the authority of law and government in these remote districts. On arriving, on his first voyage, at Tarbert in Kintyre, he repaired the fort originally built there by his great ancestor Robert Bruce, and provided it with artillery and skilful gunners. On his return, in the month of July, he seized the castle of Dunaverty, in South Kintyre, and placed a garrison in it for the purpose of overawing the rude and turbulent chiefs of that district. This step gave great offence to Sir John of Isla, who is supposed to have entertained the hope of regaining the possession of Kintyre, which had at one time belonged to his family; and on the first favourable opportunity, he collected his followers, stormed the castle, and hanged the governor over the wall in the sight of the king and his fleet. This savage revolt took James completely by surprise; and, as the greater portion of his followers had been sent away on some other expedition, he was unable to inflict immediate punishment on this insolent rebel. But so promptly were measures taken for the vindication of his insulted authority, that in a short time Sir John of Isla, and four of his sons, were apprehended and conveyed to Edinburgh. Here they were brought to trial, found guilty of treason, and executed on the Borough-muir. Their lands and possessions were forfeited to the crown.*

In the following year, another powerful expedition was undertaken to the Isles, and on the 18th of May, the king held his court, for the second time within two years, at the remote castle of Mingarry, in Ardnamurchan. John Hughson, of Sleat; Donald Angus, son of Keppock, the chief of Clanranald; Maclean, of Dowart; Ewen Allanson, of Lochiel, captain of the clan Cameron; and Macneill, of Barra, finding it in vain to resist the powerful force which the king had led into the midst of their island fastnesses, made their submission. Mackenzie, of Kintail; and Farquhar Macintosh, son and heir of the captain of the clan Chattan, were seized and imprisoned in the castle of Edinburgh. These vigorous measures were followed up by an important act of the Lords of Council, which provided, that when civil actions were raised against the islanders, the chief of every clan should be answerable for the due execution of summonses and other writs against those of his own tribe, under the penalty of being made liable himself to the party bringing the action. This measure, which was rendered necessary by the disturbed state of the Isles, must have had a most beneficial effect; for, in those wild and remote districts, a strong military escort was necessary to enable the officers of the law to perform their necessary duties in safety.*

The character of James, however, though distinguished by a noble love of justice, and a sincere desire to promote the happiness of his people, was weakened by a cast of romance, and a fondness for adventure, which rendered him often the dupe of the designing, and engaged him in enterprises alike impolitic and hazardous. An unhappy example of this defect was now given in the arduous Origin and character of Perkin Warbeck. with which he adopted the cause of Perkin Warbeck, who, as the pretended son of Edward IV. laid claim to the crown of England. The early history of this specious impostor is involved in an obscurity which tended, doubtless, to support his deception; but it is generally believed that his father was a renegade Jew of Tournay, who occasionally visited England, for the purpose of trade. Perkin was born in England; but while still very young, he left that country for France, and in company with his father, led for many years an unsettled and wandering life, but acquiring a knowledge of the world, which proved eminently useful in his subsequent career. A striking resemblance to Edward IV., combined with a noble presence, graceful manners, pleasing conversation, and great skill in adapting himself to circumstances, seem early to have attracted notice, and suggested to Margaret, Duchess of Burgundy, the determined enemy of the House of Lancaster, and of Henry VII., a plan for reviving the claims of the House of York in the person of Warbeck. The young adventurer entered willingly into her schemes, and qualified himself, by a residence at her court, for the part he was expected to perform; while Margaret and her protégé eagerly awaited the propitious moment for some decisive step in favour of their object. On the breaking out of war between England and France, Warbeck left Burgundy for Ireland, where the House of York had still many ardent friends. He announced himself as Richard Plantagenet, son of Edward IV.; gave a specious account of his escape from the cruelty of his uncle Richard III., and by artful appeals to the loyalty of the Irish people, he succeeded in attaching to his cause the Earls of Desmond and Kildare, an-

the greater part of the native population. In France his success was equally great, for whatever credit Charles VIII. might attach to his pretensions, it was obviously the policy of that monarch to strengthen the interests of so dangerous a rival to Henry VII. with whom he was then at war. Warbeck was accordingly invited to the French court, and received, on his arrival, not only the welcome of a sovereign, but had a pension and a residence assigned to him along with a guard of honour, of which Lord Coneressault became the captain. On the conclusion of peace between France and England, Perkin, though still secretly favoured by Charles, was compelled to retire to Flanders, where he anxiously awaited the progress of events in the English kingdom. These, for a time, inspired him with the highest hopes of success. The faction of York, though broken, was still powerful, while the policy of Henry had diffused such a general spirit of discontent among the nobles, that many were eager to dethrone and punish the enemy of their order. Warbeck accordingly received numerous visits and secret promises of support from some of the chief barons of England; and the conspiracy for the assertion of his claims to the English crown became daily more extensive and formidable. The treachery of Lord Clifford, however, who basely betrayed to Henry the names and plans of the conspirators, broke up the confederacy ere it was ripe for action, and the summary execution of the leaders for high treason, inflicted a blow on the cause of Warbeck from which it never recovered. A desperate, but unsuccessful attempt, with a motley band of robbers, outlaws, and pirates, to invade England through Kent, a district supposed to be highly favourable to his cause, completed his discouragements, and compelled him, once more, to return to Flanders. In Ireland, the nature of the country, so favourable to a desultory and protracted system of warfare, enabled his friends, who were still numerous and powerful, to maintain the contest with the forces of Henry; and Warbeck left Flanders for that country, in the hope that, by some decisive victory, his fortune might revive; but the masterly soldier-ship of Sir Edward Poynings, whom Henry had appointed governor of the island, soon rendered his prospects well-nigh desperate, and he turned to the Scottish king as the forlorn hope of his cause. On the sixth of November, 1494, James received notice that the Prince of England proposed visiting his dominions; and a prompt and friendly reply having been returned, Warbeck

His visit to Scotland. shortly after sailed for Scotland.

There is good reason to believe, however, that the connexion of James with the cause of the Flemish adventurer commenced at a much earlier period. The friendly relations between the courts of Burgundy and Scotland afforded ample opportunities for intercourse, nor does it seem likely that Margaret would overlook the aid of a prince, whose chivalrous character and proximity to England rendered his adherence to the cause of York a matter of the last importance. Negotiations appear to have been begun as early as 1488, when Sir Richard Hardelston and Richard Ludelay de Ireland visited Scotland on a mission from the duchess; and though Warbeck was for some time almost entirely engrossed with his schemes in England and Ireland, the reception at the Scottish court, first of Edward Ormond, and subsequently of O'Donnel, Prince of Tirconnel, as the envoys of Warbeck, indicate with sufficient clearness the adherence of James to the cause of the alleged Prince of York. A simultaneous rising of the friends of Warbeck in Ireland and England, and the invasion of the latter country by a powerful Scottish army, seem at one time to have been agreed upon; but the treachery of Clifford prevented the movement. James, indeed, was fully prepared to credit the pretensions of Warbeck, which, besides being supported by the courts of Burgundy and France, had so many attractions for his romantic turn of mind; and the disasters which had attended the course of the adventurer in his attempts on the English crown, only strengthened his generous interest in the unfortunate refugee, and his resolution to support his claims. He, therefore, coldly declined the pacific overtures of Henry VII., who offered him his daughter, the Princess Margaret, in marriage,* and proceeded to make arrangements for war.

Warbeck arrived in Scotland in the month of November, 1495, and was received with all the honours due to a prince. The castle of Stirling, which had been elegantly fitted up in the prospect of his visit, was assigned to him as a place of residence, and a monthly pension of one hundred and twelve pounds from the exchequer enabled him to maintain a state and retinue befitting his presumed rank. Any doubt that may be supposed to have lingered in the mind of James, respecting the truth of Perkin's story, was entirely removed by intercourse with his guest, whose specious manners, imposing person, and well sustained semblance of injured greatness, deepened the impression which his misfortunes and his appeal to the protection of the Scottish monarch had already produced. James treated Warbeck with all the familiarity of an equal, entertained him with tournaments and joustings; and for the purpose of securing the hearty co-operation of his own subjects in the coming war with England, he conducted the stranger through the most populous parts of the kingdom, where his appearance and manners had a powerful effect in exciting the sympathies of the nation. Shortly after, the Scottish king gave the most convincing proof of his attachment to Warbeck and his belief in his claims, by bestowing upon him the hand of Lady Catherine Gordon, a daughter of the Earl of Huntley, who, besides being the most beautiful and accomplished woman in Scotland, was nearly related to the royal family.

The invasion of England being now resolved upon, James, with characteristic promptitude, proceeded to collect his forces. An order was issued summoning the whole military strength of his kingdom to assemble at Lauder; and the king busied himself in collecting as efficient a train of artillery as the age and country could furnish. Messengers were also despatched to Ireland to acquaint the friends of Warbeck there with this formidable movement in his favour, and to invite them to persevere in the contest with the forces of Henry, and, if possible, to strengthen the army of James; while constant communication was kept up with the barons on the English border, whose attachment to the house of York was likely to secure their co-operation in the enterprise.* The confidence of the king was farther increased and his forces strengthened by the arrival of two Flemish vessels from the Duchess of Burgundy, containing sixty German men-at-arms, and a large store of military accoutrements and weapons.

Having at last completed his preparations, the Scottish king proceeded to the south, at the head of his army, accompanied by Warbeck, who adopted the title of the Duke of York. Before crossing the border, James halted at Ellam Kirk, and formally declared war against England, while his ally drew up and dispersed a manifesto addressed to his subjects, in which his own claims were artfully put forth, the usurpation and tyranny of Henry denounced, the aid of the English people to restore the rightful possessor of the throne earnestly implored, and ample promises were made that all the grievances which the mal-administration of the present king had produced should be immediately redressed. The result of this expedition was sufficiently mortifying to the Scottish monarch, but by no means surprising, as it arose from causes which only his hasty and over-confident temper had led him to overlook. Warbeck's pretensions, at no time popular in England, had been greatly weakened by his previous failures; the searching investigations of Henry had discovered the lowness of his birth and the falsehood of his story, and the dread inspired by the vengeance inflicted on his former supporters, effectually repressed any manifestation of interest even on the part of those who were favourably inclined to his cause. To these feelings was added the powerful element of national hostility. The presence of a Scottish army in England provoked the indignation of the inhabitants; and they viewed with disgust an adventurer, supported only by their hereditary foes and a motley gathering of Flemish stipendiaries and border thieves, and who, in the prosecution of his claims, did not hesitate to expose their country to all the evils of a hostile inroad. James was doomed, therefore, to encounter only coldness and aversion, where he expected to be hailed with enthusiasm; and incensed at a result so different from his expectations, he completed the unpopularity of his ally by subjecting the district of Northumberland to plunder and devastation. So unsparing were his ravages, that Warbeck, either from real or affected compassion, ventured to intercede for his subjects, as he continued to call them; but the Scottish monarch, who now saw the futility of the project in which he had embarked, replied with a sneer, "You are too merciful to interest yourself for a people who are so tardy in acknowledging you for a sovereign."* Having satiated his vengeance, and feeling satisfied that Failure of the expedition must be abandoned, James, on learning that an army was mustering to attack him, returned to his own dominions, where, amid the gaieties of his court, he endeavoured to lose the remembrance of his failure.

Meanwhile Henry, indignant at the invasion of his kingdom and its cause, had taken instant measures for driving back the enemy, and retaliating, by a similar incursion into Scotland. The retreat of James, however, removed the principal occasion of his anxieties; and as hostilities between the two countries, though still carried on, were now confined to occasional forays on the part of the border chiefs, he resolved, with his usual prudence, rather to procure peace, if possible, by negotiation, than to trust to the chances of a long and hazardous war. He renewed his proposals, therefore, at the close of the following summer, for a marriage between James and his daughter Margaret, as the bond of a lasting truce between the two countries; but he required, as a necessary condition, the abandonment of Warbeck's cause, and the surrender of his person. These overtures were in the main acceptable to the Scottish king. The advantages of an alliance with Henry were obvious; his ardour in the cause of his guest had greatly cooled and he had now abandoned all hopes of success; but, with the characteristic generosity of his nature, he shrunk from betraying one who had claimed his protection, and trusted implicitly to his honour. The removal of Warbeck from Scotland, however, became now a matter of urgent necessity, as his presence, besides causing a profitless and unpopular war, occasioned an amount of expense which the treasury of the kingdom was unable to sustain. Arrangements were accordingly made for his departure; but to divert attention from his own purpose, and to secure the safety of Warbeck, James affected not only to decline the proposals of Henry, but even entered England with a powerful force, and a considerable train of artillery, as if resolved to prosecute the war with unabated vigour. In the meantime a ship was fitted out at Ayr, provided with every requisite for convenience and defence, and placed under the command of Robert Barton, one of the most daring and expert captains of the age. In this vessel Warbeck embarked on the 24th of July, 1497, and left Scotland for ever, accompanied by his devoted wife, who refused to be separated from her husband; and receiving to the last, from the subjects of his chivalrous entertainer, all the honours due to his assumed rank. The fate of this specious pretender to royalty was speedily decided. Abandoned by James, and excluded from Flanders by a treaty between that country and England, he took refuge at first with a few of his partizans, amid the wilds of Ireland; but a second attempt on England, with the view of reviving his

His ultimate desperate fortunes, issued in his fate. total defeat and capture, and he was ultimately hanged at Tyburn. His wife, Lady Catherine Gordon, fell at the same time into the hands of Henry, who, however, treated her with generous kindness, and assigned her a pension and post of honour at the English court, where, from her grace and beauty, she was long known by the name of the White Rose of Scotland.*

The departure of Warbeck removed the chief obstacle to a peace between England and Scotland, for which the monarchs of both countries were equally solicitous. Henry, menaced by constant plots against his crown, and surrounded by a discontented nobility, was naturally anxious to secure the neutrality of a powerful neighbour, whose hostility might assist the efforts of foreign invasion or intestine treason; and James, whose thirst for adventure and profitless strife had been greatly cooled by late events, was now engaged with plans for the improvement of his kingdom, the execution of which must have been indefinitely delayed by war with England. Negotiations were Truce with accordingly resumed, and on the England. 31st September, 1497, a truce was concluded at Ayton, between the two nations, for seven years, and was afterwards extended to a period comprehending the lives of the two monarchs, and a year after the death of the survivor. The proposal of the alliance of James with the Princess Margaret, though formally introduced by Fox, Bishop of Durham, one of the English commissioners, seems to have been ultimately dropped from the provisions of the treaty.

Thus happily freed from the prospect of war, James entered with promptitude and zeal on measures for promoting the prosperity of his kingdom. The northern provinces, remote from the seat of government, and convulsed by the feuds of rival clans, had long proved a source of inquietude to successive monarchs, and had not unfrequently endangered the security of the crown. James, therefore, determined by personal inspection, to ascertain the condition of those districts as the basis of future legislation; and for this purpose he proceeded, though in the depth of winter, to Inverness, from which he made an extensive tour through the Highland provinces. The result of his policy was in the highest degree satisfactory. The refractory and turbulent chiefs were punished, while the more peaceful were honoured by marks of the sovereign's favour and confidence, which converted them into powerful allies in maintaining the authority of government. Besides its direct influence in compelling these fierce mountaineers to acknowledge his rule, the visit of the king excited a feeling of enthusiastic loyalty among the great body of the chiefs and people, which produced the happiest effects during the remainder of his reign.

Shortly after the conclusion of the treaty between England and Scotland, an incident occurred, which threat- ^{Threatening of} ^{hostilities with} ^{England.} ened once more to involve the two countries in hostilities. A party of youths belonging to the Scottish border, trusting to the protection of the truce, crossed the Tweed for the purpose of visiting some friends at Norham; but while examining the castle a quarrel arose between them and the garrison, who accused them of being spies. They were attacked by orders of the governor; several of them were wounded and slain, and the rest were compelled to flee for their lives. A complaint respecting this outrage was instantly made to the English wardens, but without success. The Scottish king took fire at the indignity offered to his subjects, and despatched a herald to the English court, demanding satisfaction, and denouncing war if it were refused. Fortunately for the mutual welfare of the two kingdoms, Henry behaved with great prudence and moderation. He declared that the attack was altogether unpremeditated, and promised that inquiry should immediately be made, and punishment inflicted upon the guilty. Fox, the Bishop of Durham, to whom the castle belonged, also wrote to James, in a submissive and conciliatory strain, and succeeded in appeasing his indignation.* The ratification of the treaty, which this untoward incident had delayed, was soon afterwards given at Stirling, on the twentieth of July, 1499.

The negotiations with England having been thus amicably concluded, James ^{Formation of a} ^{navy.} turned his attention to the formation of a navy. At this time the maritime enterprises of the Portuguese, and the discoveries of Columbus and of John and Sebastian Cabot, had created an extraordinary sensation throughout Europe, which had extended to Scotland, and roused the adventurous spirit of the Scottish king. He immediately adopted measures to establish a royal navy, in which Scotland had hitherto been deficient, and to maintain his place with other maritime kingdoms. Injunctions were issued, that vessels of twenty tons and upwards should be built in all the seaports of the kingdom; and that all stout vagrants should be compelled to serve on board these vessels, and to labour for their own living. Great attention was paid to the best nurseries of seamen—the domestic fisheries and foreign commerce. Sir Andrew Wood, the two Bartons, and other experienced and enterprising merchants and traders, were invited to court, and encouraged to apply their wealth and skill to the improvement of the maritime affairs of the country; while the king made himself intimately acquainted with the management of his infant navy and personally superintended its details. He practised gunnery, embarked in little experimental voyages, conversed with his mariners, and visited familiarly at the houses of his merchants and sea officers, by whom his fame was carried to foreign countries. In consequence of this judicious policy James became as popular with his sailors as he was beloved by his nobility; shipwrights, cannon-founders, and the best foreign artists of every description being sure of a generous reception, flocked to Scotland from France, Italy, and the Low Countries; and if the king's erudition sometimes encouraged impostors, his enthusiasm also collected round him men of real knowledge and experience.*

James was equally attentive to the other duties of his high office. His impartiality in the administration of justice to all classes of his subjects, and his energy and indefatigable activity in the repression and punishment of crime, made the laws respected and obeyed in every part of his dominions; and struck terror into the hearts of those titled robbers who were accustomed to oppress and plunder the poor at their pleasure. He exercised the most vigilant superintendence over the conduct of his officers, and not unfrequently surprised the judges by his sudden appearance in the courts of justice at the moment when he was least expected. His administration was highly popular among all classes of his subjects. His affable manners and generous, open-hearted disposition gained the affections of the common people; while his judicious policy, his love of magnificence, and the splendour of his entertainments, secured the confidence and attachment of his nobility, who delighted to attend upon the person of a sovereign of whom they were justly proud, and who treated them with the utmost courtesy and kindness. The constant round of amusements in which they were occupied at court, rendered the gloomy seclusion of their own castles doubly irksome to them. Their residence on their own estates became less frequent, and their influence over their vassals was consequently diminished, so that the royal authority was in every way extended and strengthened.

Negotiations were about this time renewed for the marriage of the Scottish king to the Princess Margaret of England. Her father, the astute Henry VII., clearly perceived the advantages which would accrue to both kingdoms from such an alliance, and had repeatedly made proposals to James, which were powerfully supported by the Scottish nobility; but the extreme youth of the princess, and the reluctance of James to break off his connection with Lady Margaret Drummond, his mistress, prevented for a time the successful issue of these negotiations.

* Encyclopædia Britan. vol. xiv.

The urgent remonstrances of his council, however, at length overcame the reluctance of the king, and after some preliminary negotiations with Fox, Bishop of Durham, he despatched the Archbishop of Glasgow, the Earl of Bothwell, High Admiral of Scotland, and Andrew Forman, Apostolical Prothonotary, to meet with the English commissioners and arrange the preliminaries of the marriage. The treaty was finally signed in the palace of Richmond, on the 24th of January, 1502.* When the proposition was made before the English Privy Council, one of the lords present objected that "the Princess Margaret being next heir to her brother Henry, England might chance to become a province to Scotland." "No," replied King Henry, "the smaller will ever follow the larger kingdom,"† a remark which has been often quoted in proof of the sagacity of that sovereign. The incident is related more at length by the Scottish annalist Lesley, Bishop of Ross: "Some of the counsellors of the English king," says that writer, "did propound certain reasons for staying of that marriage, alleging that it might happen that the heritage and succession of the realm of England might fall to Margaret, his eldest daughter, and to her successors; and therefore it seemed best that she should be married to some foreign prince. To the which the King Henry VII. did answer, 'What, then, if such things did happen (which chance, God forbid, I see that it would come so that our realm would receive no damage there-through; for in that case England would not access to Scotland, but Scotland to England, as to the most noble head of the whole isle, as when Normandy came to the power of Englishmen, our forbears.' And so the wisdom of the king was commended, and the Lady Margaret granted to the King of Scotland."‡ It was stipulated that the Scottish king should either personally or by proxy espouse the Princess Margaret at Candlemas next; but as she was only twelve years of age, her father was not to be obliged to send her to Scotland before the 1st of September, 1503. The young queen, before the 1st of July, in that year, was to be put in possession of all the lands, castles, and manors which constituted the jointure of the queens dowager of Scotland;§ and it was stipulated that their annual revenue should not be under the sum of two thousand pounds sterling,—equal to six thousand pounds Scottish currency. She was to receive during the lifetime of the king, her husband, the annual sum of a thousand pounds Scottish money, or five hundred marks sterling for her private purse; she was to be allowed to keep twenty-four English servants, besides the Scottish domestics which the king might think requisite for her rank. Her household was to be maintained in duo splendour at the expense of her husband; and in the event of his death she was to be permitted to reside at her pleasure either within, or without, the bounds of Scotland. On the other hand, the dowry which her father consented to give with her was only thirty thousand nobles, or ten thousand pounds sterling, to be paid by instalments within three years after the marriage; a paltry sum for so wealthy a monarch, and little more than half the amount which Alexander III. gave with his daughter to Haco, King of Norway, in the thirteenth century. The avarice of the English monarch was also manifested in the careful stipulation that if the queen should die without issue before the payment of her dowry was completed, the balance should not be demanded.* It has been justly said that in the arrangements of the marriage treaty the diplomatic skill and penurious habits of the English king seem to have gained a victory over the Scottish commissioners; for although Henry was now considered one of the wealthiest sovereigns in Europe, the dowry which he gave with his eldest daughter was considerably smaller than the sum which Edward the Fourth promised to the Prince of Scotland, in 1474, as the portion of his daughter Cecilia.†

Immediately after the conclusion of the marriage treaty, the commissioners entered into negotiations for the establishment of a perpetual peace between the two kingdoms; and, on the twenty-fourth of January, a treaty was concluded, in which it was stipulated, that in all time to come there should be inviolable peace between James and Henry, and their successors and subjects of every denomination; and that the allies of both kings should be included in the league, if within eight months they signified their assent to its provisions. Rebels, marauders, thieves, and other malefactors flying for shelter from the one kingdom to the other, were to be given up. All safe-conducts granted by either king to the subjects of the other were to be recalled, and never renewed, except with the consent of their own sovereign. Mutual assistance was to be given in case of war, either with foreign or domestic enemies; but the forces sent to the aid of the prince attacked were to be maintained at his own expence. It was agreed that, the town and castle of Berwick should be included in the present perpetual peace, and that it should not be molested by the Scottish king or any of his subjects. It was also stipulated, that the treaty should not be broken or annulled by trespasses committed by the subjects of either realm; but that all injuries and wrongs should be redressed by the wardens of the marches, or their lieutenants; and, that where due reparation was not made, the prince whose subjects had been injured, was at liberty to grant letters of reprisals either by sea or land. And, finally, it was agreed, that the two kings should, within three months of the marriage, ratify this treaty by their solemn oaths; that the sanction of the Roman pontiff should be obtained before the first of July, 1503; and that the violation of the treaty should incur the penalty of excommunication.

Before the ratification of the treaty of marriage, the court of James was the scene of a domestic tragedy of peculiar atrocity. His mistress, Lady Margaret Drummond, along with her sisters, Sybilla and Euphemia, Lady Fleming, died suddenly at the same time, with symptoms exciting a strong suspicion of poison, which, it was thought, had been administered to them at breakfast. It was generally believed that the unfortunate lady fell a victim to the jealousy of the Scottish nobles. The historian of the Drummonds* states, that James "was affianced to Lady Margaret, and meant to make her his queen without consulting his council. He was opposed by those nobles who wished him to wed Margaret Tudor. His clergy, likewise, protested against his marriage, as within the prohibited degrees. Before the king could receive the dispensation his wife (the Lady Margaret) was poisoned at breakfast, at Drummond castle, with her two sisters. Suspicion fell on the Kennedys,"—a rival house, a member of which, Lady Janet Kennedy, daughter of John, Lord Kennedy, had borne a son to the king, whom James created Earl of Moray. A slightly different account is given in Morrier's Dictionary,† on the authority of a manuscript history of the family of Drummond, composed in 1689. It is there stated, that the Lady Margaret, daughter of the first Lord Drummond, "was so much beloved by James the Fourth, that he wished to marry her; but as they were connected by blood, and a dispensation from the pope was required, the impatient monarch concluded a private marriage, from which clandestine union sprung a daughter, who became the wife of the Earl of Huntley. The dispensation having arrived, the king determined to celebrate his nuptials publicly; but the jealousy of some of the nobles against the house of Drummond, suggested to them the cruel project of taking off Margaret by poison, in order that her family might not enjoy the glory of giving two queens to Scotland." A different, but much less probable account of this mysterious transaction, is to be found in one of the letters of Queen Margaret, written many years after the death of James IV., in which she accuses the brother-in-law of Margaret Drummond as her destroyer. "Lord Fleming," she says, "for evil will that he had to his wife (Euphemia Drummond) caused poison three sisters, one of them his wife, and this is known as truth throughout all Scotland."‡ The three young ladies thus foully murdered, were interred together in the centre of the choir of the cathedral church at Dumblane; and it appears, from the entries to be found in the Treasurer's books, that two priests were regularly employed in Dumblane, by the king, to say masses for the soul of Lady Margaret.*

All impediments to the completion of his marriage with the Princess Margaret having been removed by this horrid deed, James prepared to carry his engagement into effect; and the royal bride set out in great state on her journey to her future court, June 16th, 1503, some months before the time stipulated in her marriage-articles for her arrival in Scotland. Her father accompanied her from the palace of Richmond to Collewston, in Northamptonshire, where he delivered her to the care of the Earl of Surrey, her uncle by marriage. Mounted on a beautiful white palfrey, and attended by a magnificent retinue, the youthful princess journeyed northwards by easy stages. All the bells were rung in the towns and villages through which her progress was directed, and the country people flocked in great numbers to see her. The clergy, country gentry, and civil authorities, came out in their grandest array to welcome her at the various stages of her journey; "minstrels singing, trumpets and sackbuts playing, banners and bandroles waving, coats-of-arms unrolled to the light of the sun-setting, rich maces in hand, and brave horsemen curveting and bounding."† In the course of the journey the cavalcade was joined by the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Durham, the Earl of Northumberland, Lord Dacre, and other civil and ecclesiastical grandees, who accompanied the princess to Lamberton Kirk, a place a little to the north of Berwick; where she was met by the Archbishop of Glasgow, the Earl of Morton, and a splendid array of Scottish barons. Here a pavilion had been prepared for the reception of the royal bride, and she was delivered with great solemnity and state to the commissioners of the Scottish king. Pursuing her way onward to the capital, the youthful princess, after traversing several miles of moss and moor, reached the lonely and sea-beaten tower of Fastcastle, situated on the bleak shore of the German ocean, near St. Abb's Head.‡ In this singular fortalice, which belonged to Lord Home, Margaret passed her first night in her new dominions; her train was lodged in the abbey of Coldingham, a few miles distant. She spent the next night in the nunnery of Haddington, and on the subsequent day arrived at Dalkeith, where she had her first interview with her future husband. Scarcely had the royal bride taken possession of her chamber, when a hurrying sound was heard in the quadrangle, and the cry ran through the castle, "The King, the King of Scotland has arrived." The interview, which is described by the Somerset Herald, presents a curious picture of the manners of the times. "James was dressed simply in a velvet jacket, with his hawking-lure slung over his shoulder; his hair and beard curled naturally, and were rather long. The young queen met her royal lord at the door of the great chamber, he uncovered his head and made a deep obeisance to her, while she made a lowly reverence to him. He then took her hand and kissed her, and saluted all her ladies by kissing them. Then the king took the queen on one side, and they communed together for a long space. She held good manners, and the king remained bareheaded during the time they conversed, and many courtesies passed between them. Incontinent the board was set and served. The king and queen washed their hands with humble reverence, and after that set them down at table together. After supper there was music and dancing, and this done King James took leave of the queen, for it was late; and he went to his bed at Edinburgh, being well content at so pleasant a meeting."

From Dalkeith the princess removed to Newbattle Abbey, where the king on paying her a visit found her playing at cards. He then entertained her by his own performance upon the clarichord and the lute; and on taking leave, he leaped on his horse, a right fair courser, without putting his foot in the stirrup, and spurred on at full gallop follow who might; but hearing that the Earl of Surrey and several other lords were behind, the king returned, and saluted the earl bare-headed. At the next meeting, the queen, in her turn, exhibited her musical skill by playing on the lute and clarichord, while the king listened on bended knee, with his head uncovered. When she left Newbattle to proceed to the capital, James met her, attired in splendid costume, and mounted on a bay horse, trapped with gold. Feats of horsemanship, in which the king, especially, displayed all the qualities of a skilful rider, enlivened the way; and to these was added a quaint drama, suited to the romantic and chivalrous spirit of the age. A knight issued from a tent by the wayside, attended by a beautiful lady, who held the bridle of his charger, and carried his bugle-horn. A second knight suddenly appeared and seized the lady, on which the rivals fought with emulous valour till the king, by throwing down his gage, terminated the conflict. Before entering the city, Margaret was lifted from her palfrey and placed on a pillion behind James, who rode a bay horse, richly caparisoned; and in this homely but loving manner the royal pair proceeded to Holyrood, amid the rejoicings of the people. The marriage was celebrated a few days after, and a series of expensive entertainments, masques, and tournaments followed in honour of the occasion. James, skilled in all the martial exercises of the times, appeared in the lists as the Savage Knight, and attended by a troop of followers, dressed in the skins of goats and other animals, performed such feats of valour that his superiority was universally admitted. The Scottish and foreign nobles vied with each other in deeds of daring; and two of them were especially noticed and honoured by the king. Anthony D'Archie de la Bastie received many rich presents, while Lord Hamilton, a near relative of James, was created Earl of Arran. The festivities which accompanied the royal marriage indicated a refinement and splendour hitherto unknown in the court of Scotland, which were chiefly to be traced to the princely courtesy and generosity of James himself; while his kindness, and even munificence, to the strangers who graced the gay scenes, diffused in other countries favourable impressions, not only of his own character, but of the importance of his kingdom.

The joy of the king and people received a disagreeable interruption from the news of a rebellion in the north. For many years the Highlands had remained in a state of comparative tranquillity. The dignity of Lord of the Isles had been abolished, and the extensive districts belonging to that petty prince were forfeited and annexed to the crown. But while the power of these troublesome chiefs was destroyed, the property of their vassals had in general been scrupulously respected, and charters were granted, which confirmed them in the possession of their estates, so that the inhabitants even of Knapdale and Kintire submitted to the change, and, attracted by the clemency and justice of James, were becoming gradually attached to the new administration. For reasons which do not appear, the policy of the Scottish court to these distant dependencies underwent a sudden and unfavourable change. The charters granted by the king to the vassals of the Isles, during the last five years, were summarily revoked; and Archibald, Earl of Argyle, was appointed the king's lieutenant, and was commissioned to let on lease for the term of three years the entire lordship of the Isles. In accordance with these instructions, Argyle proceeded summarily to expel the proprietors and vassals from their lands, which were appropriated by himself and others of the royal favourites.* Indignant at this injustice, and driven to despair by their situation, the extruded Islesmen determined to recover their inheritance, and to restore the ancient rule of their hereditary chiefs. The jealousy of the Scottish parliament had consigned Donald Dhu, the grandson of John, last Lord of the Isles, to a dungeon in the castle of Inchconnel, but a party of the Islesmen, led by the McIans of Glencœ, stormed his prison, and having conveyed him to the castle of Torquill McLeod, in Lewis, took immediate steps for the establishment of his alleged rights, and the vindication of the independence of their country.† Emboldened by success, the disaffected chiefs formed themselves into a powerful confederacy, and, uniting their forces, invaded the adjoining provinces. Badenoch was plundered and wasted with fire and sword, and the town of Inverness was given to the flames. James adopted instant and vigorous measures for quelling this sudden insurrection. An army, under the command of the Earls of Argyle, Huntley, Crawford, Marischal, and Lord Lovat, received orders to march against the rebels. The various castles in the hands of the government were strengthened, and their garrisons increased; while, by promises and threats, the king endeavoured to confirm the wavering loyalty of some of the northern chiefs, and to arrest the formidable spirit of disaffection which had broken out among them.

Pending the result of these measures, the parliament met at Edinburgh on the 11th of March, 1503, and proceeded to consider the state of the revolted districts, with the view of providing in future for their efficient control, and securing the general tranquillity of the Highlands.* For these important purposes a new and more comprehensive division of sheriffdoms, embracing the whole north and west Highlands, was agreed upon; the towns in which the courts of justice should be held were named, and a competent number of judges attached to each of the districts. The sheriffs for the northern Isles were directed to hold their sessions in Inverness and Dingwall, and those for the south, in Tarbet. Caithness and Ross were detached from the sheriffdom of Inverness, and placed under judges of their own. A Justice Ayre was appointed at Perth for the districts of Dowart, Glendowart, and the lordship of Lorn; and those of Mamore and Lochaber were provided for by a similar court at Inverness. The town of Ayr was selected as the seat of courts for Bute, Arran, Knapdale, Kintire, and the larger Cumray. Argyle was also embraced in the new arrangement; but as the unsettled state of the district made it impossible to determine at what place its courts should be held, these were instructed to assemble wherever it is found "that each Highlander and Lowlander may come without danger and ask justice." As the broken clans of Teviotdale had caused many serious interruptions of the public peace, it was proposed to bind the chief nobles and gentry resident there, to maintain order under heavy penalties; an arrangement which had been found to produce the best results in other parts of the country exposed to similar disturbances.

Besides appointing a court of daily council to sit at Edinburgh, in order to prevent the accumulation of causes, and the suspension of justice to the poor, who suffered severely by delay, a variety of other wise and beneficial statutes were enacted by the parliament at the same time. Many abuses had arisen from the practice of granting general pardons for offences, as the remission for a minor crime was often used by the delinquent to shield himself from one of a deeper dye. It was, therefore, resolved that before pardon was granted to a criminal, the highest offence of the applicant should be ascertained and described in a special clause of the deed of grant, the possession of which freed him from the consequences of lesser crimes. All burghs were enjoined annually to change their magistrates; and their commissaries were instructed to attend the meetings of the Estates, to give advice, especially where parliament contemplated the imposition of a new tax, by which the interests of the burghal constituencies were likely to be affected. To guard the interests of their vassals, all feudal superiors were enjoined to secure their estates by a legal deed of possession; and every case of seisin thus granted by a judge was to be registered and properly attested in a court-book, lodged in the exchequer. The preservation of growing timber, and the improvement of rural economy, also engaged the attention of parliament. To prevent the indiscriminate destruction of the forests, which had left many districts of the country bare and unsheltered, the felling or burning of a young tree subjected the offender to a fine of five pounds. Every proprietor was directed to plant at least one acre of wood, to form a park, construct fish-ponds, to stock rabbit-warrens and dovecoats, and to plant orchards. Trespass on the grounds of a proprietor, or the destruction of his fences, was punished by a fine of ten pounds, if the culprit was a grown-up person; but if a child, "the bairn was to be lashed, scourged, and dung according to the fault." A succeeding enactment relates to the important matter of the tenure of lands by the vassals of the feudal barons. Hitherto feudatories had held almost entirely under the obligation to military service, but in place of this, the king, lords, and prelates were now permitted 'to let in feu' any portion of land they might please. By this new arrangement, military service might be commuted for a rent, either in money or produce; and the change, though regarded with jealousy by some of the greater barons, was followed by the best results, in cherishing the spirit of peaceful industry, and developing the agricultural resources of the country. Enactments pervaded by the same wise spirit prohibited a creditor to seize for debt, or to order the sale of agricultural implements; equalized the weights and measures throughout the kingdom, and declared all its provinces to be subject to the same code of laws; provided for the punishment of ill-qualified or faithless notaries; endeavoured to reduce the expenses of litigation, and sought to diminish the number of able-bodied and sturdy beggars. Attendance on the meetings of parliament was rendered obligatory on all barons whose annual income exceeded one hundred marks, under the penalty of the usual fine; but the personal services of those whose revenue fell below this standard was dispensed with, provided that their agents could justify a plea of exemption.*

During the proceedings of this important parliament, the army, under the leadership of the Earl of Arran, was prosecuting with vigour the reduction of the northern rebels. The nature of the country, however, so adapted to irregular warfare, enabled the Islesmen and their confederates to protract hostilities for a lengthened period; and James determined to send a small fleet, commanded by Sir Robert Wood and Andrew Barton, among the sea-girt fastnesses of his enemies, and by carrying the war into the heart of their country to compel them to surrender.* The wisdom of the plan was justified by its success. Invaded by boats full of armed seamen and disciplined troops, who speedily captured their strongest fortresses, the insurgent chiefs were compelled to lay down their arms; while others, whose fidelity was suspected, found it prudent to aid the efforts of the royal troops, in reducing the disaffected districts.

James was now at leisure to inflict punishment on some of the Border clans, whose habits of plunder and violence continually disturbed the southern portions of his kingdom. As England, equally with Scotland, was interested in reducing these fierce marauders, whose forays across the English borders had not only inflicted great injury, but, by the retaliation which they provoked, endangered the peace of the two countries, James solicited and obtained the co-operation of Henry VII., who instructed Lord Daer to meet the king with a force which would effectually overawe resistance, and secure the punishment of the offenders. Lochmaben was chosen as the seat of the court, the proceedings of which were marked by a justice so stern, that the boldest of the freebooters quailed before its presence. The offending chiefs and their principal followers were tried, convicted, and summarily hanged, and their lifeless bodies, which remained suspended from gibbets, struck terror into the spectators. So speedy and certain was the vengeance of the law in every case of conviction, that the chiefs of the Armstrongs and Jardines hastened to avert deserved punishment by timely submission to the royal authority, and eager profers of aid in carrying out the plans of the king. James at the same time commended and rewarded those who had revered the law, and assisted its ministers in preserving the public peace; while he displayed his joyous nature by alternating the pleasures of the chase and gay entertainments; with these grim evidences of his unbending rigour as a judge.†

'The raid of Eskdale,' as it was popularly termed, was almost immediately followed by a royal progress as far as Forres, through the northern portion of his dominions, during which he seems to have examined minutely the state of these districts, and to have aided the sheriffs in their administration of justice. The rebellion of the Islesmen, in spite of the submission of some of their leading chiefs, and the terror inspired for a time by the vigorous measures of the government, broke out once more, with a fury which perilled the results of the former expedition. James, however, no longer distracted by the condition of the Borders, was now happily able to avail himself of the whole military strength of his kingdom in quelling the insurrection. The Earl of Huntley, therefore, received instructions to invade the Isles by the north, while the king himself led an army against them from the south. These vigorous measures at length dissolved the confederacy of the islanders, and induced their principal leaders to submit to the royal authority. Maclean, of Dowart; Mac-

Suppression of the rebellion in the north. lean, of Lochbuy; Maencill, of Barra; Macquarrie, of Ulva, and other powerful chiefs, laid down their arms, and were received into favour. Torquil Macleod, of Lewis, the head of the rebellion, still held out, probably despairing of pardon; but in the succeeding year (1506) he was solemnly forfeited by parliament for not appearing to stand his trial for high treason; his castle of Stornoway was besieged and taken by the Earl of Huntley, and his estates were conferred upon the supporters of the government. Donald Dhu, the alleged heir of the Isles, for whose sake the islanders had risen in rebellion, was a second time taken prisoner and committed to the castle of Edinburgh, where he was confined for the long period of nearly forty years.*

This formidable and tedious rebellion having been thus at length suppressed, James laboured not only to cause the laws to be respected and obeyed, throughout these rude and remote districts, but also to induce the inhabitants to make themselves acquainted with the statutes enacted by the Scottish parliament. There is yet extant a deed conferring certain crown lands, in the Isle of Sky, upon a person named Kenneth Williamson, to support him at the schools, with a view to his studying the laws of Scotland, and afterwards practising as a lawyer within the bounds of the Isles.† The great power formerly wielded by the Lords of the Isles was now transferred to the Earls of Argyll and Huntley,—the former having the chief authority over the islands adjacent to the coast of Argyleshire, while the influence of the latter was predominant in the north Isles and Highlands. This powerful nobleman, who had contributed most effectual aid in the suppression of the rebellion, was appointed heritable Sheriff of Inverness,—a jurisdiction comprehending the shires of Inverness, Ross, and Caithness,—and was empowered to nominate deputies, who were to hold their courts in the various divisions of his sheriffdom. In consequence of these judicious measures, a great improvement took place in the condition of these remote districts of the country; justice was impartially dispensed to all classes of the community; and from this period, till the disastrous battle of Flodden, the west Highlands and Isles remained in a state of unwonted tranquillity.

For some years previous to this period the intercourse between France and Scotland had been much less frequent than formerly; and the French monarch, Louis XII., incessantly occupied with his Italian wars, Renewal of intercourse with France. had neglected to renew the ancient alliance with his Scottish allies, and appeared to have taken no interest in the union between James and the King of England. But, after that the Spanish arms had obtained the superiority in Italy, Louis, apprehensive that Henry VII. might take part in the quarrel with his Spanish ally, despatched an ambassador of high rank and fame, Bernard Stuart, Lord of Aubigny, to renew the league with the Scottish king, and to detach Scotland from the English influence. James received the veteran warrior with great distinction, placed him in the most honourable seat at his own table, appointed him the judge of his tournaments, and addressed him by the title of Father of War.*

The influence of Scotland, at this period, on the general affairs of Europe was Influence of James on the continent. manifested by the interference of James in behalf of Charles d'Égmont, Duke of Gueldres, who solicited his assistance in the struggle which he was then maintaining against the unjust pretensions of the house of Austria. The Scottish king, by a prompt remonstrance to his father-in-law, Henry, prevented him from affording assistance to the Austrian Archduke, and the Emperor Maximilian, his father. He also secured the co-operation of Louis XII., King of France, in protecting the Duke of Gueldres against the encroachments of his powerful and unprincipled adversaries, and thus compelled them for the present to lay aside their designs against the independence of the duchy.† James also interfered in behalf of his ally, John, King of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, against whom his Swedish subjects had risen in rebellion; and despatched conciliatory letters to the Archbishop of Upsal and the Swedish senate, and to the citizens of Lubeck, who were about to assist the Swedes. These letters, which have been pronounced models of elegance and vigour, abound with judicious maxims, and even manifest some recognition of the rights and liberties of the people. The royal writer admits that an unjust king may be lawfully resisted by force of arms, provided that he has been previously warned, in a national council, to reform his tyrannical conduct, and has rejected the admonition of his subjects.‡

At this period, to the great joy of the country, an heir to the throne was born on Birth of an heir to the throne. the 10th of February, 1506. The king was so delighted with the auspicious event, that he presented the lady of the queen's chamber, who brought him the news, with a hundred pieces of gold in a silver cup, and instantly despatched messengers to convey the glad tidings to the Kings of England, France, Spain, and Portugal. The child, who was named James, after his father, was baptized, with great magnificence, in the chapel of Holyrood, on the 23rd of February; but the hopes of his parents, and of the kingdom, were blasted by his premature death, on the 17th of February, 1507. The youthful mother remained for a considerable period in a critical situation, and James undertook a pilgrimage on foot to the shrine of St. Ninians, at Whithorn, in Galloway, for the benefit of her health, and, if we may credit the monkish annalists, her recovery took place at the very moment that the king offered, in her behalf, at the shrine of the saint.* James was attended on this pilgrimage by his four Italian minstrels, who were so completely exhausted by their long pedestrian expedition, that they required to be carried back to Holyrood, on horses hired for the occasion. On her complete recovery, the queen likewise made a pilgrimage of thanksgiving, on a most magnificent scale, to the shrine of St. Ninians.† She travelled on a litter, and seventeen pack-horses were loaded with her baggage. Her chapel-plate and furniture—or ‘chapel-graith,’ as it is termed—were conveyed in two coffers, while three horses were required to carry the wardrobe of her royal husband, who accompanied her. The pilgrimage lasted twenty days. The shrine of St. Ninians, at Whithorn, seems to have been a favourite haunt of James, as was also the shrine of St. Duthac, in Ross. It is mentioned by Lesley, that on one occasion the king rode from Stirling to St. Duthac, unaccompanied by a single attendant, with nothing but his riding-cloak cast about him, his hunting-knife at his belt, and six-and-twenty pounds in his purse to defray his travelling expenses. He met with no interruption in the course of this solitary journey,—a circumstance of which he was justly proud, as showing the tranquillity of his kingdom, and the respect for law and order which he had introduced among all classes of his subjects.

In the midst of these transactions, Pope Julius II. sent an ambassador to the court of the Scottish king, with a consecrated hat and sword, as a special mark of his regard. The object of the warlike pontiff was to detach James from his alliance with the French monarch; but the attempt entirely failed, although James received the papal ambassador with the utmost respect and bestowed many valuable presents on him and his suite. He communicated, also, to Julius the intelligence which he had received from the King of Denmark, that his ally, the Czar of Muscovy, had expressed his desire to be admitted into the Latin church. So far was he, however, from acceding to the subtle policy of the Roman pontiff, that he offered to furnish Louis with a body of four thousand auxiliaries to serve in his Italian wars,—a proposal which the French monarch, who had meanwhile obtained great successes, declined with many professions of gratitude.*

Soon after, Louis despatched an embassy to the Scottish court, for the purpose of inducing James to join the coalition called the League of Cambrai, which had recently been formed against the republic of Venice; and also of consulting his ancient ally regarding the proposed marriage of his eldest daughter to Charles, King of Castile. A series of splendid fêtes were given in Edinburgh for the entertainment of the French nobles; and a magnificent tournament was held, in which the king enacted the part of ‘the Wild Knight,’ surrounded by attendants, like ‘salvage men in their attire,’ and won great renown by the boldness and dexterity of his exploits. The jousting was succeeded by a grand festival, called ‘The Round Table of King Arthur and his Peers.’ These costly entertainments, however, together with the sums squandered upon jesters, dancers and singers, or expended in the pursuits of alchemy, and in the vain attempt to discover gold mines in Scotland, impoverished the royal exchequer, and drove the king to adopt new and invidious methods of raising money, which were very oppressive to his subjects, although his great popularity induced them to bear those exactions without any public expression of their discontent.†

The English monarch appears to have regarded with dissatisfaction and suspicion the frequent and cordial inter-tween Henry VII. course which existed between his son-in-law and the King of France; and he manifested his displeasure by seizing and imprisoning the Earl of Arran and his brother, Sir Patrick Hamilton, who, in the preceding year, had passed through England to the court of Louis, without the permission or knowledge of Henry, and were now on their return to their own country. As soon as they landed in Kent they were met by Vaughan, an officer of the English king; and on their refusal to take an oath binding them to preserve the peace with England, they were apprehended and committed to custody. Henry despatched Dr. West as his envoy to the Scottish court, to explain and justify this step, which he alleged had been rendered necessary because Arran and his brother had taken the liberty of travelling through England, for embarkation to France, without a passport or safe conduct. West reached Edinburgh during the absence of the king, who was performing his devotions at his favourite shrine of St. Ninians, at Whithorn, and had several interviews with the young queen. Margaret warmly espoused her father’s cause, and laboured, but in vain, on the return of her husband, to procure an interview for Dr. West. James sent him word, “that he was too busy with superintending the making of gunpowder to spare time to speak to him.” He informed the au-ambassador, that Arran and his brother had acted properly in refusing to take the oath, but he offered to delay for the present the renewal of the league with France, on condition that Henry would release Arran; Sir Patrick Hamilton having in the mean time been allowed to return to Scotland. The earl, however, was not set at liberty till near the end of the year.

The death of Henry VII. took place shortly after the accession of Henry VIII. these transactions, and the accession of his haughty and imperious successor, Henry VIII., in no long time exercised a most unfavourable influence on the relations between the two countries. Matters proceeded smoothly, however, for some time, and the existing alliance was confirmed by the oaths of both monarchs. Henry also renewed the treaty with the French king, with the condition stipulated by his father, that it was to continue for a year after the death of the survivor. Meanwhile, James availed himself of the leisure afforded him by the continuance of peace, to promote the internal prosperity of his kingdom. He repaired and embellished his palaces and castles; he improved the administration of public justice, and enforced a universal respect for the laws, throughout the remotest districts of the country; he gave every encouragement to the extension of trade and commerce; visited familiarly at the houses of his merchants and ablest sea-officers, and exhorted them to extend their voyages and to arm their trading ships, and assisted them to undertake more important enterprises than they could have ventured to do on their own capital. He paid great attention to his navy, which, under his active and judicious superintendence, became very powerful. Besides several ships of smaller size, he constructed three vessels of very large dimensions,—one of these, named the Great Michael, in magnitude, cost, and equipment, exceeded any ship of war then known in the world. According to Pitscottie, all the oak forests in Fife, except that of Falkland, were exhausted in the construction of this vessel, besides a large quantity of timber brought from Norway, and upwards of a year was spent by the Scottish and foreign carpenters in completing the undertaking, although the king in person anxiously urged on the work.* James was justly proud of

* Pitscottie gives the dimensions of this huge vessel, which were in his day preserved at Tullibardine, "planted in hawthorn, the length and breadth by the wright that helped to mak her." Her length was two hundred and forty feet; her breadth, fifty-six to the water's edge, but only thirty-six within; her sides, which were ten feet in thickness, were proof against shot. She carried only thirty-five guns,—sixteen on each side, two in the stern, and one in the bow; but she had three hundred small artillery, called pulverins, battert-falcons, serpents, myauds, double-dogs, bagbuts, &c. She was manned with three hundred sailors, a hundred and twenty gunners, and a thousand soldiers, besides officers.—Pitscottie, vol. i. p. 257. Pitscottie says he gives these details on the authority of Captain Andrew Wood, who was the principal captain of the Great Michael, and of Robert Barton, who was 'maister skipper.' Sir Robert Barton was made comptroller of the royal household during the minority of James V.

the achievement; and while "the ship lay still in the road," says Pitscottie, "the king took great pleasure every day to come down and see her, and would dine and sup in her sundrie times, and be showing his lords her order and munition." The command of this huge vessel was entrusted to the famous Sir Andrew Wood, and under him to Robert Barton, a member of a family which at this period furnished several distinguished naval commanders, by whom the honour of the Scottish flag was maintained, and the commerce of the country protected against the attacks of the pirates who then infested the seas. It appears, that so far back as 1476, a merchant vessel, Naval exploits commanded by John Barton, was the Bartons captured by a Portuguese squadron, and letters of reprisal were granted to Andrew, Robert, and John Barton, his sons, by which they were authorized to seize all vessels belonging to Portugal, till they had indemnified themselves for their losses, which were estimated at twelve thousand ducats. The Portuguese retaliated, by seizing, in 1507, at Campvere, in Zealand, a Scottish vessel named the Lion, and throwing Robert Barton, its commander, into prison. The Bartons in turn fitted out a squadron, which at various times captured several of the Portuguese merchantmen on their homeward voyage from India and Africa. Mention is made in the poems of Dunbar of a female blackamoor at the Scottish court, who is supposed to have been captured in one of these prizes.

The Bartons shewed equal readiness in vindicating the honour of their country as in revenging their own private wrongs. The Hollanders, who were at this time subject to Austria, had attacked some Scottish merchant vessels, and, not content with plundering the cargoes, had murdered the crews and thrown their bodies into the sea. James immediately despatched Andrew Barton, with a large ship of war, to inflict summary vengeance on the perpetrators of this cruel deed. Many of the pirates were captured and immediately put to death, and, in the sanguinary spirit of the times, several hogshcads filled with their heads were sent to the Scottish court as a present to the king.*

There is reason to suspect, however, that the Scottish naval officers at this period did not confine themselves to the repression of piratical outrages, or the vindication of their own personal wrongs, but that, in some instances at least, they pushed their retaliation farther than either equity or the laws of nations warranted. It is alleged, that the Bartons captured a much larger number of the Portuguese carracks than was necessary to compensate them for the individual losses which they had suffered; and the merchants of England complained that they even detained and rifled English vessels, under the pretence of searching for Portuguese goods. These complaints at length excited such strong indignation in the Earl of Surrey, that, in order to punish the excesses of the Scottish privateers, he fitted out two men-of-war, manned with picked sailors, and placed them under the command of his sons, Lord Thomas Howard and Sir Edward Howard, afterwards Lord High Admiral of England. According to Buchanan, this step was taken in consequence of the urgent entreaty of the Portuguese ambassador, who represented to Henry, the English monarch, that Barton—a daring and skilful officer who had inflicted immense injury upon the Portuguese, the ancient allies of England, and would certainly, in the event of a war with France, prove a formidable enemy to the English—could at present be easily taken unawares and destroyed, and the odium of the action averted by stigmatizing him as a pirate;—a proceeding by which Henry would provide for the safety of his own subjects and gratify their sovereign, his friend and ally.*

The English men-of-war fell in with Barton and his vessels cruising in the Downs, being guided to the place, it is said, by the captain of a merchant vessel, whom Barton had plundered on the preceding day. The Scottish admiral had with him his own ship, the Lion, and a small sloop, called the Jenny Pirwen; but in spite of his inferiority of force, he courageously waited the attack of the enemy, and distinguished by his rich dress and bright armour, with a whistle of gold suspended about his neck by a chain of the same precious metal, he appeared on deck, and encouraged his men to fight valiantly. The contest was long and obstinately maintained. It is stated in a ballad of the time which commemorates the fight, that the Lion was furnished with a kind of machine which suspended large weights or beams from the yard-arms of the ship, to be dropped down upon the enemy when they should come alongside. This contrivance was known to the English, who were very apprehensive of the injury which it was likely to inflict upon them; and a Yorkshireman named Hustler, the best archer in the ship, was stationed, with strict injunctions to shoot every one who should attempt to go aloft to work the machine. Two of the Scottish seamen were successively killed in the attempt; and at length Barton himself, confiding in the excellence of his armour, began to ascend the mainmast. Lord Thomas Howard called out to the archer to shoot true. "Were I to die for it," said Hustler, "I have but two arrows left." The first which he shot rebounded from Barton's armour of proof, without inflicting any wound; but as the Scottish mariner raised his arm to climb higher, the archer wounded him mortally through the armpit, where his armour afforded him no protection, and he fell upon the deck. Still the intrepid seaman continued to encourage his men with his whistle, till, receiving a shot in the body, he expired. The greater part of his crew were also killed; and the English boarded the vessels, and carried them into the Thames. The captives, after a short imprisonment, were dismissed, but the ships were detained as lawful prizes, and the Lion became the second man-of-war in the English navy.* James was highly indignant at this insult offered to his flag, and the loss of his ship, and his favourite captain, in time of peace, and he instantly despatched a herald to demand satisfaction; but the proud and imperious Henry paid no attention to the remonstrance, merely remarking that the destruction of pirates was no infringement of their treaty, nor any just cause for war.

Various other causes unfortunately contributed at this time to increase the dissatisfaction of the Scottish king, and to precipitate a quarrel between him and his brother-in-law. One of these had its origin in the reign of Henry VII. Sir Robert Ker, the chief cup-bearer of King James, the master of his ordnance, and warden of the middle marches, having given offence to some of the more turbulent borderers, was attacked and slain by three Englishmen, named Heron the Bastard, Lilburn, and Starhead. Henry, with the prudent and pacific policy which marked all his proceedings towards Scotland, at once agreed to surrender the murderers. Lilburn was accordingly delivered up to the Scots, and died in prison; and the other two having fled, Heron of Ford, the brother of the assassin, was apprehended, and sent in fetters to Scotland. After the accession of Henry VIII., and the rumours of a disagreement between that monarch and the Scottish king, Starhead and his accomplice, who had lurked in the interior of England, began to show themselves more openly, and to excite disturbances on the Borders, doubtless expecting that if war should break out between the kingdoms their offence would be overlooked or forgotten. Starhead had taken up his residence at the distance of ninety miles from the Border, where he thought himself safe; but the kindred of the murdered warden were not so easily balked in their schemes of revenge. Sir Andrew Ker, the son of Sir Robert, sent two of his vassals, named Tait, to inflict vengeance on his father's murderer; and they broke into his house accordingly, under night, and having put him to death, brought his head to their master, who, with savage exultation, exposed it publicly at the cross of Edinburgh.† The Bastard Heron, however, was still permitted to rove about the Border, and James made the impunity granted to this criminal a subject of complaint against the English monarch; and his growing dissatisfaction with the conduct of his brother-in-law was aggravated by the meanness and injustice with which Henry withheld from his sister, the Queen of Scotland, a valuable legacy of "silver work, golden work, rings, chains, precious stones, and other abulzements," bequeathed to her by her father or her eldest brother, Prince Arthur.‡

‡ Buchanan, book xiii. chap. xxiv. Pitcottie, vol. i. p. 259. There is a strange discrepancy between the statements of the Scottish and English historians respecting Murder of Sir Robert Ker by the English Borderers.

The main cause, however, of the quarrel which now broke out between the two kingdoms, was the determination of Henry VIII. to engage in war with France, the ancient ally of Scotland. The haughty and ambitious pontiff, Julius II., having gained all he wished by the league of Cambrai, became alarmed at the progress of the French arms in Italy, and, in conjunction with Ferdinand of Spain, succeeded in forming a coalition against France, to which the Emperor Maximilian, the Venetians, and the Swiss republics acceded. Well aware of the importance of securing the aid of England, the pope and Ferdinand employed every effort to prevail upon the English monarch to join the league, and undertake the invasion of the French territories. Henry, whose imagination had been dazzled by the recollection of the brilliant conquests of his ancestors, lent a willing ear to their suggestions, and not only sent ten thousand men, under the Marquis of Dorset, to co-operate with the Spanish army in the invasion of France, but prepared to lead an army in person into the dominions of Louis. Anxious to provide during his absence for the security of his kingdom on the side of Scotland, the English monarch now sent ambassadors to the Scottish court to offer satisfaction for any violations of the peace. Nearly about the same time, envoys arrived in Scotland from the pope and the King of Spain, for the purpose of persuading James to join in the league against France; and, on the other hand, the French monarch, fully aware of the dangers by which he was surrounded, entered into negotiations with his Scottish ally, and to embarrass the operations of England, laboured to induce him to declare war against Henry VIII.

To the proposals of the Spanish ambassador, James answered that his sole wish was to establish the peace of Christendom; and he laboured by every means in his power to accomplish this desirable object. He sent a commission to his uncle, the Duke of Albany, as ambassador to the emperor, to request him to act as mediator between Louis and the papal court; while Andrew Forman, Bishop of Moray, proceeded to France for the same purpose, and after endeavouring to impress his pacific views upon the College of Cardinals and the Marquis of Mantua, laboured but in vain to effect a reconciliation between the pope and the French king.* All these efforts, however, to maintain peace were ineffectual. War had already broken out between France and the papal confederates, and James, whose sympathies were strongly en-

this legacy. The former assert that the jewels referred to were bequeathed to Margaret by her brother, while the latter universally declare that the legacy was left by her father, Henry VII. There is certainly no such bequest in Henry's will, which has been printed in the 'Testamenta Vetusta' of Sir Harris Nicolas; but in the letters sent by Margaret herself to Henry VIII., there are frequent references to his unfriendly conduct toward her in the matter of her father's legacy.

listed on the side of his ancient ally, soon found himself involved in the quarrel. Negotiations with England, however, still continued, and meanwhile Scotland rang with the din of military preparations. Armed musters were held in the various districts of the kingdom; cannon were cast by Robert Borthwick, the master gunner; gunpowder was manufactured under the superintendance of a German, named Urnebrig; ships were launched and equipped with artillery, brought from the fortresses in the interior of the country; and the most experienced naval officers and seamen were directed to hold themselves in readiness for active service. In the midst of these hostile preparations, the Scottish queen, who was still childless, though she had given birth to three children, was delivered in the palace of Linlithgow, on the 10th of April, 1512, of a prince, who was shortly after baptized James, and proclaimed Prince of Scotland and the Isles. He afterwards succeeded to the throne, by the title of James V.

Meanwhile, though war became daily more imminent, negotiations with England were still continued; and Lord Dacre and Dr. West arrived as ambassadors from Henry, to negotiate a mutual remission of all violations of the treaty between the two countries. They were also instructed to request the Scottish king to renew his oath to maintain the peace with England, and to offer on the part of Henry a similar oath for the observation of inviolable amity with Scotland.* They were received by James with great courtesy, and on their departure were loaded with splendid presents; but all their efforts were counteracted by the intrigues of the French ambassador, De la Motte; and the ancient league with France was not only renewed, but a new and most impolitic article was inserted, by which the Scottish court became bound to make no treaty with England, unless with the consent of France.† It is conjectured by Pinkerton, and not without great probability, that "much French gold must have been expended in procuring this extravagant concession, so foreign to any dictate of common prudence." Hostilities may be said virtually to have commenced between the two countries at this time. Inroads were made by the borderers of both countries. An English squadron harassed the Scottish coasts, and took several vessels. A Flemish ship, laden with goods belonging to some Scottish merchants, was captured and carried into Herwick, and a vessel commanded by Falconer, one of James's best captains, was sunk, and himself sent prisoner to London. On the other hand, Robert Barton, acting under his letters of reprisal, captured no fewer than thirteen English merchant vessels, and De la Motte attacked a fleet of these merchantmen, sunk three, and carried seven in triumph into Leith.‡ Henry, perceiving from these proceedings that a war was impending, appointed the Earl of Surrey lieutenant-general of the marches, with authority to array the fencible men of the northern counties, and to take the field against the Scots.

The hope, however, of effecting an amicable ad- Negotiations with justment of the differences be- tween the two sovereigns seems not to have been abandoned on either side. The extensive preparations of the Scottish king had exhausted his exchequer; and Lord Dacre, in a letter to the Bishop of Durham, 17th August, 1512, mentions that the Treasurer of Scotland had privately informed him, that if a present of four or five thousand angels were sent to James, and the disputed legacy paid to his queen, matters might still be brought to a favourable issue.* At this juncture, the Archdeacon of St. Andrews arrived at the Scottish court with letters from Louis, urging a declaration of war with England; but James in reply proposed, that the same annuity should be assigned to him as had been paid to Henry, for Scotland did not possess sufficient funds to carry on an extensive war. Repeated communications passed between the Scottish king and his imperious brother-in-law, and both monarchs continued to profess a desire for peace, though their sincerity appears to be doubtful.

About the beginning of the year 1513, Lord Drummond was sent ambassador to England, and, on the part of his master, offered to Henry a complete and gratuitous remission of all the injuries inflicted by his subjects upon the Scots, provided that monarch would abandon the confederacy against France; but the proposal was peremptorily rejected.† Commissioners were appointed, however, by Henry, to redress any violation of the treaty of perpetual peace; and Dr. West was Second embassy again sent on an embassy to Scot- land, to negotiate a mutual remis- sion of offences, and to endeavour to detach the Scottish king from the interest of France, or at least to procure the promise of a cessation of hostilities during Henry's absence from England. The progress and termination of this mission are detailed, with considerable minuteness, in two letters from West to his sovereign, which furnish some interesting particulars respecting the Scottish court at this period. In the first, which is dated from Stirling, April 1st, 1513, he informs his master that King James, in one of his temporary fits of penitence and devotion, during which he was wont to assume the dress and conform to the rules of the order of Franciscans, had been shut up for a week in the church of the Friars Observants, at Stirling, 'and will meddle with no matter.'‡ Unicorn Herald and John Barton arrived from France with tidings of the death of Pope Julius II. That turbulent pontiff had, it seems, by the promise of a cardinal's hat, secured the services of Forman, Bishop of Moray, who, in the preceding December, had been refused a safe-conduct by Henry, to proceed through England to the French court, for the purpose of negotiating a universal peace. This crafty and ambitious prelate, who was mainly instrumental in instigating hostilities with England,* now informed West of the injury he had received from the refusal of the safe-conduct, and declared that in seven months England should repent of the war. James spoke with great acerbity of the late pontiff, who had issued a bull of excommunication against him, if he should violate the peace with England; a step which had inflamed the mind of the king more than all the French embassies. He expressed his resolution to appeal from this sentence, and to send the Bishop of Moray to the Romish court for that purpose, and to congratulate the new pope, Leo X.; and he declared, that if Julius had lived he would have supported a council of even three bishops against him. He stated to West, that if he were disposed to make war upon England, he would not abandon his design for the pope's 'monition;' but that he would not commence hostilities without previously sending a declaration by a herald, so that if Henry passed over to France, as he intended, he might have ample time to return for the defence of his kingdom. The ambassador having intimated that Henry would pay the sum of one thousand marks if the Scottish king would consent to the abolition of all claims and to keep the peace with England, James replied, that he had no need of Henry's money, and that he would not sell his gear (effects), 'with much other void conversation,' says the courtly reporter. It appears that the Scottish king had formed the romantic project of an expedition to Jerusalem, probably with the hope that, by fighting against the infidels, he might expiate the guilt which he had incurred by taking part in the conspiracy against his father;—and after showing West "a little quire of four sheets of paper, sewed together, and signed with the French king's hand and sealed with his signet," setting forth the advantageous terms offered by the French court to James, if through his instrumentality peace should be made,—he urged, that by the assistance of Louis alone could his expedition to the Holy City be accomplished. He complained that Henry had nominated a successor to the English crown, to the prejudice of his rights as the nearest heir; but this West, as authorized by his instructions, solemnly denied. With regard to the inquiry whether the Scottish monarch would consent to remain inactive during the campaign against France, which formed the main object of West's mission, after various eva-quency sent for him 'into her traverse,' where he delivered to her the letters which he had brought from her royal brother.

‡ Even after his return to court, the king regularly attended the royal chapel every forenoon; and several of his conversations with the English ambassador took place in his 'traverse,'—or enclosed seat, with a lattice,—before high mass. On Good Friday, West went to the king's chapel, where 'the passion was preached,' and after sermon was ended, the sions, it was at length declared, that the continuance of amicable relations between the two nations depended entirely upon the maintenance of peace with France. The queen complained, in spirited terms, of the conduct of her brother in withholding her legacy,* which West informed her he was authorized to pay if her husband would agree to keep the peace; but this proposal was scornfully rejected by James, who declared that the queen should lose nothing for his sake, for he would pay her the sum himself. The English ambassador concludes his letter with an assurance, that he would rather that his master had commanded him to tarry as long in Turkey, "this country is so myser, and the people so ungracious, and even that I shall have sent money to bring me home, the country is so dear. My tarrying here, as I suppose, shall do no good, for this great suit that I make in your grace's name here maketh the people so proud, that almost they know not themselves, and they be so bounden by this new treaty to France, that they dare not displease him neither in word nor deed."†

At this period a fiercely contested action took place in the harbour of Brest, between the French and English fleets, in which the gallant admiral, Sir Edward Howard, lost his life. James on this sent a letter to his brother-in-law (24th May, 1513), in which, after entreating him, in the most urgent terms, to make peace with France, he expresses his grief for the loss of this brave commander, although Howard had in the preceding year slain his favourite captain, Andrew Barton. "Surely, dear brother," he wrote, "we think there is more loss to you of your late admiral, who deceased to his great honour and laud, than the advantage that might have been to you of winning all the French galleys and their equipage. The loss is great to Christendom of that umquihle valiant knight, and other noblemen, that on both sides apparently perished. Pray you, dearest brother, to take our writings in gude part, as our own is; for verily we are sorry, and also our dearest fellow (consort), for this loss, through acquaintance of his father, that noble knight the Earl of Surrey, who conveyed our dearest fellow, the queen, to us.

* "We cannot believe," says she, in a letter to Henry, which was delivered by Dr. West on his return, "that of your mind, or by your command, we are so fremdly (like a stranger) dealt with in our father's legacy, whereof we would nocht have spoken nor written, had not the doctor now spoken to us of the same. Our husband knows it is withheld for his sake, and will recompense us so far as the doctor shows him. We are ashamed therewith, and would God never word had been thereof! It is not worth sic estimation as is in your divers letters of the same. And we lack nothing; our husband is ever the larger, the better to us, as knows God."—Appendix to Pinkerton, vol. ii. No. viii. It has been justly remarked by Mr. Aikman, that Henry, whose fondness for splendid pageantry and expensive show was attended—as all foolish extravagance usually is—by numberless mean and pitiful shifts, in resisting this just claim made upon him for his sister's jewels, behaved in the most ungenerous manner.

Right excellent, right high and mighty prince, our dear brother and cousin, the blest Trinity have you in tuition."‡

Soon after the return of Dr. West to England, a formal demand was made of the jewels bequeathed to Margaret; and if we may rely upon the narrative of the venerable Pitscottie, Henry sent a reply full of the most flattering promises, assuring his sister, that she should be "well satisfied, not only of the same, but the double thereof, on condition that the King of Scotland will keep his oath and band to me that he made lately with consent of his parliament." "Therefore," he continues, "I desire him that he will sit at home in his own chair, and let me and the King of France part betwixt us to seek the right of my own pension, which is holden from me wrongously; and if he does me no good that he does me no evil; and show to him, that it shall neither be gold, silver, lands, riches, nor rent, that shall stand in difference betwixt me and him. And if he will faithfully keep his promise to me, I shall incontinent, with the consent of my nobles, make him Duke of York and Governor of England to my home-coming, for heirs of England must come either of him or me, and I have none as yet lawfully; but I hear say that Margaret, my sister, hath a pretty boy, likely to grow a man of estimation,—I pray God to bless him, and keep him from his enemies, and give me grace to see him in honour when he cometh of age, that I may entertain him according to my honour and duty."§

Meanwhile, the views of the French court were powerfully supported by the frequent and urgent letters of the Bishop of Moray,†—on whom Louis had conferred the archbishopric of Bourges,—and by the intrigues of De la Motte, the French ambassador, who at this time returned from France with four vessels laden with flour and wine, for the supply of the Scottish fleet, and (if we may believe the assertions of Henry) with a large sum of money, which was divided between the king and his nobles. The King of Denmark also sent several ships, freighted with arms and ammunition; and a powerful Irish chief, named O'Donnell, visited Edinburgh and took the oath of homage to James, and offered his services against England. The romantic character of James was well known to the French monarch and his counsellors; and an artful appeal now made by Anne of Brittany, the consort of Louis, to the fantastic spirit of chivalry by which the Scottish king was actuated, had, it is believed, no small influence in accelerating the unhappy rupture with England. Assuming the character of a distressed damsel, she addressed an epistle to James, calling herself his mistress and lady-love, assuring him that she had suffered much blame in defence of his honour and in excusing his inactivity, and imploring him to advance three steps into English ground, for the sake of his mistress. She sent him, at the same time, a ring from her own finger, with fourteen thousand crowns to assist in paying the expenses of his expedition.* This appeal to that high-wrought sense of honour which was the peculiar foible of the Scottish king, was enforced by the remonstrances of Bishop Forman, who assured him, that he would be for ever dishonoured if he did not send to France the assistance which that intriguing prelate had promised in his sovereign's name.

At length, on the 30th of June, 1513, Henry passed over to Calais to open in person the war against France; and as soon as this intelligence reached the Scottish king, he despatched his principal herald to the English camp before Terouenne, with a letter to Henry, enumerating the injuries which James had received from the English monarch and his subjects, and declaring his resolution to support his ally, the King of France. Among the other wrongs which had induced the Scottish king to declare war, mention is made of the death of Barton, with the detention of his ships and artillery; the protection given to Heron, the murderer of the Scottish warden; and the withholding of the jewels and legacy which had been left to Queen Margaret by her father. James complains, also, that several of his nobles had been unjustifiably slain in time of peace, and others had been carried off in fetters into England; that Henry had refused a safe conduct to his ambassador, who wished to proceed to the continent for the purpose of negotiating a general peace,—conduct unheard of even among infidels; and that the English king had not only unnecessarily delayed the redress of these grievances, but, in spite of the remonstrances of his brother-in-law, had made a wanton attack on his allies, the Duke of Gueldres and the King of France, thereby giving him too much reason to dread that similar treatment awaited himself. Wherefore, he concludes, "we require and desire you to desist from further invasion of our brother and cousin, the most Christian king, to whom, by all confederation of blood and alliance, we are bound and obliged for mutual defence of each other, certifying that we will take part in defence of our brother and cousin, and will do what thing we trust may cause you to desist from pursuit of him." †

On perusing this letter, which he justly regarded as a declaration of war, Henry broke out into a paroxysm of rage, and poured forth a torrent of Henry's reply. invectives against James, which he desired the Scottish herald to repeat to his master. "Sire," said the envoy, "I am his natural subject, and what he commands me to say, that must I boldly utter; but the commands of others I may not, nor dare say, to my sovereign lord. But your letters sent by me may declare your pleasure, albeit the matter requireth doings, and not sayings—that is, that you should immediately return home." "I will return," replied Henry, "at mine own pleasure, to your damage, and not at your master's summons."* A violent and scornful reply to the letter of the Scottish king was forthwith drawn up by Henry, treating his complaints as mere colourable pretences, reproaching him with the violation of his oath in breaking the peace which he had solemnly sworn to observe, and with dishonourable behaviour in taking advantage of the absence of the English monarch from his own dominions, which it was evident he had waited for, as in none of his letters preceding that event had he ever mentioned his intention of taking part with the French; "which we cannot greatly marvel at," he adds, "considering the ancient accustomed manner of your progenitors, which never kept longer faith and promise than pleased them." He informs James, however, that, remembering the 'brittleness' of his promise, and suspecting his unsteadfastness, he had taken precautions for the defence of his kingdom, which he firmly trusted would be sufficient for its protection against the 'malice of schismatics and their adherents.' He holds out a threat, that the conduct of the Scottish king should be punished by the exclusion of himself and his descendants from the succession to the crown of England, on which he alleges that James had fixed his eye; and reminds him of the fate of the King of Navarre, who, by adhering to the cause of the French monarch, was now a king without a kingdom. Finally, he rejects with scorn the summons of James, requiring him to desist from his invasion of France; and declares that he does not regard him as a competent authority to make such a demand. This letter, however, never reached the Scottish king, as the herald was detained, on his return, in Flanders, and did not arrive in Scotland till after the fatal battle of Flodden. †

James, however, did not await the return of his ambassador to commence hostilities. On the same day in which the Lion herald was despatched to France, the fleet which the Scottish king had built and equipped at an immense cost, sailed to the assistance of his ally. It consisted of twenty-three sail, of which thirteen were large ships of war, including the Great Michael, the Margaret, and the James; the rest were small-armed craft. It had on board three thousand soldiers, under the command of the Earl of Arran, a nobleman of limited talents and experience, and, as the event proved, utterly unfit for such an important trust. James, who had taken the deepest interest in the equipment of this expedition, was anxious that it should reach the coast of France as speedily as possible; and with the object of animating the leaders, captains, and seamen, he embarked in the Great Michael, and remained on board till they had passed the Isle of May. But the foolish and incompetent commander, instead of proceeding to his appointed destination, ordered the fleet to be conducted to Carrickfergus, in Ireland, which was at that time in alliance with Scotland, and after pillaging and burning the town, sparing neither sex nor age,* he returned to Ayr with his plunder, "as if," says Buchanan, "he had performed a great exploit." James was exasperated beyond measure at this infamous behaviour on the part of Arran, and immediately ordered him to be superseded in the command, and to be sent back to answer for his conduct. The Earl of Angus was appointed general of the troops in his room, while the celebrated naval officer, Sir Andrew Wood, was directed to assume the command of the fleet; but before they could reach the coast, Arran having, it is said, heard from his friends how the king stood affected towards him, hoisted his sails and stood out to sea. A deep obscurity rests over the subsequent history of this armament, on which the Scottish king placed so much dependence, and expended such vast sums of money. A part of the fleet returned to Scotland, shattered and disabled, while another part, including the Great Michael, was purchased by Louis at a small price, from the Scottish government after the death of King James.†

Although the war with England was generally unpopular, both among the nobles and the people of Scotland, yet the Scottish prince was so beloved by his subjects, that when orders were given to assemble all the array of the kingdom upon the Borough-moor of Edinburgh, the appeal was answered by the muster from all parts of the country of one of the most numerous and best-equipped armies Scotland has ever seen. Hostilities were commenced by the Earl of Home, the lord chamberlain, who, at the head of three or four thousand men, made an incursion into England, and pillaged and burned seven villages or hamlets on the borders. On their return home, laden with booty, and marching carelessly and without order, the invaders fell into an ambush laid for them by Sir William Bulmer, among the tall broom on Millfield Plain, near Wooler, and were surprised and defeated with great slaughter. Five or six hundred were slain on the spot, and four hundred were taken prisoners, among whom was Sir George Home, the brother of the earl. ‡

* The unprovoked barbarities perpetrated by the Scottish troops in the sack of Carrickfergus are described by Sir David Lindsay, in his 'Historie of Squire Meldrum,' a Scottish gentleman, who was present in this expedition; and he represents his hero as protecting women, priests, and friars from the brutal outrages of the soldiers. Sir D. Lindsay's Works by Chalmers, vol. ii. p. 248.

"And as they passed by Ireland coast
The admiral gart land his host,
And set Craigfergus into fyre,
And saved neither barne nor byre;
It was great pity for to hear
Of the people, the baleful cheer,
And how the land folk were spulyeit (spoiled),
Fair women under fute were fulyeit (defiled)."

‡ Holinshed, vol. v. p. 476. Buchanan (book xiii. chap. xxix.) estimates the number of prisoners at two hundred.

This mortifying reverse deeply incensed the Scottish monarch, and made him doubly impatient to commence hostilities, in order to avenge the defeat sustained by his warden. He determined, therefore, without delay, to lead his army in person across the English border. His wisest counsellors strove in vain to divert him from this rash and fatal resolution, and his queen, with sobs and tears, implored him not to peril his own life and the security of his realm, by taking the field against her brother. She assured him that she had been frightened and perplexed by terrifying dreams, and asked him, with the displeasure natural to wounded and slighted affection, "Why he preferred pleasing the Queen of France, to her, his wife, and the mother of his children?" But James, says Pitscottie, "refused all advice which was for the weal of his crown and country, neither would he listen to the counsel of his wise and prudent wife, for no prayer or supplication she could make him. Albeit, this noble woman, labouring as mickle (much) as she might, for the weal of her husband, and as well as for the love she bore her brother the King of England, she desired that no discord should occur between the two realms in her time."* The remonstrances and entreaties of his queen and nobles having thus failed of effect, an attempt was made to deter him from his expedition by working upon the feelings of superstitious melancholy which, partly arising from constitutional habits, partly from his remorse on account of his rebellion against his father, formed a prominent feature in the character of the Scottish king. The account of the singular stratagem employed for this purpose, is given by Pitscottie with characteristic simplicity.

"The king, seeing that France could get no support of him, for that time, made a proclamation full hastily through all the realm of Scotland, both east and west, south and north, as well in the isles as in the firm land, to all manner of men between sixty and sixteen years, that they should be ready within twenty days to pass with him, with fifty days' victual, and to meet at the Burrow-muir of Edinburgh, and there to pass forward where he pleased. His proclamations were hastily obeyed contrary the Council of Scotland's will, but every man loved his prince so well that they would in no ways disobey him, but every man caused make his provision, so hastily, conform to the charge of the king's proclamation.

"The king came to Lithgow where he happened to be, for the time at the council, very sad and dolorous, making his devotion to God to send him good chance and fortune in his voyage. In this mean time, there came a man, clad in a blue gown,

He says, the invaders divided their plunder on the enemy's territory, and each proceeded home with his part by the nearest route—that it was the rear which fell into the ambuscade, and that the plunder which had been sent on before arrived safely in Scotland.

* Pitscottie, vol. i. p. 267.

in at the kirk door, and belted about him in a roll of linen-cloth; a pair of brotikins (buskins) on his feet, to the great of his legs; with all other hose and clothes conform thereto; but he had nothing on his head but syde (long) red yellow hair behind, and on his haffets (checks) which wan down to his shoulders; but his forehead was bald and bare. He seemed to be a man of two-and-fifty years, with a great pike-staff in his hand, and came first forward among the lords, crying and speiring (asking) for the king, saying he desired to speak with him. While, at the last, he came where the king was sitting in the desk at his prayers; but when he saw the king, he made him little reverence or salutation, but leaned down grofing on the desk before him, and said to him in this manner, as after follows:—'Sir king, my mother hath sent me to you, desiring you not to pass, at this time, where you are purposed, for if thou does, thou wilt not fare well in thy journey, nor none that passeth with thee. Further, she bade thee mell (meddle) with no woman, nor use their counsel, nor let them touch thy body, nor thou theirs; for, if thou do it, thou wilt be confounded and brought to shame.' By this man had spoken these words unto the king's grace, the evensong was near done, and the king paused on these words, studying to give an answer; but, in the mean time, before the king's eyes, and in the presence of all the lords that were about him for the time, this man vanished away, and could no ways be seen or comprehended, but vanished away as he had been a blink of the sun, or a whip of the whirlwind, and could no more be seen. I heard say, Sir David Lindsay, lyon-herald, and John Inglis, the marshal, who were at that time young men and special servants to the king's grace, were standing presently beside the king, and thought to have laid hands on this man, that they might have speired further tidings at him. But all for nought; they could not touch, for he vanished away betwixt them, and was no more seen."*

The tradition of Linlithgow bears that the mysterious stranger eluded the grasp of those who attempted to seize him, by gliding behind a curtain which concealed a private stair leading towards the upper part of the church; and that, on leaving this building, he crossed the court, and entered the palace by a small door under the chapel window.† This strange story is confirmed by Buchanan, who received it from Sir David Lindsay, and whose testimony he declares to be unimpeachable.‡ Thus supported, as Sir Walter Scott remarks, we have only to choose betwixt a deception and a supernatural appearance. The visitant is said to have been a servant of the queen; and there can be little doubt that the stratagem was contrived by Margaret, or some of the party opposed to the war, in the hope that a warning conveyed in this mysterious manner might have some effect on the romantic spirit of the king.

Undeterred by this simulated vision, the origin of which he probably suspected, James proceeded to Edinburgh to meet the feudal array of his kingdom on the Borough-moor, which was at that time, according to Drummond of Hawthornden, "a field, spacious, and delightful by the shade of many stately and aged oaks."* There were assembled "all his earls, lords, barons, and burgesses; and all manner of men, between sixty and sixteen, spiritual and temporal, burgh and land, islesmen and others, to the number of a hundred thousand, not reckoning carriage-men and artillery-men, who had the charge of fifty shot of cannons."† At this last hour, another attempt was made to deter the king from his unpolitic war, by working upon his superstitious fears. His artillerymen were employed night and day in bringing down military stores from the castle of Edinburgh, and they were at work one night, heaving down the cannon called the Seven Sisters, which had lately been cast by Robert Borthwick, the royal master-gunner; the king being in the abbey of Holyrood at the time, "when," says Pitcottie, "there was a cry heard at the market-cross of Edinburgh, at the hour of midnight, proclaiming as it had been a summons, which was named and called by the proclaimer thereof, 'The Summons of Plotcock,' (or Pluto,) which desired all men to compear, both earl, lord, and baron, and all honest gentlemen within the town (every man specified by his own name)—to compear, within the space of forty days, before his master, where it should happen him to appoint, and be for the time, under the pain of disobedience. But whether this summons was proclaimed by vain persons, night-wakers, or drunken men for their pastime, or if it was a spirit, I cannot tell truly; but it was shewn to me that an indweller of the town, Mr. Richard Lawson, being evil-disposed, ganging in his gallery-stair, foreanct the cross, hearing this voice proclaiming this summons, thought marvel what it should be; cried on his servant to bring him his purse, and when he had brought him it, he took out a crown, and cast it over the stair, saying, 'I appeal from that summons, judgment, and sentence thereof, and take me all whole in the mercy of God, and Christ Jesus, his Son.' Verily, the author of this that caused me write the manner of this summons, was a landed gentleman, who was at that time twenty years of age, and was in the town the time of the said summons; and thereafter, when the field was stricken, he swore to me there was no man that escaped that was called in the summons; but that one man alone, which made his protestation, and appealed from the said summons; but all the lave (rest) were perished in the field with the king." "This news spread through the town on the morne, and came to the king's ears, who gave them but little credence, nor would he give no credence to no counsaill, signe, nor token that made against his purpose."^a

had ever invaded England. He crossed the Tweed on the 22nd of August, and encamped on the banks of the Till, near Twisel. Here he remained for two days, and on the 24th, with the consent of the members of the three Estates who were in his army, he passed an act ordaining that the heirs of all who fell in the present war should be free from the feudal burdens of 'ward, relief or marriage,' whatever might be their age.† From Twisel-haugh, where this decree was enacted, the Scottish army moved down the side of the Tweed, and laid siege to the castle of Norham, which surrendered on the 29th of August. The border towers of Wark, Etal,

Foolish conduct and Ford, were then in succession attacked and taken, and in these petty enterprizes, utterly unworthy of his vast preparations, James wasted the precious time which might have enabled him to carry his arms to the gates of Newcastle, before the English were prepared to offer any resistance. When the castle of Ford was stormed, Lady Heron, the wife of Sir William Heron the castellan, who was still a prisoner in Scotland, was taken prisoner, and according to the Scottish historians this beautiful and artful dame had such influence over the infatuated monarch as to induce him to idle away his time till the opportunity of striking an effective blow against the enemy was irretrievably lost.‡

While James lay thus inactive, his troops began to experience a scarcity of provisions; and to suffer severely from the incessant rains. Great numbers, especially of the highlanders and islesmen, returned home. Many, too, deserted for the purpose of placing in safety the booty which they had collected, so that in a short time the army was reduced to about thirty thousand men, a disproportionate number of whom consisted of lords and gentlemen, with their personal attendants.§ Meanwhile the Earl of Surrey, to whom Henry had committed the task of defending his dominions during his absence, was actively engaged in concentrating the military array of the northern counties, and soon succeeded in raising an army of twenty-six thousand men. In passing through Durham he received from the prior of the convent the sacred banner of St. Cuthbert, for the purpose of animating the courage of his soldiers. On the 30th of August he was joined at Newcastle by Lord Daere, Sir William Bulmer, Sir Marmaduke Constable, and others of the northern chivalry; and on reaching Alnwick, was met by his son Thomas, the Lord High Admiral of England, with a reinforcement of five thousand men who had been sent homo from the English army in France, to assist in the defence of their native country.* After this junction, Surrey, feeling himself the stronger party, despatched a herald on the Messages between James and Surrey.

4th of September, to challenge the Scottish king to fight on the following Friday, if he had courage to remain so long on English ground. The herald was also instructed to charge James with the violation of the treaty of perpetual peace between the two kingdoms, which had been confirmed by his solemn oath; and Lord Thomas Howard sent at the same time a rude and insulting message, informing the King of Scots, that as High Admiral of England, he was come to justify the death of that pirate Andrew Barton, of which James had so often complained; that he would be in the vanguard of the army, and as he expected no quarter from his enemies, so he would give none, unless to the king himself, should he fall into his hands. James left the insulting message of the admiral unnoticed, but to the challenge of Surrey he returned for answer, that to meet the English in battle was so much his wish, that had the message of the earl found him at Edinburgh, he would have laid aside all other business to have met him on the field of battle. With regard to the accusation of a breach of faith, which the English general had brought against him, he gave it an unqualified denial. His brother, the King of England, he said, was under equal obligation with himself to observe the league; he had sworn to keep the peace with England, so long as the English monarch maintained his faith with him. This he was the first to break; redress had been frequently demanded, but without effect. He had given warning to his brother of his resolution to commence hostilities, which was more than his brother had done to him. On the equity of these proceedings he rested his quarrel, which, by God's help, it was his purpose to maintain with his arms on the day that Surrey had named.

The Scottish nobles, however, were exceedingly dissatisfied with this resolution of their king. They insisted that he had already done all that was requisite to vindicate his honour or to satisfy the claims of his ally; that his retreat would oblige the English either to retire or to disperse, as it was impossible they could subsist in a country so grievously plundered and laid waste; but if it was his determination to try the issue of a battle, he would fight to much greater advantage in his own kingdom; and finally, that the loss of a battle in present circumstances, would be productive of the most fatal consequences to the welfare of the country. They held a council to discuss the point at issue, and Patrick Lord Lindsay of the Byres, then the Nestor of the Scottish army, was appointed their chancellor or president, as being "the most learned of their number, and of the greatest age, and of the greatest experience amongst them all." The nobles laid the case before him, and required his opinion.

"My Lords," replied the sage old baron, "ye desire my opinion, if the king shall give battle to England or not, at this time. My lords, I will give you forth a similitude, desiring you to know my mind by the same hereafter. I compare your lordships to an honest merchant, who would in his voyage go to the dice with a common hazarder, and there jeopard a rose-noble, on a cast against a glead (crooked) half-penny—which if this merchant wins it will be counted but little, or else nought; but if he tyne (loses) he tyne his honour with that piece of gold—which is of far greater value. So, my lords! ye may understand by this, ye shall be called the merchant, and your king the rose-noble, and England the common hazarder who has nothing to jeopard but a glead halfpenny, in comparison of our noble king, and an auld crooked earle, lying in a chariot. And though they tyne him, they tyne but little; but if we jeopard our noble prince at this time with a simple wight and happen to tyne him, we will be called evil merchants, and far waur (worse) counsellors to his majesty; for if we tyne him, we tyne the whole realm of Scotland, and the nobility thereof (for nane, my lords, have bidden here with us at this time but nobles and gentlemen). Sa, I conclude, that it is not decent nor seemly for us to jeopard our noble king and his nobility with an auld crooked earle and certain sutors (shoemakers) and tailors with him in company. But better it were to cause the king to remove, and certain of his lords, whom he thinks maist expedient to take the matter in hand, and jeopard themselves for the king's pleasure and their own honour, and for the common weal of the country at this time; and if your lordships will conclude in this manner I hold it best in my opinion."*

The barons had agreed in this conclusion, and were appointing leaders to the different divisions of the army, "to fight against England, and the king to pass with certain of his nobility, a little from the army, where he might see the valiant acts on both sides;" when James, who was present in disguise, interrupted their deliberations with a furious avowal of his determination to fight against England with his own arm, though they had all sworn to the contrary; "and as for Lord Lindsay," said he, turning to the venerable statesman, "I vow to God, I shall never see Scotland sooner than I shall cause hang him over his own yett (gate)!"

The aged Earl of Angus, the celebrated Bell-the-Cat, earnestly remonstrated against this rash and imprudent resolution of the king, and charged the French ambassador De la Motte, by whom this fatal policy was eagerly abetted, with being willing to sacrifice the interests of Scotland to those of France. But James was so enraged at the free remonstrance of the old warrior that he scornfully replied, "Angus, if you are afraid you may go home." The earl burst into tears at this unpardonable insult, and turned to depart, saying mournfully, "If my past life does not free me from any suspicion of cowardice, I do not know what can: as long as my body was capable of exertion I never spared it in defence of my country, or my sovereign's honour. But now since my age renders my body of no use in battle, and my counsel is despised, I leave my two sons and the vassals of Douglas in the field: may Angus's forebodings be unfounded." He quitted the camp that night, but his two sons, George, Master of Angus, and Sir William Douglas, of Glenberrie, with two hundred gentlemen of the name of Douglas, fell in the battle.* The counsels of the Earl of Huntley, a wise and experienced leader, were equally ineffectual. The king obstinately adhered to his resolution to fight, even though the enemy should be a hundred thousand strong.†

The Earl of Surrey had now advanced as far as Wooler, so that the hostile armies were separated by a distance of only four or five miles. The Scottish king had meanwhile changed his first encampment for a much stronger position upon Flodden Hill, one of the last and lowest eminences of the Cheviot range; steep on both flanks, and defended in front by the deep and sluggish river Till, a tributary of the Tweed. When the English general came in sight of this position he durst not venture to attack it, and having succeeded in his former attempt to pique the romantic honour of the Scottish king, he resolved to try whether he could not prevail on him to abandon his vantage-ground and descend into the plain. He, therefore, sent a letter to James from Wooler-haugh, subscribed by himself and the principal leaders of his army, reminding him of his acceptance of the offer of battle, and complaining that, instead of remaining in the place where the English herald had found him, he had "put himself into a ground more like a fortress or a camp than any indifferent field for battle to be tried." He, therefore, invited the king to come down from the height, and to give battle in the open plain of Millfield below, and hinted that it was the opinion of the English nobles that any delay of the encounter "would sound to the king's dishonour."‡

The conduct of James had been sufficiently rash and imprudent, but either his returning good sense, or the remonstrances of his counsellors, prevented him from acceding to the unreasonable request of his adversary, and he refused even to admit the messenger into his presence. The English army was now reduced to great straits for want of provisions in a plundered and wasted country,* and their commander resolved to try another mode of bringing the Scots to action. On the 8th of Sept. he passed the Skilful manœuvre of Surrey. Till, near Weetwood, and marched through some rugged grounds on its east side to Barmoor Wood, about two miles distant from the Scottish position, where he spent the night. An eminence on the east of Ford concealed the march of the English from the enemy, but a few cannon shots were fired upon Lord Thomas Howard and his staff while reconnoitering their position from this height. Early next morning the English army continued its march in a north-westerly direction, till near the confluence of the Till and the Tweed, when the vanguard and artillery re-crossed the Till at Twisel Bridge, while the rear passed the river at a ford about a mile higher up. Having by this skilful manœuvre fairly placed themselves between the Scottish king and his own country, the English bent their march in full array towards Flodden Hill. The Scots seem to have thought their position sufficiently protected on the east side, by the deep and sluggish Till and its dangerous fords, and by a battery of cannon which they had erected near the foot of the eastern declivity of Flodden, bearing on the bridge of Ford, in the vicinity of their encampment. When the movement of Surrey was first perceived James imagined that it was the intention of the English general to cross the Tweed, and plunder the fertile district of the Merse, in order to provide subsistence for his army. In this opinion he is said to have been confirmed by one Giles Musgrove, an Englishman, who enjoyed his confidence, and treacherously advised him to descend from his advantageous position to pursue the enemy, and prevent them from laying waste his kingdom.†

While the English were crossing the Till with their vanguard separated from their rear, the Infatuated conduct of the Scottish king. Scottish nobles in vain entreated their king to avail himself of the favourable opportunity thus afforded of attacking them. Borthwick, master of his artillery, fell on his knees before him, and earnestly implored permission to bring his guns to bear on the columns of the enemy as they defiled over the narrow bridge, when they could easily have been driven back, and thrown into irretrievable confusion. "But tho king," says Pitscottie, "answered this gunner, Robert Borthwick, like to one man bereft of all wit and judgment, saying, 'I will cause hang thee and quarter thee if thou shoot a shot this day, for I will have the enemy all in a plain field before me, and assay them what they can do.'" ‡

As soon as the English army was drawn up in order of battle, on the left bank of the Till, the Scots setting fire to the temporary huts of their encampment, descended from the ridge of Flodden, and hastened to take possession of the neighbouring eminence of Brankston, towards which the vanguard of the enemy was advancing from the opposite direction. They were divided into five battles, drawn up in a line about the distance of a bow-shot from each other; and "they marched like the Germans," says the official account of the battle, "without talking or making any noise."* The clouds of smoke from the burning huts being driven in the face of the English, obscured their view, so that they had crossed the little stream of Palinsburn, and advanced almost to the foot of Brankston-hill, before they perceived the Scottish army at the distance of only a quarter of a mile. The two armies were nearly equal in numbers, each consisting of about thirty thousand men, and the arrangement of both was nearly the same. The English advanced in four divisions. The right wing, which formed the van of their army, consisted of ten thousand men, and was led by Lord Thomas Howard, the Admiral of England, and his brother, Sir Edmund. The centre was commanded by the Earl of Surrey; the left wing, which was composed of the men of Lancashire and of the Palatinate of Chester, was committed to the charge of Sir Edward Stanley; while a strong body of horse, under Lord Daere, formed a reserve. The artillery was placed in the front and in the spaces between the divisions. The left wing of the Scots, which formed the vanguard, was commanded by the Earl of Huntley and Lord Home. The king in person led the centre; and the Earls of Lennox and Argyle the right wing; the reserve, consisting of the men of Lothian, was commanded by the Earl of Bothwell. The admiral perceiving the Scots approaching in four strong columns, 'armed with Moorish pikes,' immediately despatched a messenger to his father, with the Agnus Dei which he wore at his breast, as a token, requesting him to extend his lines with all speed, and to

* Gazette of the Battle, Pinkerton's History, Appendix, vol. ii. p. 456. The striking silence observed by the Scots in their descent from the hill is noticed by nearly every contemporary writer. "Little or no noise did they make," says an account of the battle, printed in the year in which it was fought. This picturesque incident, together with the firing of the Scottish camp, is noticed by Sir Walter Scott, in his spirit-stirring description of the conflict:—

" — Sudden as he spoke
From the sharp ridges of the hill,
All downward to the banks of Till,
Was wreathed in sable smoke.
Volumed and vast and rolling far,
The cloud enveloped Scotland's war,
As down the hill they broke.
Nor martial shout, nor minstrel tone,
Announced their march; their tread alone,
At times one warning trumpet blown,
At times a stifled hum,
Told England from his mountain-throne
King James did rushing come.—
Scarce could they hear or see their foes, Until at weapon point they close."

strengthen the van by drawing up the centre on its left.* The battle commenced at four in the afternoon, with cannonading on both sides. The English were superior in artillery, and their guns appear to have been better served. "Then out burst the ordnance on both sides," says an old chronicler, "with fire, flame, and hideous noise, and the master gunner of the English slew the master gunner of Scotland, and beat all his men from their guns, so that the Scottish ordnance did no harm to the Englishmen, but the Englishmen's artillery shot into the midst of the king's battalion, and slew many persons—which seeing, the King of Scots and his brave men made the more haste to come to joining." The first that encountered, was the left wing of the Scots, under Huntley and Home, which made such a furious onset upon that portion of the English vanguard commanded by Sir Edmund Howard, as to overpower and throw it into disorder. After a stout resistance, Sir Edmund's banner was taken, his division totally routed, and he himself beaten down and placed in imminent danger, when he was rescued by the bastard Heron, who had joined the English army at the head of a band of fierce outlaws like himself. † Sir Edmund escaped with difficulty to his brother's division; but Lord Dacre, advancing to his support with the reserve of cavalry, appears to have kept Huntley in check; while Home's men, who were chiefly Borderers, began to disperse over the field in search of plunder. ‡ Meanwhile the admiral, whose flank the victors ought to have attacked, availed himself of their inactivity, and, reinforced by Dacre, bore down upon another division of the Scottish vanguard, commanded by the Earls of Crawford and Montrose. After a long and stubborn contest, these nobles were both slain, and their forces routed. On the extreme right of the Scottish army, the Campbells, Mackenzies, Macleans, Macleods, and other clans from the Highlands and Isles, who were commanded by the Earls of Lennox and Argyle, suffered so severely from the volleys of the Cheshire and Lancashire archers, that they broke their array, and rushed eagerly forward to close with the enemy, in spite of the signals, menaces, and cries of La Motte, and other experienced French officers, who strove to keep them in their ranks.* At first the English pikemen reeled under the fierce onslaught; but speedily recovering from the shock, they attacked their undisciplined and disorganized assailants in front and flank, and routed them with great slaughter. The Earls of Lennox and Argyle, with most of the chiefs of the clans, perished in the struggle. While the fortune of the day thus varied on the wings, the Scottish king and the Earl of Surrey were engaged in a fierce and dubious conflict in the centre. In spite of the remonstrances of his attendants, James, who fought on foot like the rest of his division, persisted in exposing his person in the thickest of the battle, and, surrounded by his nobles and knights, he placed himself in front of his spearmen, and charged with such fury, that the ranks of the English were broken, and the standard of Surrey was in imminent danger. At this critical moment, the flank of the Scottish centre was assailed by Lord Dacre and the admiral, who had succeeded in defeating the division led by Crawford and Montrose. The Earl of Bothwell, however, came up with the reserve, and restored the fight. The struggle was long and obstinately maintained, and for a time victory seemed to incline to the Scots. No quarter was given on either side, and the ground became at length so slippery from the blood shed in this desperate strife, that the combatants pulled off their boots and shoes, to obtain a firmer footing, and fought in their hose. But by this time the right wing of the Scottish army had been totally routed, and Sir Edward Stanley, with his victorious followers, assailed the rear and right flank of the king's division, which was thus surrounded on all sides and pressed by overwhelming odds. The Scots, however, still resolutely maintained the contest, and throwing themselves into a circle, with their spears extended on every side, they repelled every attempt to break their serried phalanx. † At length, the king himself fell, pierced with arrows and mortally wounded in the head by a bill, within a spear's length of the Earl of Surrey; but his nobles

† It is alleged by Pitcottie (vol. i. p. 278) that when the Earl of Huntley urged Lord Home to go to the assistance of the king, he replied, "He does well that does for himself. We have fought our vanguard, and won the same, therefore, let the lave (rest) do their part as well as ye." This statement, however, is in the highest degree improbable, and seems to have been invented by the enemies of Home, who incurred great odium, in consequence of his having returned unhurt, and loaded with spoil from this fatal conflict. Lord Dacre, in a letter to the English council, dated 17th May, 1514, states that in the field of Brankston he and his friends encountered the Earl of Huntley and the Chamberlain; that Sir John Home, Cuthbert Home, of Fastcastle, the son and heir of Sir John Home, Sir William Cockburn, of Langton, and his son, the son and heir of Sir David Home, the laird of Blacater, and many other of Lord Home's kinsmen and friends were slain; and that, on the other hand, Philip Dacre, brother of Lord Dacre, was taken prisoner by the Scots, and many other of his kinsfolks, servants, and tenants were either taken or slain in the battle. This statement completely disproves the charge against Home, that he remained inactive after defeating the division under Sir Edmund Howard. Pinkerton, vol. ii. Appendix, p. 400.

closed around the body, and obstinately defended it till night put an end to the carnage, and separated the combatants. The English general then drew back his forces, as he was yet uncertain of the issue of the conflict, for the Scottish centre was still unbroken, and the division under Home had been victorious. During the night, the Borderers who fought under the banner of that noble collected a considerable booty, by pillaging the slain, while the marauders of Tynedale and Teviotdale, who like birds of prey had been hovering in the neighbourhood, were employed in rifling the tents and stealing the horses of the English. When the morning broke, the Scots were found to have abandoned the field, and their artillery were seen standing deserted on the side of the hill.

The English general immediately ordered solemn thanks to be given for the victory, and then created forty knights on the field. Even after all this, Home's banner was seen hovering near the right flank of the English, while another body of the Scots, probably the remnant of the centre division of their army, appeared upon a hill in front, and were about to renew the contest, when they were dislodged from their position by a discharge of the English artillery.* Lord Dacre, with his cavalry, followed their retreat for about four miles, but they retired deliberately and in good order, and the Borderers carried off with them into Scotland a large booty and a considerable number of prisoners.

The Scottish artillery, which fell into the hands of the victors, consisted of seventeen cannon of various shapes and dimensions, among which was the fine train of seven pieces, called the 'Seven Sisters,' recently cast by the celebrated Robert Borthwick, who was killed beside his own guns in the beginning of the conflict. According to the official report of the battle, they were "the neatest, the soundest, the best fashioned, the smallest in the touch-hole, and the most beautiful of their size and length that ever were seen."

The loss of the Scots in this disastrous field amounted to from eight to ten thousand men;† but these included the flower of their nobility, gentry, and even clergy. Besides the king and his natural son, the Archbishop of St. Andrews, who had studied abroad under Erasmus, there were slain twelve earls—Crawford, Montrose, Lennox, Argyle, Errol, Athole, Morton, Cassilis, Bothwell, Rothes, Caithness, and Glencairn. To these must be added the Bishop of Caithness and of the Isles, the Abbots of Inchaffray and Kilwinning, the Dean of Glasgow, and fifteen lords and chiefs of clans, amongst whom were Sir Duncan Campbell, of Glenurehy; Lauchlan Maclean, of Dowart; and Campbell, of Lawers; and five eldest sons of peers; besides La Motte, the French ambassador, and the secretary of the king. Scarce a Scottish family of eminence, as Sir Walter Scott remarks, but has had an ancestor killed at Flodden. Some of them lost all their male members that were capable of bearing arms; and there is no province in Scotland, even at this day, where the battle is mentioned without a sensation of terror and sorrow.* The loss of the English has been variously estimated, it probably amounted to about five thousand men;‡ but in that number were included very few persons of distinction. The body of James was found by Lord Dacre amongst the thickest of the slain, and although much disfigured by wounds,§ was recognized by that noble, who was well acquainted with the king's person, and was afterwards identified at Berwick by the Scottish chancellor, Sir William Scott, Sir John Forman, and some other persons. It was embalmed and ultimately placed in the monastery of Sheen, in Surrey.¶ It was long believed in Scotland, that

James did not perish in the fatal field of Flodden. Buchanan states, that he himself had heard one Lawrence Telfer, one of the royal pages, say that he saw the king cross the Tweed on horseback after the battle, and a similar statement is made by Bishop Lesley.|| This report probably originated in the circumstance that several of the Scottish nobles had worn in the engagement a dress similar to the king's. According to one of the preposterous stories which passed current among the credulous of that day, in the twilight, when the fight was nearly ended, four horsemen mounted the king on a dun hackney,

- * "To town and tower, to down and dale,
They tell red Flodden's dismal tale,
And raise the universal wail;
Tradition, legend, tune, and song,
Shall many an age that wail prolong;
Still from the sire the son shall hear
Of the stern strife and carnage drear
Of Flodden's fatal field,
Where shiver'd was fair Scotland's spear,
And broken was her shield!"

† "When James's body was found, his neck was opened in the middle with a wide wound, his left hand, almost cut off in two places, did scarce hang to his arm, and the archers had shot him in many places of his body."—Godwin's Annals, p. 22; Tytler, vol. v. p. 68, note.

§ As James died under sentence of excommunication, which he incurred by breaking the treaty of peace, his body was not committed to the tomb. Leo X., in a letter dated Nov. 20, 1513, granted permission to Henry to inter the body of his brother-in-law with due pomp in the cathedral of St. Paul's, because he had been informed that in his last moments the king of Scotland had given some signs of repentance. It was left above ground, however, at Sheen, lapped up in a sheet of lead, till the Reformation, when the monastery became the property and residence of Henry Grey, Duke of Suffolk, who permitted it to be flung into a lumber room among old pieces of wood, lead, and other rubbish, in which state it was seen by Stow, the historian. "Since the which time," says that writer, "some workmen there for their foolish pleasure hewed off the head; and one Lancelot Young, master glazier to Queen Elizabeth, feeling a savour to come from thence (owing, doubtless, to the spices used for embalming the body), and seeing this same dried from all moisture, and yet the form remaining, with the hair of the head and beard red, brought it to London, to his house in Wood Street, where for a time he kept it for its sweetness, but in the end caused the sexton of St. Michael's, Wood Street, to bury it among other bones taken out of the charnel-house of that church."—Stow's Survey of London.

and conveyed him across the Tweed with them at nightfall. From that time he was never heard of, but it was believed that he was murdered either in Home Castle, or near Kelso, by the vassals of Lord Home.* This story is too absurd to require refutation. Home had no adequate motive to induce him to commit such a crime. He was the chamberlain of the king, and his prime favourite; and, as it has been justly remarked, he had much to lose (in fact did lose all) in consequence of James's death, and nothing earthly to gain by that event. Another report long current in Scotland gave a more romantic turn to the king's fate, and averred that James had gone on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land to pray for the souls of his slaughtered nobles, and to do penance for the death of his father and the breach of his oath of amity with England.† In support of this opinion, it was contended that the English could never show the iron belt which the king is said to have worn round his body, as a token of his repentance for his share in the rebellion against his father. But this he was likely enough to have laid aside on the day of battle, as encumbering his personal exertions when he meant to do the duty of a brave soldier rather than of a prudent and skilful commander. The English, however, produced the unfortunate monarch's sword and dagger, which are still preserved in the Herald's College in London.

Thus perished, in the forty-second year of his age, and twenty-sixth of his reign, one of the most popular monarchs that ever filled the Scottish throne. "As he was greatly beloved while alive," says Buchanan, "so when dead his memory was cherished with an affection beyond what I have ever read or heard of being entertained for any other king."‡ His disposition was frank, generous, and he was easy of access to the meanest of his subjects. He manifested the most exemplary activity in the discharge of his royal duties, and in promoting the peace and prosperity of his kingdom. He was indefatigable in providing for the national security, in promoting the impartial administration of justice, and in maintaining the authority of the law in every part of his dominions. His efforts for the formation of a navy, and for the encouragement of the fisheries, the manufactures, the commerce, and the agriculture of the country, manifest an enlightened regard for the welfare of his people, and are deserving of the highest commendation. The remarkable prosperity of Scotland during his reign bore most satisfactory testimony to the wisdom of his measures. He was a zealous patron both of the useful and ornamental arts, and spent large sums in adorning and improving the royal palaces, and in the erection of monasteries and other religious edifices. He was expert in all martial and manly exercises, and had acquired great skill in the practice of medicine and surgery, and appears to have studied the occult science of alchemy. He was passionately fond of music and poetry, and excelled in performing upon the lute and various other musical instruments. His vices were in not a few cases akin to his virtues, and are in a great measure to be traced to the defects of his early training, and to the wicked advice of evil counsellors who basely pandered to the passions of the youthful monarch, in order to gain their own selfish ends. He was fond of popularity, devoted to pleasure, and profuse in his expenditure, and frequently lavished upon unworthy objects and pursuits the money which he obtained from his people, not always by the most honourable expedients. He was headstrong, impetuous, and impatient of contradiction; and his fantastic sense of honour, and obstinate adherence to his own opinion, caused him to plunge needlessly into the miseries of war, and ultimately led to the sacrifice of his army and the loss of his life, and once more exposed the kingdom to the manifold and complicated evils of a long minority. James left one legitimate child, who succeeded him by the title of James V.; another son, named Alexander, who was born nearly eight months after his father's death, survived only about two years.

* This idle tale was revived about half a century ago by a groundless rumour, that a skeleton wrapped in a bull's hide, and surrounded with an iron chain had been found in the well of Home Castle. Sir Walter Scott says he could never find any better authority for the story than the sexton of the parish having said, that if the well were cleaned out he would not be surprised at such a discovery. This absurd legend has recently been repeated by a living writer, but without the shadow of evidence.

CHAPTER XXIII.

JAMES THE FIFTH.

EVIL tidings always fly rapidly, and the news of the fatal defeat of Flodden soon carried 'mourning, lamentation, and woe,' into every part of Scotland. The wail of sorrow was heard in every town, village, and hamlet; women were to be seen rushing distractedly into the streets and highways, lamenting with loud cries, their husbands, fathers, sons, and brothers, who had fallen. The labours of the harvest were abandoned, 'the voice of the merchant ceased in the streets,' and the churches and chapels were filled with mournful processions to invoke the Divine protection, and to sing the requiem of the slain.* The loss fell with peculiar severity on the southern districts of the kingdom, as their inhabitants composed a large portion of the forces which remained with the royal army. The citizens of Selkirk, Hawick, Jedburgh, and other Border towns, were almost entirely cut off, and their songs and traditions still keep alive the memory of this national disaster, which is justly considered the most calamitous event in Scottish history.†

In this perilous crisis, however, the indomitable resolution of the Scottish people was displayed in its noblest colours. They were "pressed on every side, yet not reduced to extremity; perplexed, but not in despair; cast down, but not destroyed." Though they had lost their king, and the greater part of the nobles, barons, and magistrates, as well as the flower of the burghers and yeomanry, so that the country seemed to be left defenceless and open to invasion and conquest, they 'bated not a jot of heart or hope.' The imminency of the public danger checked the violence of individual sorrow, and every man was promptly at his post, ready to combat in behalf of the liberty and independence of his country. In this 'day of darkness and of gloominess,' a noble example of firmness and spirit was exhibited by the merchants, who had been left in charge of the metropolis. The lord provost and magistrates of that city, along with the burghers, had followed the standard of the king, and most of them had shared his fate. During their absence, a certain number of the most influential citizens at the head of whom was George Towers, of Inverleith, were left with a commission to discharge the duties of the magistracy; and, on the 10th of September, the day after the battle, these noble-hearted men issued a proclamation, which, it has been well said, would do honour to the annals of any country in Europe, and took all necessary precautions to defend the city against the apprehended attack of the enemy. "Whereas," says this remarkable document, "there is a great rumour now lately risen within this town, touching our sovereign lord and his army, of the which we understand there is as yet no certainty: we strictly charge and command all persons within the burgh, to have ready their sensible gear (armour of defence) and weapons of war, and to be ready to assemble at the tolling of the common bell, for the defence of the town against those that would invade the same. We also charge and require that all women of the lower class, and specially vagabonds, do repair to their work, and be not seen upon the street clamouring and crying, under the pain of banishment out of the city; and that the women of better sort do repair to the kirk and offer up their prayers at the stated hours, for our sovereign lord and his army, and for our neighbours who are with the king's host; and that they keep to their private occupations in their houses, and abstain from appearing on the street as becometh."* Although George Towers and his gallant associates speak of the uncertainty of the rumour respecting their beloved monarch and his army, there can be no doubt that they were aware of the full extent of the disaster which had befallen them; and the simplicity and firmness of their language showed their calmness and courage, in the perilous and perplexing position in which they were placed.

Their fears of an immediate invasion, however, were speedily dispelled by the welcome intelligence that Surrey had disbanded his host. He had suffered so severely in the battle, that he was in no condition to follow up his advantages; and as his troops had been assembled for the defence of their own frontier, and not for the invasion of Scotland, the crown vassals dispersed as soon as their term of service had been rendered. A breathing interval was thus allowed to the country, and early in October a meeting of Parliament was assembled at Perth, to concert what measures ought to be adopted for the defence of the kingdom, and the management of public affairs, at this perilous juncture. As the greater part of the nobles had perished with their sovereign, this national council was principally composed of the clergy. The infant king, then only eighteen months old, was crowned at Scone with the usual solemnities. The castle of Stirling was selected as his residence, and the queen-

The citizens of Selkirk, eighty in number, distinguished themselves by their desperate valour at Flodden, and nearly all perished in that disastrous conflict. A standard, taken from the English, and the sword of William Brydone, the town clerk, who led the gallant 'Souters' to the battle, are still carefully preserved. The English, in revenge, reduced the defenceless town to ashes. James V. granted to the inhabitants, by royal charter, the right of tilling one thousand acres of the common lands of the burgh, along with various other privileges and immunities, both as a reward of their valour and as compensation for their sufferings.

mother was appointed regent of the kingdom and guardian of her son, in accordance with the will of the late king. The Archbishop of Glasgow and the Earls Huntley and Angus were selected to be the councillors of Margaret till another parliament should assemble, and the government of the castle of Stirling was entrusted to Lord Borthwick. The appointment of a female to hold the reins of government was contrary to the customary law of Scotland, and was far from popular among the Scottish nobles. The near connection, too, of the queen-mother with the English monarch, the inveterate enemy of Scotland, excited a suspicion that she might be unduly swayed by his influence, and a secret message was despatched to France, inviting the Duke of Albany, who, after the youthful monarch, was next heir to the throne, to repair to Scotland, and assume the office of regent.

Several of the Scottish historians affirm, that while the people were preparing resolutely to defend their country against invasion, the queen wrote an affectionate and humble letter to Henry, entreating his forbearance for a widowed sister and an infant orphan;—that the English monarch, with great wisdom and moderation, resolved to forego the tempting opportunity which the victory of Flodden afforded him for the invasion of Scotland, and replied that the Scots should have peace or war from him according to their own choice and behaviour;—and that a truce was speedily concluded to last for a year and a day. These statements are unfortunately devoid of truth. No sooner did Henry, who was still in France, receive information of the victory, than he transmitted orders to Lord Darcy, and Lord Dacre, warden of the eastern marches, directing them to make three principal incursions into Scotland. In obedience to this injunction, Lord Dacre and his brother entered Scotland at the head of three thousand cavalry and three hundred infantry, and after plundering and laying waste the country, and burning several villages in Teviotdale, they retired at the approach of Lord Home, carrying off with them considerable booty.† The Scottish warden lost no time in retaliating, and a desolating but indecisive warfare was carried on by the Borderers on both sides.

Meanwhile the Duke of Albany had received the secret invitation from the French party of the Scottish nobles, and unable at this time to comply with it, he sent over the Sieur D'Arsie de la Bastie, who had been a favourite of James the Fourth, along with the Earl of Arran, who in consequence of the disgraceful failure of his naval expedition, appears to have been afraid to return to Scotland during the lifetime of the late king. Arran was the son of the Princess Mary, sister to James the Third, and his high birth and important office of lord high admiral, which he still held, entitled him to a prominent share in the administration of public affairs; but the inferiority of his talents unfitted him for the lofty position at which he aimed. His designs were successfully resisted by the Earls of Angus, Home, Huntley, and Crawford, who were at this moment possessed of the greatest authority in the country. But these powerful nobles were jealous of each other's influence, and could not be induced to co-operate cordially in the maintenance of law and order throughout the kingdom. A bitter feud arose between the chamberlain and the youthful Earl of Angus, which threatened to involve the whole of the southern countries in all the miseries of civil war. David Ker, of Ferniehirst, an adherent of Lord Home, taking advantage of the lawless state of the country, forcibly expelled the Abbot of Kelso, and seized the revenues of that monastery while Robertson of Strowan, at the head of a band of eight hundred freebooters, openly traversed Athole and the surrounding districts, plundering the inhabitants at his pleasure. To add to the difficulties of the unhappy country, thus torn by intestine divisions, the emperor, who was in alliance with England, interdicted the commerce between his own dominions and Scotland, and Lord Dacre continued to lay waste the border districts by continued inroads. In the quaint language of an old chronicler, "to rehearse the troubles, and great disquietness that chanced at this time through lack of due administration of justice, and by discord and variance daily rising among the lords and peers of the realm, a man might have just cause greatly to wonder thereat; and in weighing the same thoroughly, no less lament the oppression done to the poor commons, in that wicked and most miserable time, when justice seemed to sleep, and rapine, with all the other sorts of injurious violence, invaded her empty seat, triumphing over all as a conqueror."

As the war with England still continued, an embassy was despatched to the Court of Denmark to represent the distressed situation of the country, and to solicit from their Danish ally subsidies of men and ammunition. But the application was wholly unsuccessful, although James IV. had given prompt and liberal assistance to the King of Denmark in suppressing the insurrection of the Swedes. The French court showed equal ingratitude to their faithful allies, who had suffered so much in a war undertaken at the instigation of France, and to promote the interests of that country. Louis XII., who was hard pressed by his enemies, was now anxious to conclude a peace with England, and so fearful of any step that might interfere with this object, that he not merely denied all assistance to the Scots in the day of their calamity, but most ungenerously refused permission to the Duke of Albany to leave his dominions, lest the presence of that nobleman in Scotland should prove an obstacle to the conclusion of the treaty then pending between England and France.

In this trying position of affairs, the council of state was repeatedly assembled, the nobles and the conflicting opinions and clergy. discordant interests of its members distracted their deliberations, and prevented them from agreeing upon any firm and consistent course of policy. The prudent advice of the aged peers was thwarted by the violent and headstrong councils of the youthful nobles, whom the carnage of Flodden had prematurely elevated to rank and power. The higher clergy, from among whom the sovereign had been accustomed to select his wisest and most patriotic counsellors, were now unhappily divided into factions among themselves, occasioned by disputes respecting the vacant benefices. A meeting of parliament was fixed for the 20th of March, but was postponed by the council to the 15th of May, after ordaining that the principal fortresses of the kingdom should be committed to the custody of trustworthy governors, and appointing the Earl of Crawford, chief justice to the north of the Forth, and Lord Home to the same office in the south, for the immediate repression of the deadly feuds then raging throughout the country.

For some time after the death of the king, the Character of the queen-mother seems to have dis-queen-mother. charged the duties of her office to the satisfaction of the nobles and the people; but the inherent defects in her character soon became apparent. Her talents were of a high order, but in several points she too nearly resembled her brother, Henry VIII., to make a wise ruler. She was fond of pleasure, hasty in her resentment, headstrong and passionate, and in her thirst for power and personal gratification, she frequently showed herself little scrupulous as to the means by which these objects were to be gained. On the 30th of April, 1514, about eight months after the death of the late king, she gave birth to a son, who was named Alexander, and created Duke of Ross; and in a parliament which met in the month of July, she was confirmed in the office of regent, and the custody of the young king and his brother was committed to three wise lords, whose names do not appear. Scarcely had the queen recovered from her confinement, however, when, to the surprise and regret of all her friends, she hastily married the young Earl of Angus, without any previous consultation with her council. Margaret was now in her twenty-fourth year, and in the peculiar and difficult position in which she was placed, it was by no means extraordinary or blameworthy that she should have desired a protector from the selfish designs of the fierce and lawless nobility by whom she was surrounded, among whom the abduction of an opulent widow was no uncommon crime. And had the queen-mother entered into a second marriage with a suitable husband, after due consultation with the council assigned to her by parliament, and after a decent interval, no fault could have been found with her conduct. But the precipitation with which she hurried into the match with Angus so soon after the death of her husband and the birth of her child, was scarcely consistent with decency or decorum, and had the effect of lowering her reputation in the eyes of the nation. Angus, too, was by no means the husband whom a prudent person, placed in Margaret's circumstances, would have selected. In some respects, indeed, he did no discredit to her choice. He was the grandson and successor of the celebrated Archibald Bell-the-Cat, and was therefore at the head of the powerful house of Douglas. He was also possessed of great personal attractions and showy accomplishments; but according to the shrewd Lord Dacre, he was "childish young, and attended by no wise counsellors," and to the faults of youth he added the characteristic vices of his family,—lawless ambition and lust of power. It speedily became apparent that on his side the match was one of interest, not of affection. He seems to have expected by his alliance with the regent, to obtain possession of the government of the country; and disappointed in this ambitious scheme, he soon ceased to pay the queen, who was some years older than himself, that respect to which she was justly entitled, and he showed himself both a careless and an unfaithful husband. Margaret, blinded by passion, lavished on her youthful husband the treasure* which the late king had entrusted to her charge before his fatal invasion of England, and, with the headlong favouritism of her race, she did not hesitate to abuse the powers of her office for the purpose of aggrandizing the family and faction of the Douglasses. Her marriage, however, was highly unpopular among all classes of the Scottish people. By the terms of the royal will it at once put an end to her regency, and the council lost no time in carrying the wishes of their late sovereign into effect. "We have shown heretofore our willingness to honour the queen," observed Lord Home; "contrary to the ancient custom of this kingdom we suffered and obeyed her authority whilst she herself kept her right by keeping her widowhood. Now she has quit it by marrying, why should we not choose another to succeed in the place she has voluntarily left? Our old laws do not permit that a woman should govern in the most peaceable times, far less now when such evils do threaten, as can scarcely be resisted by the wisest and most sufficient men." Nearly all the members of the council agreed in this opinion, one of them remarking, "that the point principally annoying to

* On the evening before his departure from his capital for the Borders, James confided to the queen the plan of his treasure, "in case that aught happened other than good to him." He likewise wrote an order upon the treasurer for her to receive in trust, for his infant son, the last subsidy of eighteen thousand crowns of the sum paid to him by Louis XII., and, besides this mass of treasure, he bestowed upon her many other valuables. This money she refused to restore, on the plea that it was owing to her for arrears of dower.—Cott. MS. Calig. B. ii. f. 27. Lives of the Queens of Scotland, vol. i. p. 80.

them was the fact, that the Earl of Angus, as head of the house of Douglas, was already great, the queen's marrying him had made him greater still, but continuing her authority as regent now he was her husband, would make him far too great for the peace and prosperity of Scotland.* The Albany was chosen in her room, and the Lord Lion was forthwith deputed to proceed to France to convey to that prince the official announcement of his election. The obstacles which had prevented his compliance with the invitation of the Scottish nobles were now removed; the sentence of forfeiture against his father, which had hitherto excluded the duke from the enjoyment of his rank and estates in Scotland was cancelled; and as peace had been concluded between England and France, Louis had no longer any pretext for his detention. Scotland was included in this treaty at the request of the French monarch, on condition, however, that if any invasion took place on the Borders after the intimation of these terms, which was to be made before the fifteenth of September, the clause comprehending that country should be void. No invasion of any importance took place, but various petty inroads were made on the Borders; and the difficulty of adjusting the disputes arising out of these disturbances, together with the sudden death of the French king, and the expectation of Albany's arrival, delayed the settlement of peace, so that it was not till the following May that the Scots formally acceded to the treaty.†

At this juncture (Oct. 25th, 1514) the struggles for promotion among the higher clergy were renewed by the death of the venerable Bishop Elphinston, of Aberdeen, whom the queen had intended to appoint to the archbishopric of St. Andrews. Margaret immediately nominated her husband's uncle, the celebrated Gawin Douglas, to the primacy of Scotland. His claims were fiercely opposed, however, both by Forman, the intriguing Bishop of Moray, who was appointed to the vacant see by a papal bull; and by Hepburn, the Prior of St. Andrews, a powerful, factious, and cunning priest, who was elected by the chapter. The servants of Douglas seized the archiepiscopal palace, but were summarily expelled by Hepburn, who kept possession of the fortress, in spite of the threats of the queen and Angus. This scandalous contention was at length terminated by a compromise between the rival claimants. Home, the chamberlain, was gained over to the interest of Forman, by rich gifts and the grant of the abbacy of Coldingham to his youngest brother David; and Hepburn, thus abandoned by his most influential supporter, was forced to surrender the castle, on condition of retaining the revenues which he had already collected, and receiving the appointment to the see of Moray, vacated by Forman, together with a pension of three thousand crowns from the revenues of the archbishopric.*

The country was now in a state of almost total anarchy. The Chancellor Beaton, Archbishop of Glasgow, who was a zealous supporter of Albany, was arrested at Perth, at the instigation of the queen, and the great seal forcibly taken from him.† The Earl of Arran, assisted by Lennox and Glencairn, aspired to the regency, and the former, taking advantage of a dark and stormy night, surprised the castle of Dunbarton, and expelled Erskine the governor, who held it for the queen.‡ A bitter feud raged between Angus and Home, who marshalled their vassals against each other, and prepared for open hostilities. In addition to the disturbances occasioned by these private quarrels, the nobles and the country were divided into two great factions,—the English party, at the head of which was Margaret and her husband, with the Earl of Huntley, Lord Drummond, and the Earl Marischal; and the French party, which comprehended the great mass of the nobility and of the people. The queen, highly indignant at her deposition from the office of regent, had now thrown herself completely into the arms of her brother, who unscrupulously availed himself of this favourable opportunity to acquire a paramount influence over the government of Scotland, and still farther to embroil the affairs of that unhappy country. By the agency of Lord Dacre, he kept in pay a number of spies and pensioned supporters, bribed many of the nobles, maintained a constant correspondence with the queen, and even had the baseness to urge her immediate flight with the infant monarch and his brother to the English court, holding out as an inducement, the hope that her elder son should succeed him in the throne of England. Margaret was quite willing, on her part, to adopt this nefarious proposal, but she informed Henry that it was impossible to carry it into effect by any means that she or her husband, or his uncle Gawin, could devise, as all her movements were closely watched, and she declared that if she were a private woman, that was able to go 'with her bairn on her arm,' she would not be long absent from her brother.§

The departure of Albany from France was delayed for some time longer by the death of Louis XII. and the accession of Francis I., but the policy of the French court underwent no material change, and the new monarch soon after confirmed the peace which had been concluded with England. Le Vaire and Villebresme were despatched as ambassadors, to induce the Scottish government to express their willingness to be comprehended in the treaty on the terms formerly stipulated. In a letter from the council of state to Francis, they intimate their compliance with this request, and their acceptance and ratification of the offered peace, moved thereto, as they declare, by the earnest solicitations of their ancient ally, the King of France and of Balthazar Stewart, the papal nuncio; and that they might show that the Scots could forgive their private injuries for the sake of promoting a general crusade against the Turks, although they had now so far recovered from their recent heavy misfortunes as to leave no doubt that they should soon be able to requite their enemies.*

On the eighteenth of May, three days after this arrival of Albany answer was given by the council, in Scotland— the Duke of Albany arrived at Dunbarton with a squadron of eight ships (probably a part of the fleet of James IV.), laden with ammunition and warlike stores.† He was eagerly welcomed by a large concourse of the nobles and gentry of the western counties, and by Lord Home, whom he is said to have mortally offended by his haughty and contemptuous treatment.‡ On advancing to the capital, he was received with almost regal magnificence. The citizens testified their joy at his arrival by acting 'sundry farces and gude plays,'§ and the queen came from the castle to the gate of Holyrood House to meet him, and do him all possible honour. At a meeting of parliament, held in July, 1515, he was solemnly installed in the office of Regent, invested with the sword and sceptre of state, and proclaimed Governor and Protector of Scotland till the young king should reach the age of eighteen. It very soon became evident, however, that Albany was more of a courtier than a soldier or statesman, and that he was totally unfit to cope with the tremendous difficulties of his position.

—his character— At this moment, Scotland required an upright, vigorous, and patriotic governor, who could guide the affairs of the country with discretion, and hold the balance with an even hand between the contending parties. But Albany's talents were by no means of a high order, his temper was passionate, and he was as much devoted to the interests of France, as the queen and Angus were to those of the English court. He was ignorant of the constitution, of the manners, and, to a great extent, even of the language of the country. He was the son of a French mother, had married a French woman, and having spent his life in France, where his chief estates were situated, constantly styled the French king his master. His family, too, rendered him an object of suspicion to a considerable portion of the Scottish people. He was the son of that Duke of Albany who had attempted to set aside the royal family as illegitimate, and to seize the crown for himself; and it was plausibly argued by his enemies that the custody of the infant sovereign and his brother could not be safely entrusted to one whose hereditary feelings and claims justly rendered him an object of distrust.

Albany appears, however, to have entered upon the duties of his office with spirit —his vigorous and resolution, and a firm deter- ^{—his vigorous} ^{measures—} mination to repress and punish the lawless excesses of the nobles, and to curb the insolence and treasonable practices of Angus and his supporters. Lord Drummond, the grandfather of that noble, was committed prisoner to the castle of Blackness, for striking the lion herald in the queen's presence, when delivering an unpalatable message to Angus from the Council of State;* and Gawin Douglas, the uncle of Angus, was imprisoned in the tower of St. Andrews, on a charge of having improperly procured his nomination to the bishopric of Dunkeld by the influence of the queen and Henry VIII. with the pope. Margaret in vain implored the pardon and liberation of her friends. "I went down," she says, "from Edinburgh castle sore weeping to Holyrood, where the regent lodged, intreating him to let them out, as they were the principal members of the council, but grace gat I none."† These vigorous measures struck terror into the supporters of the queen; and the nobles of her party, with the exception of Angus and Home, and many even of her servants, were so intimidated that they abandoned her cause.

Although certain nobles had long before been appointed by the council of state to take charge of the young king and his brother, the royal children still remained in the keeping of their mother, and it became an object of great importance to withdraw them from this dangerous situation. The traitorous intrigues into which Margaret had recently entered with the creatures of her brother, which could not have altogether escaped the penetration of Albany, rendered this step absolutely necessary for the safe keeping of the princes, and the security of the kingdom. The regent accordingly summoned a parliament, which met at Edinburgh, and nominated eight lords, out of which four were to be chosen by lot, and from these the queen-mother was to select three to have charge of the king and his brother. This arrangement having been agreed to, the four peers proceeded from the parliament house to the castle of Edinburgh, for the purpose of carrying into effect the commands of the parliament, attended by a great concourse of people, who crowded to witness the imposing scene. On the approach of the nobles the gates of the fortress were ^{The queen re-} ^{fuses to give up} ^{the king, her son} thrown open, and Margaret was seen standing under the archway with the little king at her side, his hand locked in hers, and a nurse behind her holding the infant Duke of Ross in her arms. As soon as the shouts of applause, with which the populace greeted the spectacle, were silenced, the queen, with a dignified air and a loud imperious voice, commanded the delegates to stand and declare the cause of their coming. The peers replied that they came in the name of the parliament to receive from her their king and his brother, when, to their great astonishment, Margaret commanded the warden to drop the portcullis, and the massy iron grating having instantly descended between her and the nobles, she thus addressed them: "This castle is part of my enfeoffment, and of it, by my late husband the king, was I made sole governor, nor to any mortal shall I yield the important trust. But I respect the parliament and nation, and request six days to consider the mandate, for most important is my charge, and my counsellors now, alas! are few." Angus, who had hitherto remained a silent spectator of this dramatic scene, apprehensive of the consequences of this refusal to obey the injunctions of the parliament, now took a notarial instrument that he had counselled the surrender of the children.*

The queen, however, finding it impossible to hold out the castle of Edinburgh against the forces of the parliament, suddenly removed with her children to Stirling, her usual place of residence, where her adherents were numerous and powerful. She then transmitted to the regent an offer to maintain the princes out of her own dowry, provided they were left under her charge; or if this could not be granted, she proposed that they should be entrusted to Angus, Home, the Earl Marischal, and Sir Robert Lauder, of the Bass, all of them, except Marischal, her devoted partizans. Indignant at this evasion of the orders of Parliament,

Decisive measures adopted by Albany. Albany determined to compel obedience, and for this purpose proceeded to collect an armed force, and meanwhile ordered Lords Ruthven and Borthwick to blockade the castle of Stirling, and to prevent the admission of any provisions into that fortress. Lord Home, who was now Provost of Edinburgh, was directed to arrest Sir George Douglas, the brother of Angus, but he peremptorily refused, and, under cover of night, fled to the Border tower of Newark; while the Earl of Angus, who had been enjoined by the regent to march with his vassals to Stirling, to blockade his own wife, retired to his estates, and armed his retainers for the impending struggle.

A proclamation was now issued, denouncing the penalties of treason against all those who should continue to hold out the castle of Stirling against the regent and parliament; and Albany at the head of seven thousand men, and accompanied by almost all the peers, marched against that fortress. As directions, placed them in the hands of Albany. She then requested that he would extend his favour to herself, her husband, and her children. The regent in reply assured the queen that he entertained the most respectful regard for her and his infant sovereign; but he could show no indulgence to Angus and his family, so long as they persisted in their present treasonable practices.* Albany left a guard of seven hundred soldiers to garrison the castle of Stirling, and committed the two princes to the custody of the Earl Marischal, with the Lords Fleming and Borthwick; whilst the queen retired to Edinburgh, where she took up her residence in the castle.

the government of the regent; while Angus, though he was not admitted to their secret councils, was employed in raising the strength of Teviotdale for the purpose of supporting their traitorous schemes.† In this emergency Albany acted with great spirit and prudence. He summoned the array of the kingdom to meet him on the Borough-muir, near Edinburgh; but before proceeding to extremities he attempted to gain over the queen and her husband by offering to support them in all their just and equitable actions, and to put her in full possession of her jointure-lands, on condition that she would co-operate in the measures of his government, and abandon her intrigues with the English court. These favourable proposals were at once rejected by the queen, whose foolish and headstrong behaviour deprives her of all sympathy or respect; but she sent them privately to Daere to show the sacrifice she had made for the interests of England.‡ With regard to Home, the regent insisted that he should leave Scotland; and that turbulent noble, stung with resentment, immediately wrote to Daere, requesting the assistance of an English army, and informing him that the country lay open to invasion, and that King Henry might easily destroy his enemies there, and remodel the government at his pleasure.§ Relying on the support of England, the chamberlain collected a powerful force, and after retaking his own castle of Home, which had fallen into the hands of Blaeater, situated about five miles to the west of Berwick.|| The object of this movement was presently seen, for Margaret finding ^{The queen flies} herself, as she alleged, in a kind of ^{to England.} captivity at Edinburgh, and her revenues retained by the regent, determined to retire to the fortress of Blaeater, which was recommended by Lord Daere, from its proximity to England, while at the same time, as it was within the Scottish frontier, she could not be said to have forfeited her rights by leaving the country. She accordingly retired to Linlithgow, where she took her chamber, and secluded herself from observation, under the plea that the time of her confinement was at hand. But soon after her arrival she quitted her palace under cover of night, attended only by her husband and four or five servants, and at the distance of a few miles from Linlithgow she was joined by Lord Home, at the head of an escort of forty soldiers, who conveyed her in safety, first to the strong castle of Tantallon, the seat of the Douglasses, and then to Blaeater.*

This highly imprudent step completely alienated the nobles and clergy from the cause of the queen dowager, and induced them to give their strenuous support to the government of the regent. Before proceeding to extremities against the mother of his sovereign, Albany, to show his anxiety to avoid hostilities, despatched Sir William Seott and Sir Robert Lauder to meet the English commissioners, Daere and Dr. Magnus, for the purpose of adjusting any disputes on the marches; and at the same time commissioned the French envoy, John Duplanis, to renew his offer to the queen of the complete restoration of all her rights and revenues.

These liberal terms were again arrogantly rejected by this imprudent and headstrong princess, and Albany instantly advanced to the Borders at the head of an army of forty thousand men. Daere had strongly recommended an invasion of Scotland, but no English army made its appearance; and Home finding it impossible to offer any effectual resistance, fled to England, whither he was speedily followed by the queen and Angus. The regent after ravaging the estates of the chamberlain, and razing the tower of Blaeater to the ground, returned to the capital and dismissed his army. Home was soon after taken prisoner, it is alleged, by means of a dishonourable stratagem of Albany,† and was committed to the charge of the Earl of Arran, till he should set out for France or Italy, where he was commanded to remain in exile for three years. He found means, however, to gain over his keeper, who not only suffered him to escape, but accompanied him in his flight to England. They were received with open arms by Lord Daere, and having been joined at Wooler by Angus and the brothers of Home, immediately proceeded to concert measures to disturb the tranquillity of Scotland, and to overthrow the government of Albany. The queen shortly before this had sent a letter to the regent, in which she attempted to vindicate her flight by asserting that apprehensions for her life had constrained her to quit Scotland; but she renewed her claim that the government of the kingdom and the tutelage of her children should be conceded to her agreeably to the will of the late king, which had received the papal confirmation. To this demand the council of Scotland returned answer, that the government of the realm could not be disposed of by their late sovereign, as by his death it devolved on the three Estates, who had conferred it upon the Duke of Albany; that moreover Margaret had by her second marriage forfeited all right to the regency, as well as to the custody of her children; and that as for the interference of the pontiff, Scotland had, ever since its first inhabitation, been subject in temporal matters only to God.*

The regent was still anxious to reclaim the queen from the impolitic course which she was pursuing, and on the same day he addressed two letters to her, the first from the council, imploring her to listen to reason, and declaring their aversion to all rigorous measures; the other, a private communication, written with his own hand, offering a benefice to the celebrated Gawin Douglas, and promising to leave at the disposal of the queen all benefices, and a portion of the wards and marriages within her dowry lands, and to entrust her with the guardianship of her children, if she would engage that they should not be withdrawn from the kingdom.† These liberal proposals, however, were peremptorily rejected by the queen, probably through the influence of Angus, Home, and Arran, who at this period entered into a private bond, by which they engaged to stand by each other, to make no agreement with the regent except with the consent of their kindred, vassals, and supporters, and to deliver the king and his brother from the suspected guardianship in which they were now held.

Eight days after the queen had taken refuge in England, she was delivered, at Margaret is delivered of a daughter. Harbottle, of a daughter, the Lady Margaret Douglas, afterwards the mother of the unfortunate Darnley, and grandmother of James VI. The absence of her attendants, whom Daere had positively refused to receive into the fortalice,‡ and the anxieties and mortifications connected with her situation, retarded her recovery, and prevented her from proceeding to her brother's court, which she eagerly longed to reach. While she lay at Harbottle, Margaret received the affecting intelligence of the sudden death, at Stirling, of her younger Death of her younger son. son, Alexander, Duke of Ross, an event which the queen and her faction did not hesitate to ascribe either to neglect or poison; and even Gawin Douglas did not scruple, seven years later, to repeat the atrocious calumny. Meanwhile, Albany, having in vain tried conciliatory measures, proceeded to punish Arran's defection and flight by seizing his castles; but when at Hamilton, he was met by the mother of the rebellious noble, a daughter of James II., who intreated forgiveness for her son. He received the venerable matron with the respect due to her years and royal descent, and promised a free pardon to Arran if he would return to his allegiance. He faithfully kept his word, for that weak and irresolute nobleman, finding that no dependence could be placed on the promises of Daere, renounced his league with Angus and Home, and, on the 12th of November, came to Edinburgh and made his peace with the regent.*

At this period the alliance with France was renewed; and, at the same time, Dunbar, Archdeacon of St. Andrews; Sir William Scott, of Balwearie; and Duplanis, the French ambassador, were sent by the regent to meet Daere and Magnus, the English commissioners, at Coldingham, for the purpose of negotiating a peace between the two countries. The brilliant successes of Francis the First in Italy had roused the jealousy of the English king, and made him anxious to maintain amicable relations with Scotland, in order that he might be at liberty to unite with the emperor in the war against France. The truce between the two kingdoms was therefore renewed till the following Whitsunday; and the regent agreed to send a solemn embassy to the English court to treat of a permanent peace. Home and Angus having now discovered the insecurity of their position, and the duplicity of the English warden, and despairing of any aid from England, resolved to withdraw them-

Home and Arran selves from the queen, who lay dangerously ill at Morpeth, and to make their peace with the regent. They accordingly returned to Scotland, where they were readily pardoned and restored to their estates. Margaret was highly indignant at this selfish and ungrateful conduct on the part of her husband, who, to serve his own purposes, had the inhumanity to abandon his wife while on a sickbed, and at a distance from all her relations and friends. There is reason to believe that the lasting enmity which the queen henceforth entertained against Angus, is primarily to be traced to her indignation at this scandalous desertion. As soon as she recovered from her illness she hastened to the English court, where she was received with great distinction and respect by her brother and his queen, to whom she bitterly complained of the treatment which she had received both from the regent and her husband, and entreated him to protect her son, and to procure the restoration of her rights.

The English monarch readily yielded to Margaret's importunity, and though the truce between the two kingdoms had just been extended till the Midsummer of the following year, and Albany had always manifested the most conciliatory spirit towards England, Henry addressed demands of a letter to the three Estates, in which in the most peremptory terms he demanded the removal of the regent from his office, and his expulsion from the kingdom, upon the ground that as the nearest heir to the crown he was the most suspicious guardian that could be appointed to take charge of the king's person; and he added a threat, that if this request was refused, he would be constrained to take other measures for the protection of their infant sovereign. To this insolent epistle, which was laid before a meeting of parliament, held in Edinburgh, on the first of July, 1516, the Estates returned a positive refusal, declaring that the appointment of Albany to the office of regent had been made by the general council of the nation, and was in strict accordance with the ancient law and practice of the kingdom,—that he had undertaken the office, not from his own wishes, but at their earnest request, and had wisely and honestly discharged its duties,—that with regard to the safety of their infant sovereign, there was no cause for the anxiety expressed, as he was entrusted to the care of the three good lords, in whom his own mother had formerly placed the greatest confidence; and, finally, that they were firmly resolved to resist to the utmost every attempt to disturb the peace of the country, or to overthrow the existing government.*

This bold and dignified assertion of their national independence, disconcerted, for the moment, the project of the English king to obtain the superiority over Scotland, but he speedily resumed his former base system of keeping in pay a band of spies and pensioned supporters, and bribing a number of the Scottish nobles, to thwart the measures of Albany, and to distract his government. Lord Daere, the English warden, was the principal agent employed in promoting this nefarious policy; and in a letter to Wolsey, Henry's favourite minister, he boasts that he had in his pay no less than four hundred Scots, whose principal employment was to excite popular tumults, and to lay waste the country. "I labour and study all I can," says this able but unprincipled intriguer, "to make division and debate, to the intent, that if the duke will not apply himself that the debate may grow, that it shall be impossible for him to do justice; and for that intended purpose I have the Master of Kilmaurs kept in my house secretly, which is one of the greatest parties in Scotland. . . . And also I have secret messages from the Earl of Angus and others, which, I trust, shall be to the pleasure of the king's grace, if the said duke submit not himself; and also I have four hundred outlaws, and giveth them rewards, that burneth and destroyeth daily in Scotland, all being Scotsmen that should be under the obedience of Scotland. And if the said duke will apply him to the king's pleasure, then shall all these practices be void and of none effect, and the said Master of Kilmaurs be put to his own fende (shift) at his liberty in secret manner."†

A new insurrection soon broke out, headed by Arran, who entered into a league with Lennox, Glencairn, and other barons, for the purpose of

wresting the regency from Albany. Mure of Caldwell, well, one of the partisans of Arran, stormed and plundered the castle of Glasgow, belonging to Archbishop Beaton, and prepared to hold it out against the government. But the regent promptly marched to Glasgow at the head of an army, took the fortress, and compelled the conspirators to submit to his authority, and to sue for pardon, which with almost blameable lenity, was readily granted to them, on the intercession of Archbishop Beaton.* Soon after, however, Albany felt himself constrained to inflict summary punishment on another inveterate offender—the turbulent and factious chamberlain. His former treasons had been forgiven, but only on condition that if ever he rebelled again, he should be brought to trial for his old offences.† Unmindful of his promise, and of the warning he had received, he speedily renewed his treasonable intercourse with Dacre, who hired the retainers of the Scottish baron to plunder and lay waste the country, and commit the most frightful excesses, so that, as the English warden himself admits, the kingdom was a prey to constant robberies, fire-raising, and murders. In these circumstances, the regent feeling that longer forbearance would be a crime against the state, Home and his brother, having imprudently visited the court, it is alleged on the invitation of Albany, were instantly apprehended by the advice of the council, brought to trial for their manifold treasons, condemned, and executed. Their heads were afterwards exposed above the Tolbooth, and their estates confiscated. According to Buchanan, one of the charges brought against the chamberlain was that of having been accessory to the defeat at Flodden, and the death of the king; but this accusation, he adds, though strongly expressed, being feebly supported by proof, was withdrawn.‡ Kerr of Ferniehirst, a powerful Border chief, and one of Home's most zealous adherents, was brought to trial and condemned at the same time; but having obtained a reprieve from the regent, afterwards succeeded in making his escape. Soon after this exercise of authority, Albany made a progress to Jedburgh in person, for the purpose of more effectually repressing and punishing the excesses of the banditti upon the Borders. The office of chamberlain was conferred upon Lord Fleming; and the French knight, De la Bastie, who stood high in the confidence of the regent, was made warden of the east marches, an appointment which excited the most vindictive feelings among the kindred and vassals of Home.

At this period Francis de Bordeaux arrived in Scotland as an ambassador from France. The French court, and, to the great mortification of Albany and the Scottish nobles, made known to them the failure of all their hopes of assistance from their ancient ally, for whose sake they had risked and suffered so much. To serve his own purposes, Francis I. was anxious to conciliate the friendship of the English monarch, and, therefore, turned a deaf ear to all the solicitations of the Scots. Their claim to the county of Xaintonge, which was originally assigned by Charles VII. to James I. in 1428, was evaded on the pretext that this district was an inalienable portion of the royal domain; and their request for aid was not only declined, but the French monarch even refused to ratify the alliance between France and Scotland, which had been renewed by his ambassador, Duplanis, and the Scottish council of regency, within a year after the death of James IV. In these trying circumstances Albany resolved to visit France, probably for the purpose of endeavouring to obtain assistance from the French court, to enable him to resist the intrigues of England, and to maintain the independence of the kingdom. The parliament at first offered a most strenuous resistance to his request for permission to revisit his foreign estates; and at length a most reluctant consent was extorted from the national council, on the express condition that his absence was to extend only to four months. Arrangements were accordingly made for his departure. The government of the country was entrusted to a council of regency, consisting of the Archbishops of St. Andrews and Glasgow, with the Earls of Huntley, Argyle, Angus, and Arran. The young king was brought from Stirling to the castle of Edinburgh, and entrusted to the care of the Earl Marischal, and Lords Erskine, Borthwick, and Ruthven. To De la Bastie was committed the important duty of maintaining the tranquillity of the Borders; and the fortresses of Dunbar and Dunbarton, the eastern and western keys of the kingdom, with the tower of Inehgarvie, were garrisoned by French soldiers. Gawin Douglas, Bishop of Dunkeld, and Patrick Panter, secretary to the king, were despatched on an embassy to the French court, to prepare for the arrival of the regent, and to assist the Bishop of Ross, the former ambassador to France, in negotiating a permanent alliance; and all the necessary preliminaries having been adjusted, Albany revisits that kingdom. Albany himself embarked at Dunbarton the seventh of June, carrying with him as hostages the eldest sons of many of the principal barons, and landed at Montmichael, in France, on the twenty-seventh of that month.*

Previously to his departure it had been settled in parliament, that the queen-mother should be allowed to return to Scotland, and to resume possession of her dowry and all her effects, upon condition that she should abstain from all attempts to overthrow the authority of the regent. As soon as she heard of Albany's arrival in France she commenced her journey northward; and at Lamberton Kirk, the scene of her first reception by the Scottish nobles as the bride of their sovereign, she was met by Angus, Morton, and De la Bastie. On her arrival in Edinburgh she was not permitted at first to visit her son; but in consequence of an apprehension that the plague had made its appearance in the capital, the youthful monarch was soon after removed to Craigmillar, where his mother was occasionally allowed to see him. Margaret's faithlessness, however, and propensity to engage in intrigues seem to have been incurable, and a strong suspicion having arisen that she had formed a secret project to carry off the prince into England, his guardians took the precaution to restore him to his original residence in the castle of Edinburgh.*

Albany had mainly relied for the maintenance of order and tranquillity during his absence upon the courage and activity of De la Bastie, who was both an able statesman and a chivalrous soldier. Nor was his confidence in the fidelity and zeal of the gallant Frenchman misplaced. Invested with the title of lieutenant or deputy of the governor, and entrusted with the difficult task of repressing the excesses of the lawless and turbulent Borderers, he discharged the duties of his office with great vigour and impartiality. On the first intelligence of any commotion he lost no time in proceeding to the spot for the purpose of repressing and punishing the disturbance. An example of his indefatigable diligence and promptitude in maintaining the authority of the law is mentioned by Pitscottie, in his account of a shameful outrage perpetrated by Stirling, of Keir, upon the person of William Meldrum, Laird of Binns,—the 'Squire Meldrum' of Sir David Lindsay. Meldrum was betrothed to Lady Gleneagles, a rich heiress, and only waited the arrival of a dispensation from Rome to complete the marriage. Meanwhile Stirling, of Keir, who possessed an estate near this lady's castle in Strathern, had determined that Luke Stirling, a near relative of his own, should marry the lady, and disappointed in his hopes by the success of Squire Meldrum, he laid a cowardly plot for his destruction. Accordingly, when about to cross the ferry between Leith and Fife, on his return from Edinburgh, attended only by eight servants, Meldrum was suddenly beset by his mortal enemy, at the head of sixty men. After a desperate conflict, in which Keir himself was severely hurt, and twenty-six of his followers either wounded or slain, the unfortunate squire was left for dead on the spot, bathed in his blood, hamstringed, and almost cut to pieces by unnumbered wounds. Intelligence of this foul deed having been sent to De la Bastie, who was living at the time in the abbey of Holyrood, he instantly sounded to horse, got his guards together, and pursued the cowardly assassins so closely that they were compelled to take refuge in a peel-house in Linlithgow. But this afforded them no protection, for it was so vigorously assaulted by De la Bastie, that the defenders were compelled to surrender unconditionally. They were speedily brought to trial and condemned; and Stirling himself was imprisoned in the castle of Edinburgh till instructions should be received from the governor respecting his disposal. But in consequence of the cruel murder of De la Bastie himself, shortly after this vigorous exercise of authority, Keir and his accomplices were ultimately set at liberty.*

The appointment of De la Bastie to the wardenship of the marches was exceedingly unpopular among the Borderers, and especially among the friends and vassals of Lord Home, who hated him both as a foreigner and as an adherent of Albany, by whom their chief had been put to death. Among that fierce race the exaction of blood for blood to the uttermost drachm was handed down from father to son as a sacred duty, and though it does not appear that De la Bastie had the least concern in the execution of the chamberlain, the fact that he was the friend of the regent was sufficient to expose him to the vengeance of the ferocious Borderers, who burned to avenge the death of their chief. For the purpose of entrapping the gallant knight, who seems to have been altogether unsuspecting of their designs, Home, of Wedderburn, and some other friends of the late lord, pretended to besiege the tower of Langton, in the Merse. As soon as he received intelligence of this outrage, the warden, who was residing in Dunbar, hastened towards the spot, accompanied by a slender train, and before he was aware found himself surrounded by his unrelenting enemies. Seeing his life aimed at he attempted to save himself by the fleetness of his horse, but his ignorance of the country unfortunately led him into a morass, near the town of Dunse, where he was overtaken and cruelly butchered. The ferocious Wedderburn cut off his head, in savage triumph knitted it to his saddle-bow by the long flowing locks which had been much admired by the ladies of France, and galloping into Dunse, affixed the ghastly trophy of his vengeance to the market cross.†

As soon as the news of this atrocious murder reached the council of regency, they proceeded to take steps to bring the perpetrators to justice. Arran was appointed warden of the marches. Sir George Douglas, the brother of Angus, and his confederate Mark Ker, were committed to prison on suspicion that they had been implicated in the plot against the late warden; and in a parliament assembled at Edinburgh on the nineteenth of February, sentence of forfeiture was passed against David Home of Wedderburn, his three brothers, and the rest of his accomplices. Arran immediately assembled a powerful army, and accompanied by the king's artillery, marched towards the Borders, for the purpose of enforcing the sentence. But the Homes, finding resistance hopeless, resolved to make their submission. The keys of Home castle were delivered to Arrau at Lauder, the Border towers of Langton and Wedderburn were also surrendered; and the warden, with a culpable leniency, allowed the murderers to escape without further punishment.*

Albany, whose leave of absence had nearly expired, feeling a natural reluctance to resume the reins of government in a country so distracted by the contentions and feuds of rival factions, now wrote to the queen-mother, earnestly recommending her, if she could obtain the consent of the nobles, to take the regency once more into her own hands. But Margaret, who had been reconciled to her husband, insisted that Angus should be appointed regent; and as this was resolutely opposed by the whole body of the nobles who had suffered from his insolence and vacillation, the government continued in the hands of the council.† The truce with England was renewed for two years, and the regents sought to avail themselves of the opportunity thus afforded them to repress the disorders which had broken out in the Highlands and Isles, which, like the other districts of the country, were torn by rival factions, and exhibited scenes of the wildest excesses. It appears that scarcely had the

Highland chiefs, who escaped from the carnage at Flodden, returned to their own estates, when they entered into a conspiracy to restore the ancient lordship of the Isles, in the person of Sir Donald Macdonald, of Loehals. The leaders of the insurrection, Maclean of Dowart, and Macleod of Dunvegan, seized the castles of Carnburgh and Dunskaih, and plundered and laid waste the estates of the chiefs who refused to join their faction; but they were ultimately induced by the Earl of Argyle to submit to the regent, and, on repairing to the court, were pardoned and restored to favour. Searec, however, had the chief of Loehals returned to his own dominions, when he again took up arms against the government; and, as it has now been discovered that Sir Donald and his followers had joined with Lord Home in the treasonable practices which brought that nobleman's head to the block, and after his death had given shelter to his persecuted followers, there is good reason to believe that the island chief was first excited to rebellion by the base intrigues of the English agents, who laboured to ferment disturbances in every part of the kingdom. In spite of the efforts of Argyle and other well-affected chiefs, the insurgents maintained their ground, and though abandoned by Maclean of Dowart, his principal supporter, Sir Donald, having united his forces to those of the Macleods of Lewis and Rasay, and Alexander of Isla, attacked and defeated, at a place called Craignairgid, in Morvern, Mac-Ian, of Ardnanurchan, who had rendered himself peculiarly obnoxious to the rebels by his vigorous support of the government. Mac-Ian himself, with his two sons, fell in the engagement; and the consequences of this success might have been serious, had not the death of Sir Donald, a few weeks after, brought the rebellion to a sudden close.*

The reconciliation between Angus and the queen was short-lived. Disappointed in his attempt to obtain the regency, this haughty and ambitious noble soon quarrelled with his wife, and retiring from the court, secluded himself in Douglasdale with a mistress, a daughter of Stuart of Traquair, to whom he is said to have been betrothed previous to his marriage with the queen. This new insult caused an open rupture with Margaret, who broke out into violent reproaches, upbraiding her husband with his inconstancy and ingratitude, reminding him that she had pawned her jewels to support him in his misfortunes, and expressing her determination to sue for a divorce.† But Henry, well aware that such a step would be ruinous to his influence in Scotland, no sooner heard of the resolution formed by his sister, than he despatched a friar, named Chatsworth, who filled the office of minister-general of the Observantines in England, to remonstrate against the divorce, and to threaten the queen with his serious displeasure if she should attempt to carry it into effect. The violent denunciations of Chatsworth, who declared that she was labouring under some damnable delusion, and insinuated that her own conduct would not bear strict investigation, seem to have intimidated, if they did not convince Margaret, and to have induced her to lay aside her intention for the present. But although, against the advice of her counsellors, a temporary reconciliation took place between her and Angus, she insisted upon his renunciation of all claim upon her dower, and soon after appointed the Archdeacon of St. Andrews, the Provost of Crichton, and other commissioners, to collect her revenues and manage her estates.‡

At this period Christian II., king of Denmark, made application to his Scottish allies for a reinforcement of a thousand Highlanders to assist him in suppressing an insurrection, which had broken out among his Swedish subjects; but the regency eluded the request, by alleging that the Highland clans were at this time engaged in perpetual conflicts among themselves. The Danish monarch soon after renewed his request for a subsidy of soldiers and artillery, and enforced it by a letter from Albany, recommending the Estates to comply with the application; but the national council still prudently declined to accede to his request on the ground, that from the uncertain disposition of the English court, they could not reckon on the continuance of peace in their own country. In the following year, however, (1519,) in consequence of the urgent and reiterated entreaty of the Danish monarch, a small body of troops was sent to Copenhagen, under the command of Stewart of Ardgowan, but the tyrannical conduct of Christiern, which ultimately led to his deposition, and the piratical seizure by Danish privateers of a merchant ship belonging to Leith, completely alienated his Scottish allies, and induced them to abandon any further attempt to support his unpopular cause.*

It appears that Albany, on his return to France, had received authority from the Estates to manage the foreign affairs of Scotland; and it is admitted, even by those who take the most unfavourable view of his character and government, that he manifested a disinterested regard for the public welfare, and that in the disposal of the Scottish benefices his applications to the pope were invariably in favour of natives, while the cardinals and the Italian clergy, their dependents, were eagerly grasping at every vacant benefice in Christendom.† At this period the French monarch renewed the peace with England, and his Scottish allies having been included in the treaty, provided they agreed to its terms, La Fayette and Cordelle, the French ambassadors to the English court, attended by Benolt, the Clarenieux herald, proceeded into Scotland for the purpose of procuring a prolongation of the truce, which was about to expire on St. Andrew's day. As the council of regency did not possess sufficient powers to complete this transaction, a meeting of parliament was held; and the French ambassador having intimated, that if Scotland rejected this treaty no farther assistance needed to be looked for from her French allies, the conditions were after some deliberation accepted, and the prolongation of the truce between England and Scotland to St. Andrew's day (Nov. 30th), 1520, was immediately proclaimed at Stirling.‡

Meanwhile the violence and ambition of Angus continued to annoy the government, and to disturb the peace of the nation. Supported by the Earls of Crawford and Errol, Lord Glamis, and other powerful barons, together with the Archbishop of St. Andrews, the Bishops of Dunkeld, Aberdeen, Orkney, and Dunblane, he openly aspired to the supreme power, and set at defiance the authority of the regent. On the arrival of the French ambassadors at Edinburgh, he endeavoured, but without success, to induce them to recognize him and his party as the rulers of the country, and to allow him the management of the treaty; and, irritated at their peremptory refusal, the haughty noble, at the head of a numerous body of his vassals, intercepted the envoys at Caerlaveroc on their return to England; and not only violently upbraided them for their refusal to comply with his demands, but put them in terror of their lives.* His partizans throughout the kingdom, trusting to his protection, openly defied the laws and committed the most shocking outrages on the lives and property of all who ventured to oppose them. The ferocious Home, of Wedderburn, who had married the sister of Angus, about this time assassinated Blackadder, the Prior of Coldingham, with six of his family; upon which William Douglas, the brother of Angus, instantly seized the priory.† A fierce contest now arose between Arran and Angus, in which every kind of lawless violence and injustice was committed, and the streets of the capital were stained with blood. Arran had been chosen Provost of Edinburgh, an office which, on account of the influence it conferred, was at this time an object of ambition among the highest nobles. But the opposite faction, taking advantage of his temporary absence from the metropolis, procured the election of Archibald Douglas, the uncle of Angus, in his room; and when Arran returned from Dalkeith, where the court was then held, he found the gates of the city shut against him. His supporters attempted to force an entrance, but were repulsed, a number being wounded and slain on both sides.‡ Similar scenes of violence and bloodshed were of almost daily occurrence, so that the country was in a state of complete disorganization.

A parliament was summoned to meet in Edinburgh on the 29th of April, probably with the view of attempting to allay these intestine commotions, and to restore the authority of the government. It appears that the vassals and retainers of Angus had, for the most part, quitted the capital before the assembling of the Estates, and that only four hundred spear-men remained with him as a body-guard; while, in consequence of a recommendation transmitted by Albany, or, according to Buchanan, in order to remove the apprehensions of the Hamiltons, Archibald Douglas had resigned the office of provost, and Robert Logan, one of the citizens, had been elected in his room. The partizans of Arran deemed this a favourable opportunity to crush Angus, while the great body of his supporters were at a distance. Archbishop Beaton, the chancellor, whose niece Arran had married, and the other leaders of the faction, held a council in the church of the Blackfriars, for the purpose of concerting their measures. Angus sent his uncle, Gawin Douglas, the celebrated Bishop of Dunkeld, to the meeting, to caution the Hamiltons against any violence, and to offer that he would submit to the laws if any offence were laid to his charge. Addressing himself to Beaton, as the official conservator of the laws of the realm, Douglas remonstrated against their intention of arresting Angus, and entreated that prelate to act as a peace-maker. The archbishop, however, had actually prepared for battle by putting on a coat of mail under his linen rochet, and, in answer to the appeal of Douglas, he said, 'Upon my conscience I know nothing of the matter,' at the same time striking his hand upon his breast, which caused the armour to return a rattling sound. 'My lord,' replied the bishop, 'your conscience clatters;' and leaving the meeting after this pointed rebuke, he hastened back to his nephew, and told him that he must do his best to defend himself with arms. 'For me,' he said, 'I will go to my chamber and pray for you.' Angus immediately put himself at the head of his followers, whom he drew up in a compact body in the High-street of the city. The citizens were favourable to his party, and handed spears from their windows to such of the Douglasses as were not provided with that useful weapon,—a circumstance which gave them a great advantage over the Hamiltons, who were armed only with their swords. Meanwhile, the remonstrance of the bishop had produced a deep impression on the mind of Sir Patrick Hamilton, a prudent and moderate man, the brother of the governor, and he strongly advised Arran to preserve the peace; but he was rudely upbraided with cowardice, in refusing to fight in his friend's quarrel, by Hamilton of Draphane, a natural son of the earl, and a man of a fierce and sanguinary disposition. 'Bastard smaik!† thou liest,' replied Sir Patrick; 'I shall fight to-day where thou darest not be seen.' Upon this the Hamiltons rushed out into the street, and thronged up from the Cowgate through the narrow lanes which lead to the High-street, where their adversaries were drawn up ready to receive them. The outlets of these lanes had been barricaded by the Douglasses with carts, barrels, and other lumber; and as the adherents of the governor struggled through these obstructions, and reached the open street breathless and disordered, they were fiercely attacked by the spearmen of Angus, whose long spears and close array gave them a great advantage over their opponents. At the first onset, Sir Patrick Hamilton was killed by Angus himself, and after a fierce struggle, the party of Arran was completely routed and driven from the city, leaving upwards of seventy men dead on the spot. The earl and his son, who was the principal instigator of the broil, were in such peril that they were obliged to make their escape through the North Loch, mounted on a coal horse, from which they threw the load. Archbishop Beaton took refuge behind the high altar of the church of the Blackfriars monastery;‡ but such was the ferocity of the victorious party, that they pursued him into the sanctuary, tore off his rochet, and would have slain him on the spot, but for the timely interference of the Bishop of Dunkeld. This skirmish was long remembered by the name of 'Clean-the-causeway,' because the faction of Arran was as it were swept from the streets.

Angus and his party now remained for a time absolute masters of the capital, and boldly set at defiance both the authority of the government and the restraints of the law. They took down the heads of Lord Home and his brother from the Tol-booth, and interred them with great solemnity in the Dominican churchyard, causing masses to be said for their souls. Angus having learned that the governor and the chancellor, with some of their adherents, had resolved to meet at Stirling, made an attempt to seize them by a sudden and secret march to that place; but they received timely notice of their danger, and hastily dispersed.† Having failed in this enterprise, Angus dismissed his followers, and retired to his own estates.

The French monarch was still anxious to court the friendship of England, in the hope that, as Tournay had been restored to France by the influence of Wolsey, the restitution of Calais might be obtained also. Accordingly, Robert Stuart, Lord of Aubigny, and Johan Duplanis, Embassy of Aubigny. were despatched as ambassadors to Scotland, for the purpose of inducing the Estates of that kingdom to maintain the peace with England, and to prolong the truce between the two countries. They were also instructed to point out the evil consequences which would result from the return of Albany, as Henry had declared that his resumption of the regency would be the signal for the immediate commencement of hostilities; and it was added, that Francis would never consent to the departure of the regent from France.‡ The ambassadors tried every effort, but without effect, to allay the differences of the contending parties, and to restore tranquillity to the country. At this juncture, a sudden revolution took place Change in the policy of France. in continental politics. Charles V.

of Spain had been elected to the imperial throne in opposition to Francis, and Wolsey, who expected to gain the papal chair through the influence of the emperor, contrived to dissolve the alliance between England and France. It became the interest, therefore, of the French monarch to resume his former policy towards Scotland, and to rekindle the flames of discord between that country and England.

Angus was regarded by Wolsey and Daere as the main stay of the English party among the Scottish nobles; and the queen-mother, who was now completely alienated from her husband, was thus induced to embrace the interests of the French party, and to entreat Albany to return to Scotland, and to resume the government of the country. As the obstacles to the departure of that nobleman from France were now removed, and the French court was anxious to Return of Albany to Scotland. embarrass the operations of Henry, who had openly espoused the cause of the emperor, the regent set sail, and arrived at the Gareloch, in Lennox, on the 19th of November. Proceeding to Stirling he was there joined by the queen, who welcomed him with the utmost cordiality, and bestowed upon him such imprudent marks of her regard as to excite scandalous murmurs regarding the nature of their intercourse. If the testimony of Lord Daere may be credited, she spent not only the day but the greater part of the night in the company of Albany, paying no regard to appearances.* The nobles crowded to the court of the regent to welcome his arrival, and on his entrance into the capital, accompanied by the queen, the chancellor, and a numerous escort of the peers, Angus and his party precipitately abandoned the city, and fled towards the Borders.

Soon after his arrival, the regent summoned a parliament, to meet at Edinburgh on the 26th of December, and cited Angus and his principal adhe-

But, conscious of their guilt, and unable to resist the united strength of the queen and Albany, they were compelled to fly for refuge to the kirk of Steyle, near the Borders, where they opened a negotiation with Henry by means of Gawin Douglas, the Bishop of Dunkeld, who was a zealous supporter of his nephew, Angus. This prelate, whose morality and patriotism were not equal to his genius, was instructed to visit Daere on his journey to England, and afterwards to lay before the English monarch himself a statement of the views of the malecontent nobles, and of the alleged ambition and criminal conduct of the regent. Douglas accordingly proceeded to London,

Charges brought against the regent by Bishop Gawin Douglas. where he addressed a memorial to Henry, in which he accused the regent of numerous acts of peculation, in appropriating to his own use the subsidies sent by the French king, as well as the money received from him, as the price of three celebrated ships, the pride of the Scottish navy, and declared that he had even converted the royal robes and tapestries into dresses for his pages, and had coined the king's large silver vases. He asserted that the royal fortresses of Dunbar, Dunbarton, and Inehgarvie were garrisoned by Frenchmen; that the crown lands were dilapidated; the ecclesiastical benefices sold; the people oppressed and pillaged; and the young king himself kept not only in a state of durance but of want, by an usurper who had no legal title to the regency, as it had been expressly declared by Parliament, that, should Albany not return from France before the 1st of August, 1521, he should forfeit that office. And, not satisfied with bringing these heavy charges against the regent, the bishop revived the foul calumny that Albany had caused the death of the infant Duke of Ross; and the memorial concluded with an urgent intreaty that the English monarch would imitate the example of his ancestor, Henry III., who by force of arms expelled the wicked counsellors of the youthful Scottish king, Alexander III.*

There can be little doubt that many of these vile accusations against the regent were utterly destitute of truth, and that the remainder were grossly exaggerated. The reports which were from time to time transmitted to the English court by Daere are not entitled to greater credit. According to this active and unscrupulous political agent, it was reported that the regent had designs upon the crown, and that Margaret intended to set aside her son, to marry Albany, and to raise him to the throne; that the intercourse between her and the regent was of the most scandalous kind; and that they had attempted, by the offer of Etrick forest (a part of the queen's jointure-lands), to induce Angus to consent to a divorce; and he even goes so far as to affirm that the life of the young king was believed to be in danger. There is good reason to believe that the greater part of these reports originated with Daere himself, as it was his nefarious policy to keep alive the differences among the Scottish nobles, and to weaken the government by throwing distrust and suspicion upon every measure of the regent and the queen.† In answer to the remonstrances of Albany against the infractions of the truce, and the encouragement given by Henry to Angus and his traitorous adherents, Daere retaliated by a complaint that Lord Maxwell, the warden of the western marches, had refused to proclaim the peace, and that the Scottish Borderers had made an incursion into England, and carried off a great booty. The regent, who was anxious for peace with England, promised immediate redress; but Daere, while he recommended his master to abstain from a declaration of war, and to continue an appearance of truce, craftily and dishonestly suggested that sums of money should be paid to the English northern lords, on condition that they should make inroads into Scotland,—a plan which he assures Henry would distress the Scots as much as open hostilities.‡

The queen-mother was speedily made acquainted with the charges which had been brought against her by the Bishop of Dunkeld, and she despatched an envoy to her brother, with copious instructions.

† The following extract, from a letter addressed to the English king by Wolsey, contains a full exposition of the base and insidious policy of Henry and his ministers towards Scotland. "Nevertheless, to cause him (Daere) not only to take a more vigilant eye to the demeanour of the Scots, as well within Scotland as without, and to be more diligent hereafter in writing to your grace and me, but also favourably to entertain the Homes, and other rebels, after his accustomed manner, so that they may contrive the division and sedition in Scotland, whereby the said Duke of Albany may at his coming hither be put in danger; and though some money be employed for the entertainment of the said Homes and rebels, it will quit the cost at length, wherein I have amply instructed the said Lord Daere."—State Papers, p. 91.

written with her own hand, in which she flatly contradicted the calumnious representations of her accuser. She declared that the regent's conduct to her was most respectful and liberal; that he had returned to Scotland solely in consequence of his engagements; that, if he had not come, she must have left the kingdom; and that he had in no way interfered with the custody of her son, who had been permitted by his guardians to reside with herself in the castle of Edinburgh. She entreated Henry not to lend an ear to the calumnies of an unworthy prelate, on whom she had conferred his bishopric, which she would show him she could resume, as the regent had placed the disposal of the see in her hands; and she implored her brother to return a more favourable answer than he had sent on a former occasion.*

Henry, however, had no desire for peace, and with his characteristic violence and insolence, he openly accused his sister of living in shameful adultery with the regent; charged His impious demands. Albany with having left France in defiance of the oath of the French king to detain him in that country, and declared that he would drive him from Scotland. He despatched a herald with a severe reprimand to the queen, and at the same time offered to the Scottish estates the alternative of the immediate dismissal of Albany, or a rupture with England. To this insolent communication the Scottish parliament replied in spirited replies of and dignified terms, repelling the Spirited reply of the Estates. charges brought against the regent, and deriding the apprehensions which Henry affected to entertain for the safety of his nephew, the king. They informed him that they had themselves invited Albany to assume the regency for the good of their king and country, and that they would never dismiss him, either at the request of his grace, or of any other sovereign prince whatever. "And if," they concluded, "because we assert our own rights we should happen to be invaded, what may we do but trust that God will espouse our just quarrel, and demean ourselves as our ancestors have done before us, who, in ancient times, were constrained to fight for the conservation of this realm, and that with good success and honour?"†

While the effect of this spirited reply by the states of Scotland to the demands of Henry was not undetermined, Angus, who had remained unnoticed and inactive on the English borders, became desirous to remove for the time to some other country, where he could mature his plans, and await the favourable moment for their execution. He prevailed on his wife to use her intercession with Albany for this end, and he was permitted to return to Scotland, from which he Angus passes into France. passed immediately into France,—the regent consenting, on his voluntary exile, to remit the sentence of treason and forfeiture which had been previously pronounced.‡

The conduct of the Scottish government meanwhile was calm and dignified. Reluctant to engage in hostilities with England, from which, however advantageous to France, no benefit could result to their own realm, they were yet constrained to prepare for war as the only safeguard against the overbearing and unscrupulous policy of Henry. The measures of that monarch fully justified the wisdom of this course. Irritated by the resolute tone of the Scottish parliament, he visited with banishment and confiscation all the French and Scots in his dominions, and ordered the latter to be driven from the country on foot, and with a white cross affixed to their upper garment. The state of his finances, and the war with France, did not permit of his sending an army Violent measures of Henry. into Scotland, but a squadron of seven ships was despatched to the Firth of Forth, which captured several vessels, and ravaged the towns and villages along the eastern coast. The Earl of Shrewsbury also received instructions to collect the English Border force, and conduct an inroad into Scotland on the side of the Merse and Teviotdale; but, though the orders of Henry were faithfully executed, and part of the town of Kelso was given to the flames, the troops of Shrewsbury were resolutely repulsed by the Borderers, and retired into England, after sustaining considerable loss. On the news of hostilities, Albany convened a parliament at Edinburgh, and a formal declaration of war against England was agreed upon, while the War with England. whole military strength of the kingdom was summoned to meet there. In compliance with the wishes of the governor and queen-mother, the young king, now in his eleventh year, was removed to Stirling Castle, and placed under the sole charge of Lord Erskine. Albany having mustered his army, consisting of eighty thousand men, and supported by a powerful train of artillery, advanced to the Borders, and encamped at Annan, from which he penetrated into England Albany's expedition into England. as far as Carlisle. The expedition, however, was destined to terminate more speedily and peacefully than might have been anticipated from its formidable character. In conducting it, a regard to the national honour seems to have weighed chiefly with Albany and the Scottish nobles, and though the northern part of England, now rendered almost defenceless by the absence of the flower of Henry's army in France, would have fallen an easy prey to the Scots, success must have been only partial and temporary, while the advantage thus gained would have been more than counterbalanced by the manifold and serious events which must have flowed from a protracted war with England. The Scottish leaders, therefore, who remembered the wise advice of Robert Bruce, to avoid a lengthened war, and never, if possible, to risk a general engagement, were anxious for peace on honourable terms. Happily for both countries, the wishes of Henry were entirely in unison with those of the Scots. A war with Scotland, besides other hazards, must have distracted his movements in France, on which he was desirous to concentrate the whole military strength of his kingdom. He deemed it prudent, therefore, to adopt in his intercourse with the Scots a manner less presumptuous and offensive, professing to be anxious only that his nephew should be placed under proper guardians; while he no longer insisted on the departure of Albany from Scotland. Instructions were accordingly transmitted to Lord Daere, to open immediate negotiations with Albany

Truce between for the conclusion of a truce, and the two countries. that able diplomatist found little difficulty in the accomplishment of his task. The queen-mother, with that fickleness which marked her attachments, had secretly deserted the cause of Albany, and begun a correspondence with the English warden, to whom she revealed the whole policy of the governor, and the general aversion which existed in the Scottish army to hostilities with England. Thus encouraged, Daere commenced and prosecuted his overtures for peace with such success, that Albany, after consenting to a truce for two months, disbanded his army and returned to the capital.*

Nothing could be more complicated or irksome than the position in which Albany was now placed. He was anxious to remain at peace; but the refusal of Henry to include France within its provisions brought the negotiations for the continuance of the truce to an abrupt termination. Many of the nobles were in the pay of England, and the remainder were so much under the influence of a factious and selfish spirit, that it was difficult to find any one to whom he could give his confidence, or whom he could intrust with the execution of his designs; while the queen-mother, with characteristic faithlessness and caprice, thwarted his plans, and betrayed all his secrets to Daere. Harassed and disheartened by the difficulties of his situation, the regent resolved to pass once more into France, for the purpose of holding a conference with Francis I., on the best method of overcoming the English faction. A council of regency was appointed, consisting of the Archbishop of Glasgow, and the Earls of Huntley, Arran, and Argyle, along with Gresolles, a French knight, in whom the regent placed great confidence; and having bound them by oath to attempt nothing against his authority,† Albany set sail for France.

His second visit to France, promising to return before the 15th of August in the following year, under the penalty of forfeiting his regency.

Henry, who pretended that the sole cause of his hostility was the presence of Albany, on learning the departure of that prince, despatched Clarendieux herald, to declare in a solemn manner that he held the war with his nephew to be unnatural, and that he was most desirous of living in peace.‡ But nearly at the same moment that he was making these professions of good-will to the person and government of his nephew, his troops were by his orders engaged in laying waste the Scottish Borders. The Earl of Surrey was appointed lieutenant-general against the Scots, and at the head of ten thousand men, broke into the Merse and Teviotdale, ravaged the whole country, and reduced its places of strength, and afterwards took and burnt to the ground the town of Jedburgh, which, according to his own account, contained at this time twice as many houses as Berwick, and was defended by six strong towers. Even its ancient and beautiful monastery was not spared in this ruthless invasion. The English, however, suffered severely from the incessant attacks of the Scottish Borderers who hung upon their march, and shewed themselves, according to Surrey, "the boldest men and the hottest that he ever saw in any nation."* A detachment under Daere, after a fierce struggle, reduced the castle of Ferniehirst, and took prisoner its owner, a celebrated Border chief, named Andrew Kerr. The town of Kelso was also given to the flames, and many of the adjacent villages were levelled with the ground. While the English lay in the neighbourhood of Jedburgh, the horses of the cavalry broke loose one night, and running terror-stricken about the camp, trampled down many of the soldiers, and spread a universal alarm. Amidst the confusion that ensued, it was supposed that the enemy were assaulting the encampment, and many guns and arrows were discharged, which killed and wounded great numbers of the horses, while several hundreds dispersed themselves over the country, and were captured by the Scots. "I think there is lost above eight hundred horses," says Lord Surrey. "I dare not write," he adds, "the wonders Lord Daere and all his company do say they saw that night, of sprites and fearful sights; and universally all their company say plainly that the devil was among them that night six times."†

Meanwhile the queen-mother was busily engaged in carrying on her intrigues to advance her own interests at the expense of the welfare of the country, and to put an end to the regency of Albany, by causing the young king to assume the reins of government, with the expectation that the management of public affairs would in this way virtually fall into her own hands.‡ The scheme, however, was disconcerted by the unexpected return of Albany, who determined to make a last effort to maintain the independence of the kingdom, in the hope that the recent cruel aggression of England would have roused the patriotic feelings of the Scottish nobles, and induced them to lay aside for the time at least, their mutual jealousies and contentions, and to unite in repelling the assaults of the common foe. He brought with him a fleet of eighty-seven small vessels, and a force of four thousand foot, five hundred men-at-arms, a thousand haghbutteers, six hundred horse, and a large train of artillery, with an extensive supply of provisions and wine.* It was reported that, for the purpose of disturbing the English government, he was to be followed by Richard de la Pole, who laid claim to the crown of England, as a descendant of the sister of Edward the Fourth.†

Albany, on his arrival in Scotland, found that his affairs had not improved during his absence. The queen dowager had become thoroughly devoted to England; and the nobles, though prepared to defend the country from English invasion, were not disposed to undertake a war of aggression, more especially as Surrey stood ready with a large force to repel attack, and make reprisals on the Scottish Border, which he threatened to reduce to a desert, unfit for the habitation of men.‡ Even the French auxiliaries, from whose discipline and superior equipments much was expected, excited the dislike of a people proverbially jealous of foreigners, while their maintenance was regarded as a heavy burden on the impoverished country. Albany, however, calculated, not without reason, on the venality of the aristocracy; and by a profuse use of French gold, succeeded in silencing opposition, and producing the appearance of hearty co-operation in his enterprise. Determined, therefore, with all speed to bring the foreign troops into service, he procured the consent of parliament to a proclamation, requiring all persons capable of bearing arms to assemble within two miles of Edinburgh on the 20th of October, and with provisions for twenty days. Meanwhile he convened the leading peers at Glasgow, and after an imposing display of the foreign soldiers and artillery, made a powerful appeal to their patriotism, urging them by the memory of Flodden and the injuries which England had inflicted on Scotland, manfully to maintain the freedom and independence of their country. The venal and time-serving nobles fell on their knees, protesting devotion to his cause; § whilst he was still farther encouraged by promises of aid from Arran, Huntley, Lennox, and Argyle, the governors of the midland, northern, and western districts of the kingdom. These promises were not fulfilled, but an army of forty thousand men mustered on the day appointed on the Borough Muir, near Edinburgh, and with this force Albany proceeded to the Borders. His march was slow, owing to the state of the roads, along which the heavy artillery was dragged with great labour, and the difficulty in securing from the inhabitants on the line the necessary assistance in transporting the baggage. To add to his perplexities, the native portion of the army and its leaders broke out at last into open insubordination. Hatred of the foreign mercenaries and news of the advance of Surrey with a large army, gave strength to the discontent with which many had engaged in the enterprise; and on reaching Melrose, where the Tweed was crossed by a wooden bridge, in spite of the commands and entreaties of Albany, they openly refused to proceed farther. A part of the van were ultimately induced to cross the bridge, but even these in so long time rejoined their recusant countrymen on the other side. Finding it in vain to struggle against the obstinacy and treachery of his men, Albany encamped a little farther down on the left bank of the Tweed, and began the siege of Wark castle, which lay on the right side; having previously sent across a party of the French cavalry, who wasted with fire and sword the surrounding country. The celebrated historian, Buchanan, who was present in this expedition, states that Wark castle consisted of a strongly fortified and very high tower placed within an inner court, and surrounded by a double wall. The outer wall inclosed a large space, within which the country people, in time of war, were accustomed to seek refuge with their cattle and goods. The inner comprehended a much narrower portion, and was defended by a ditch and flanking towers.* The foreign auxiliaries, who alone were engaged in the siege, behaved with great spirit, and speedily stormed the outer court of the castle, but they were at last expelled by the smoke of the burning barns and straw, to which the garrison had set fire. The inner wall, which was more strongly fortified, was next exposed to a cannonade for two days, and a breach having been at last made, the assailants endeavoured to force their way; but the deadly discharges of shot and other weapons poured on them from the ramparts and windows of the great tower checked their advance, and compelled them, on the approach of night, to retire, leaving their dead beneath the walls of the castle. On the following day, as the Tweed, flooded by the snow and rain, threatened to cut off their return, they abandoned the siege, and hastily recrossing the river, joined the main body of the army.†

Albany, convinced at last that farther attempts would only prove ruinous, as Surrey was rapidly advancing with an army of forty-six thousand men, removed his camp to Eccles, a monastery six miles distant from Wark. To have awaited the advance of the enemy with troops which refused to fight, must have exposed him to inevitable defeat, and, therefore, amid a heavy fall of snow, his discontented and disheartened army was suffered to disband itself. Whatever opinion may be formed of the military talents of Albany, the result of this disgraceful expedition is to be attributed chiefly, if not entirely, to the faithlessness and pusillanimity of the Scottish nobles; nor does it seem possible, that in the circumstances, any general, however skilful and brave, could have prevented the unfortunate issue. The English general, who with a numerous and gallant army had hitherto remained on the defensive, to gratify the impatience of his troops for action, hastened, on the news of the siege of Wark, to give battle to Albany. His enemy, however, had disappeared; and as the heavy fall of snow amid which the Scots had dispersed, impeded his march and rendered farther operations almost impracticable, he disbanded his forces, after having honourably provided pay for their past services. His conduct elicited the warm approbation of Henry VIII., who could not fail to be gratified by a result which, besides strengthening the English interest in Scotland, had been accomplished without loss to his own kingdom. Surrey boasted that, while the damage done by Albany to England did not exceed ten pounds, that sustained by Scotland could not be repaired in seven years.*

Albany, on his return to Edinburgh, found himself subjected to increased mortifications. At a meeting of parliament held on the 17th of November, he accused the nobles of having basely deserted him: while they not only reeriminated by charging him with having squandered the public treasure, but insisted on the immediate embarkation of the foreign mercenaries, whose maintenance they represented as burdensome to the country. With this demand he was forced to comply, and notwithstanding the inclement season of the year, the French troops were compelled to embark, but the transports were unfortunately wrecked on the Western Islands, with the loss of the greater part of their crews.† Disgusted and mortified by these proceedings, and hopeless of securing either stability to the government or tranquillity to the country, Albany requested permission to retire once more to France, with the secret determination, it is believed, of never returning to Scotland. He veiled his purpose, however, under the pretext of consulting Francis I., and obtaining from him the assistance of money and troops to carry on the war with England. His request was complied with, on the condition that if he did not return on the 31st of August, his authority as regent and the league with France should both terminate.‡ It was also agreed, though not without strong opposition on the part of the queen-mother, that in the mean time the young king should remain at Stirling, under the charge of Cassilis, Fleming, Borthwick, and Erskine, who were to reside with him in turn for three months. Margaret received permission to visit her son, but her stay was not to exceed two or three days at a time, and her attendance on such occasions was limited to her ladies and usual retinue. Having completed his arrangements by appointing Gresolles to the important office of treasurer, and committing the chief direction of the government during his absence to a council composed of the chancellor, the Bishop of Aberdeen, and the Earls of Argyle and Huntley, Albany left Scotland, to which he was never to return.*

The departure of Albany was followed, in the beginning of 1524, by the death of the Earl of Huntley, one of his most powerful adherents, and the leadership of his party fell into the hands of Beaton, Archbishop of St. Andrews, and chanceller of the kingdom. Nor did this Revolution in prelate want either the spirit to the government.

undertake, or the ability to achieve, what might be done by one man to uphold the sinking cause. Promptly availing himself of his opportunity, he seized the reins of government, and for a few months maintained his position in the chief administrative authority. But it was evident to the queen that the losses sustained by her opponents through the flight of the regent, and the demise of Huntley, had now placed her in circumstances to acquire, by a vigorous movement, the long disputed supremacy. There was indeed a third party, headed by the Earl of Arran, whose royal descent and large possessions would have made him a formidable rival, if the defects of his character had not counterbalanced these advantages. Margaret succeeded in persuading him to unite his interest to hers; and having gained over others of the principal barons, she felt herself sufficiently strong to execute a design which she had of late cherished as the most probable means of securing her triumph. On the 25th of July she suddenly left Stirling with her son, and entering the capital, showed him to the townsmen as their legitimate sovereign, now about to administer in his own name the affairs of his divided and disordered kingdom. James had not yet reached his thirteenth year, but his energy of character had been early developed, and his educational accomplishments were much in advance of his age. His manly temper, his skill in martial exercises,† and the proficiency which he had made in graver studies under his learned preceptor, Gawin Dunbar—enhanced as these were by the prestige of royalty—had already won the esteem and awakened the hopes of the nation, which may well be supposed to have been weary of the protracted and calamitous conflicts for the regency. Accordingly he was welcomed to Edinburgh with enthusiasm; through admiring and applauding crowds of the citizens, he passed with the queen-mother and a train of the nobility, to his ancestral palace of Holyrood; and there, in solemn council, he was declared of age, issued proclamations in his own name, announcing his assumption of the government and received the homage of the assembled peers and prelates. The only recusants were Beaton and the Bishop of Aberdeen, who vainly reminded the nobles of their previous pledges to Albany, and argued the imprudence of plunging their monarch, at so early an age, into all the cares and temptations of royalty. In the course of the following month also, a bond was subscribed by a number of the lords spiritual and temporal, formally cancelling their previous engagement with Albany, and promising that they "shall in all tymes cumin be leil, true, and obedient servands to our said souveraine lord, the kyng's grace." This agreement bears the signatures of the Earls of Arran, Lennox, Crawford, Murray, Morton, and Cassilis; Lords Erskine, Fleming, Borthwick, Livingstone, and Evandale; the Bishops of Ross and Galloway; the Abbots of Holyrood, Scone, Paisley, and Jedburgh; the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, and many of the gentry.* Nor did any serious token of hostility arise elsewhere in the kingdom, although the partizans of the regent stood aloof, and regarded this change in the government with an unfriendly eye.

The prospect of a more settled administration, opened by this bloodless revolution, was speedily clouded. A new complication of the national affairs arose on the side of England, where the tidings of the queen's rapid movement and success, threw some uncertainty over the projects of her brother and Cardinal Wolsey. Although the step which she had taken was entirely in accordance with the policy previously concerted betwixt her and them, they looked upon the manner of its execution as suspicious. She had hurried on the issue without warning Henry of her intention, or waiting for the subsidies of men and money which he had promised; nor was there any reference to the English interests in the acts of council which established the new regime. These circumstances, coupled with Margaret's well-known aversion to Wolsey, made it doubtful that she would be found as subservient to influence from the English court, as had been expected. Nor was the fear altogether groundless. The queen, with all her leanings towards her brother and her native land, had no desire to see her adopted country and her son in a degrading attitude of subjection. She seems to have gladly carried out her design by her own resources, thus placing matters on a basis the most favourable to her own and her son's independent authority. She could not venture, however, and indeed did not desire, anything like a rupture with her English allies. In the message which she sent to announce her success, she still entreated the promised assistance, and ere long received, with obvious satisfaction, a considerable sum of English money, and a company of two hundred soldiers, who were to form the body-guard of the newly inaugurated king. Wolsey's plans had contemplated a much more prominent interposition of his master's influence in the Scottish affairs; and the Duke of Norfolk was lying with a large force upon the Borders, waiting the signal to cross and assume the merit of raising James to a power which he was expected to make subservient to his uncle's ambition. The Earl of Angus also had been recently invited from the continent to the English court, with the view of being employed in his native land to promote the interests of Henry, who counted upon him as a cordial and effective partizan. The queen's rapid and independent action disconcerted these projects. Wolsey saw reason for mistrust, which was soon greatly strengthened, by her peremptory refusal to sanction the proposed return of her husband Angus, by her opening new negotiations with the French monarch, and by her setting at liberty Beaton and the Bishop of Aberdeen, whom she had at first committed to prison in consequence of their opposition to her measures. There was a pause accordingly in the Cardinal's movements, and a truce of a few months was concluded at Berwick, between Norfolk and the Earl of Cassilis, the commissioners of the two kingdoms.

If Margaret had now continued to preserve her reputation and her popularity, it might not have been difficult for her to establish her independence and confirm her power. But she had become enamoured of Henry Stewart, the second son of Lord Evandale. Her unconcealed partiality for this young nobleman, and the arrogance which he assumed on the ground of her favour, awakened general dissatisfaction. Several of the barons withdrew from her court in displeasure; and even Arran, her principal supporter, began to consult his own interests in preference to her cause. Thus weakened, she appeared to present to her brother and Wolsey a more pliable instrument for the execution of their ambitious designs. Accordingly, the ambassadors, Dr. Magnus, Henry's chaplain, and Roger Ratcliffe, his gentleman usher of the privy chamber, were directed to repair without delay to her court, and to endeavour to effect her reconciliation with her husband—the presence of Angus in Scotland being still deemed of primary importance to the English interests there. But the queen's former attachment to him had been replaced by so strong an aversion, that no argument could induce her to consent to his recall. Her opposition, however, did not prevent the return of Angus to Scotland: in the beginning of November he crossed the Borders, and took up his residence at Coldingham Priory, re-entering his native country after a two years' exile, to make it once more the scene of bitter contentions for the regency.

The reappearance of the earl did not threaten at first any serious disturbance of the queen's authority. If the step taken by him had the sanction of the English court, that was kept secret; professedly he was escaping from restraint imposed upon him at Newcastle by the orders of Henry. Nor did he seek on his arrival to surround himself with the state and power, which the prestige of his name and his family influence still placed within his reach. His retinue did not exceed forty armed men, to which number all the barons and gentry were restricted by a recent order of council; and he wrote to Margaret in submissive and conciliatory terms, entreating her to grant him a personal conference, professing his readiness to make amends for any offences which he had committed, and declaring that he had no other desire than to be of service to her and his sovereign. No notice was taken of this communication; and when the parliament met in the middle of the month, it proceeded to the transaction of business without any overt reference to the new element of discord. The re-

The sittings were adjourned from day to day, and the debate was still pending, when an incident occurred which rudely interrupted the delibera-

Attack of Angus tions of the parliament, and com- upon the capital. pletely changed the aspect of affairs. Early on the morning of the 23rd of November, several hours before sunrise, the inhabitants of Edinburgh were roused from their slumbers by the sound of war in their streets. The Earls of Angus and Lennox, with the Master of Kilmaurs and the Laird of Buccleuch, had scaled the walls, opened the gates, and penetrated to the Cross with a body of their partizans, to the number of four or five hundred. Their declared intentions were pacific; they offered no further violence to property or life; and announced that they only sought to have the king's person removed from the custody of individuals who were compassing the injury of the state. But a proclamation of peaceful designs from men who had forced an entrance into the capital with their drawn weapons in their hands, could not be expected to carry much weight. The fire of the castle was directed against them; and the queen, who was at Holyrood, having hastily collected a force of five hundred men, was preparing to drive them from the city at the point of the sword, when the Bishop of Aberdeen and the Abbot of Cambuskenneth, accompanied by Dr. Magnus, hurried to the palace to entreat that she would stop the cannonade from the castle, which was doing much more injury to the citizens than to the intruders. They found her in a state of angry excitement. She imperiously ordered the English ambassador home to his lodging, suspecting him to be a party to the outrage; and for a little, there appeared no hope of preventing a fierce and sanguinary conflict between the two factions in the narrow streets of the metropolis. More moderate counsels, however, at length prevailed. A proclamation in the king's name, commanding the imme-

diated departure of Angus and his adherents, had the desired effect. They withdrew in the direction of Dalkeith; and ere the late dawn of the winter's day called the merchants and craftsmen to their booths in the Lawn-market, the queen had passed up the street with her son, by torchlight, to the castle, and shut herself up in the fortress to devise further measures for the promotion of her security and influence. She was attended by no individuals of note, except the secretary of the late regent, and the Earl of Murray, another well-known partizan of the French faction.*

Meanwhile the agents of Wolsey had been busily employed. With English spies, Intrigues of the even in the palace of James, and English agents. many of the most illustrious persons at his court in receipt of English pensions, it was not wonderful that considerable success had attended their intrigues. Dr. Magnus, writing to the Cardinal on the 10th of November, had been able to report, that Arran was no longer opposed to a reconciliation with Angus; that Albany's brother, the Commandator of Seone and Inchaffray, with Cockburn, Bishop of Dunkeld, the Earl of Cassilis, and the learned Adam Otterburn, were decidedly favourable to the alliance with England; and that even the Chancellor Beaton now listened to overtures from the same quarter. In this state of matters, the attack on Edinburgh was by no means so rash a measure as the small number of the assailants and their speedy retreat might seem to indicate. There had been grounds for expecting that many of those who had not yet broken off from the queen's party, would embrace that opportunity of declaring themselves, and joining the ranks of her opponents. Nor did the failure of the attempt to get possession of the capital materially hinder the subsequent progress of the confederates. The queen's retreat into the castle separated her in a great measure from the nobles and gentry, who had still continued to attend her councils. Her seclusion there, with no persons of influence in attendance upon her, save those whose leanings to the French court were notorious, threw new suspicion over her purposes, and put new arguments against her into the mouths of her rivals. In a few days Beaton and Angus entered Coalition of Angus and Beaton. to give them a short and easy path to the contested supremacy. Alarmed by this unexpected and critical turn of affairs, Margaret was compelled to make another appeal to her brother. In her own name, and in that of Arran, who had not yet avowedly separated himself from her interests, she despatched the Earl of Cassilis, the Bishop of Dunkeld, and the Abbot of Cambuskenneth, on an embassy to London: their instructions were, to remonstrate with Henry on account of her husband's return, to excuse her apparent alienation from the designs of the English court, on the ground of the jealousy of the Scottish people with regard to their country's independence, and to propose a permanent alliance between the two kingdoms, through the marriage of James to the Princess Mary. At the same time a herald was sent to France, for the purpose of announcing that the regency of Albany must be considered legally at an end, requiring the restitution of the military stores in his castle of Dunbar, and urging on the consideration of the French monarch the losses which the trade of Scotland had suffered on his account. This was intended to prove the sincerity of her professed desire for a reconciliation with Henry. But the suspicions which her previous proceedings had awakened, were too strong to be easily lulled to rest; and the close of the year found her ambassadors still in London, occupied with tedious and difficult negotiations, which gave little promise of terminating in any satisfactory result.

The beginning of the next year (1525), saw the balance inclining more and more decidedly against the queen. Angus and Beaton, backed by an influential party of the other peers and prelates, had the country open to them, and the actual form of the government in their hands. Establishing their head quarters at St. Andrews, they proceeded to demand, in peremptory terms, the removal of the king from under the control of his mother, and the appointment of a new council of regency by the parliament. Margaret, on her side, could not venture beyond the walls of Edinburgh castle; the possession of this fortress, and her hold on the royal person, being the only elements of strength that remained to her. But her ^{Intrigues of the queen.} proud and energetic spirit was not yet broken; and she still maintained a high tone of resolution and independence in the measures which she adopted. The Earl of Cassilis, who had returned from England for further instructions, was sent back to propose, that supplies of money and ammunition should be forwarded to her without delay, and that the Duke of Norfolk should create a diversion in her favour, by advancing on the Scottish frontier with an army of ten thousand men. With these demands she coupled a declaration, that unless Henry would pledge himself to give his daughter in marriage to James, as soon as the princess attained the age of fourteen, the negotiations with France could not be finally abandoned. Margaret also attempted, through Barton, the Comptroller of her household, to sow dissension among the partisans of Angus and Beaton; and on the failure of this attempt, she did not hesitate to issue a violent proclamation against them in the king's name. Threatening death and confiscation on all who should be found supporting their pretensions, and singling out the chancellor, the Bishop of Aberdeen, and the Prior of St. Andrews, it specially charged them with treasonable practices, in withdrawing from the councils of their sovereign, and instigating measures subversive of his authority.*

The deliberations which ensued at St. Andrews

* Cal. B. vii. 75.

were anxious and protracted. As Angus was pledged to the policy of England, and the English ambassador was still exerting himself to bring about a reconciliation, the confederates hesitated to take any step which might widen the breach betwixt them and the queen. At length, after a discussion which lasted twenty days, they ventured to publish a strong declaration, in which they condemned the continued seclusion of the king in Edinburgh castle, summoned a meeting of the three Estates at Stirling, on the sixth of February, to settle the question of the regency, and announced that in the mean time no edict, though bearing the royal name, should be received as legal or obeyed as authoritative.* They also wrote to the English monarch, justifying their procedure, and entreating his pardon if it did not meet with his approval. Thus defied at home, and disappointed of assistance from abroad, Margaret did not yet permit her courage and hope to give way. As a last resource she determined to try an appeal to arms, and for this purpose entreated the barons who still lingered around her, to raise their retainers, and take the field on her behalf. To this, however, they would not consent, unless the young king accompanied them—a condition to which Margaret dared not agree, fearing to lose the advantage connected with the custody of her son. Accordingly she was at last compelled to yield. Negotiations being opened under the auspices of Dr. Magnus, it was mutually agreed that James should be removed to the palace of Holyrood, and placed under the guardianship of a council elected by parliament, and presided over by the queen; in whose favour it was also stipulated, that Angus should renounce his marital rights over her person and property, and that all benefices under the value of a thousand pounds should continue at her disposal. It was with strong but concealed repugnance that she subscribed this contract, for she could not fail to see that it was a virtual surrender of the power for which she had so long and resolutely struggled. There can be no doubt, that if she had afterwards obtained any favourable opportunity of casting off the restraints which this treaty imposed upon her, she would have done so without hesitation, regardless of the breach of faith which such a step involved. In fact, she had hardly completed the ratification of the compromise, when she sent off a trusty retainer to France, with letters to Albany, in which she addressed him as regent, entreated his assistance in procuring her divorce, and declared her desire to obtain the aid of the French court in an attempt to regain her position. But France was no longer able to succour her: within a few days from the date of her misdeed he was defeated and made prisoner at Pavia. Nor did she escape the punishment which her treachery deserved. Her letters, being intercepted and sent to England, extinguished the last lingering embers of her hope in that quarter: and thenceforward, though she continued for a little longer in nominal authority at her son's court, her influence was gone, and it scarcely needed her unseemly marriage, in the following year, with her paramour, Henry Stewart, to complete the ruin of her power and prospects.

Meanwhile, the foolish and wicked conduct of the queen-mother, in conferring the supreme power upon a boy, only in the thirteenth year of his age, withdrawing him from his studies, and exposing him to all the flatteries and vices of the court, was exercising the most injurious influence on the character of the youthful monarch. His early education had been entrusted to the care of the famous Sir David Lindsay, who has given a most graphic and deeply interesting description of the manner in which he moulded the character of the prince, and instructed him in the knowledge of all liberal and manly accomplishments. Sir David was appointed gentleman-usher to the royal infant on the day of his birth, and was for many years his constant companion and playmate. "On no man of his age," it has been justly observed, "could the superintendence of moments of such susceptibility have more providentially devolved. Lindsay was a man of elegant taste and grand ideas, as great a philosopher as he was a poet, a detester of abuses and prejudices, and the secret projector of some of the most important improvements which soon after took place in the condition of his country."* The duties of his important office were discharged by the accomplished and highly-gifted tutor with the most scrupulous fidelity and devoted affection, and he seems to have scarcely ever quitted the presence of his ward either by day or night. Few passages in historical biography are more interesting than those in which

Sir David recalls to his sovereign's recollection the amusements with which he had entertained his infancy, and shows how gently and fondly he applied all the resources of his richly endowed intellect to amuse and instruct the royal babe, carefully exercising his faculties both of body and mind, gradually awakening his energies, and adapting his information to the tender years of the prince, and acting as 'sewer, cup-bearer, carver, purse-master, usher, and chief officer of his bedchamber.'

After awakening the youthful prince's natural love of music by the 'springs' he played on his lute, Sir David, who had a memory delightfully stored with ancient lore, kindled the imagination of his pupil by the recitation of historical tales, ballad stories, and marvellous traditions, and made him acquainted with the adventures of Hector, Alexander, Hercules, Samson, King Arthur, and 'gentle Julius;' and when history and tradition failed, he

"Feigned many a fable,
Of Troilus, the sorrow and the joy,
And sieges all of Tyre, Thebes, and Troy."

At one time he would tell him

"Of leal lovers, stories amiable; †"

at another time he would recite to him the prophecies of Thomas the Rhymer, Bede, and Merlin, or the popular marvels of 'Red Etin' †† and the 'Gyir Carline.' †††

In the midst of these recreations, however, Sir David never lost sight of the grand object to which all his efforts were directed, the improvement of the young prince's character, so as to fit him for the duties of his exalted station.

"Wherefore since thou hast sic capacitie,

The skilful training of this wise and affectionate Progress made governor seems to have exerted by James in his the most beneficial influence on the education. susceptible mind of his royal pupil;
and we learn from the testimony of Dr. Magnus and Roger Ratcliffe, the English ambassadors, that even at this early period James excelled in all the athletic and knightly exercises of the age. In a letter to Wolsey, dated Edinburgh, 15th November, 1521, there is the following interesting description of the amusements of the princely youth:—
"The queen's said grace had us forth for solace

(recreation) with the king's grace here at Leith, and in the fields, and to see him stir his horses, and run with a spear, among his lords and servants, at a glove. Also, by the queen's procuring, we have seen his said grace use himself pleasantly both in singing and dancing, and showing familiarity among his lords. All which, his princely acts and doings, be so excellent for his age (not yet thirteen till Easter next), that in our opinion it is not possible they should be amended. And much more to our comfort it is to see that in personage, favour,
and countenance, and in all other his proceedings,
his grace resembleth very much the king's highness (Henry VIII.) our master. And besides all this his said grace hath, with most loving countenance, showed unto us that much it pleased his grace to hear of the good manners of England, and much it displeaseth to see his subjects exercise the fashions and manners of France." His mother, tate to interrupt, for her own purposes, a course of training so well calculated to make her son a wise and great sovereign. During her residence in England she strove to irritate his fiery and impetuous temperament by taunts that he was treated as an infant, and held in a state of degrading bondage, in order to induce him to clope with her from the toils and tasks of the school into the liberty of his uncle's court, which she depicted in captivating terms. As might have been expected, such representations produced a most injurious effect on the ardent and wilful disposition of the prince, then in his eleventh year. On one of his attendants resisting his attempts to break his captivity, as his mother thought proper to term his educational restraint, the royal boy became furious with passion, and struck him through the arm with his dagger; and soon after this he threatened to stab the porter, 'because the man would not open the gates of Stirling castle at his order.*' In the following year, as we have seen, the intrigues of the queen were at length successful; the young prince was taken

'Fra the schools,
Where he, under obedience,
Was learning virtue and science, and put at the head of the government, in order that his mother and her faction might misgovern the kingdom in his name. His wise and virtuous governor, Lindsay, along with Bellenden, the learned translator of Boece, and the other personal attendants of the prince, were dismissed, and their places supplied with base sycophants and flatterers, who neglected his education, and pandered to his passions, in order that he might the more readily yield himself to their guidance. Under the pretence of providing for the security of the king's person, the queen surrounded him with a guard of two hundred men-at-arms, who were paid by

The evil results to which the youthful prince was of her policy. exposed from the companionship of these licentious military courtiers, may be learned from the following lively picture, drawn by Sir David Lindsay, in his poem entitled 'The Complaint':—

"Sir, some would say, your majestie Shall now go to your liberty;
Ye shall by no man be coaretit,*
Nor to the school no more subjected;
We think them very natural fools
That learn o'ermeikle in the schools:
Sir, ye must learn to run a spear,
And guide you like a man of war;
For we shall put such men about you,
That all the world and more shall doubt you.
Then to his grace they put a guard,
Which hastily got their reward:
Each man after their quality.
They did solist his majesty,
Some made him revel at the racket,
Some barlit him to the hurly-hacket,†
And some, to show their courtly corsis,‡
Would ride to Leith, and run their horses,
And wichtly wallop § over the sands;
They neither spared spurs nor wands,
Casting galmondis || with bends and becks,
For wantonness some broke their necks:
There was no play, but cards and dice,
And aye Sir Flattery bore the prize."

The poet then proceeds to depict in still darker colours the proceedings of these gentlemen of the body-guard whom Queen Margaret had placed about her son.

"Methought it was a piteous thing,
To see that fair, young, tender king,
Of whom thir gallants stood nane awe,
To play with him, pluck at the crow.¶
They became rich, I you assure,
But ay, the prince remained poor;
There was few of that garnison **

and wickedness of those who, to gain their own base ends, exposed the young prince, at a most critical period of life, to the contamination of such evil counsel and example.*

Margaret, however, did not long enjoy the power which she had hoped to gain by the premature elevation of her son to supreme authority. Her duplicity and foolish obstinacy speedily lost her the confidence of all parties in the country, while her profligate behaviour rendered her disreputable in the eyes of the people. The detection of her intrigues with France had completely alienated from her the affections of the English court; and her imperious brother was so enraged at her indecent conduct and her pertinacious opposition to the proposal of a marriage between the young king and the Princess Mary, that he addressed to her a letter, full of the most violent reproaches, which caused her to burst into tears, and exclaim, that such a letter was never written to any noblewoman.† But though she at first forbade Magnus, the English envoy, to bring her any more such letters from her brother to read,—for if she did read any more, she was right sure it would be her death,—yet, intimidated by his violent menaces, she ultimately replied in a submissive tone and with humble remonstrances. She still persisted, however, in urging forward her divorce; and so deep were her apprehensions, real or pretended, of Angus, that she refused to return to Edinburgh, where her presence was necessary, as president of the council of state, to ratify the recent truce with England, though security was offered for her safety. But it was generally whispered, "that the queen was forced to retire a while on account of the birth of her first child by Henry Stewart, with whom she had made a secret marriage." As she obstinately refused, from whatever cause, to trust her person in the capital, it was ultimately resolved that the deed should be held valid without her signature. True to her intriguing character, she now entered into a secret negotiation with Louisa of Savoy, the mother of Francis I., and the regent of the kingdom during his captivity, offering to conclude a firm alliance with France, on condition of receiving payment of a sum of money and an annual pension. But this selfish attempt shared the fate of her other schemes; for a treaty which was at this time concluded between France and England, put an end to all hopes of assistance from the French court, and extinguished for a season the French faction among the Scottish nobles.

An embassy, consisting of the Archbishop of Glasgow and the Earl of Angus, with other commissioners, now proceeded to Berwick, where a truce of three years was concluded with England. The queen-mother and Arran used every effort to prevent the ratification of the treaty; and when they found their intrigues ineffectual, Arran collected a force of five thousand men, and advanced to Linlithgow, with the view of rescuing the king out of the hands of the Douglasses. But Angus, Argyle, and Lennox, taking James with them, instantly marched against the insurgents, who precipitately retreated and dispersed at the sight of the royal standard, without attempting to offer any resistance.*

The long-pending suit of divorce between the queen and her husband was at length terminated. Angus had hitherto resisted the suit, not from any affection which he entertained for his wife, but in order to obtain possession of her extensive estates; and he now withdrew his opposition, on discovering that such a project would not receive the sanction of the council. The sentence of divorce accordingly was pronounced by the chancellor, in his Consistorial court of St. Andrews, on the alleged ground that Angus had been betrothed to a noble lady before his marriage with the queen. In the course of the same year a similar decision was delivered by the pope; and no sooner was this sentence promulgated than Margaret publicly acknowledged Henry Stewart as her husband. The Lords of the Council, incensed at this presumption on the part of Stewart, in forming such an alliance without the consent of the king, sent Lord Erskine, with a small body of troops, to Stirling, where the queen resided, and Margaret was compelled to surrender her husband, who was for a short time committed to prison.†

These proceedings on the part of the queen not only disgusted the people, but produced a great change in the policy of Angus, and ultimately led to a revolution in the government. That powerful baron had hitherto laboured to accomplish a reconciliation with his wife, with the hope that, by the possession of her estates, with the custody of the young king's person, he would be enabled to engross the supreme power. The divorce of the queen, and her marriage to her paramour, disappointed this expectation, and led him to adopt a new course of policy, which removed the only obstacle that stood between him and absolute dominion. In the month of April, 1525, the king completed his fourteenth year, a period when, by the law of Scotland, his minority terminated and he was to be regarded as an independent sovereign. Angus speedily resolved to take advantage of this event, in order to obtain the custody of the king's person, and to engross the whole power of the government. On the thirteenth of June a parliament assembled at Edinburgh, and on the fifth day of its session an ordinance was passed, declaring, that as the king had now attained his full majority, the royal prerogative rested solely in his hands, and that all other authority, which had been used by any person whatever in his name, was abrogated.‡ This artful measure at once annulled the power of the Secret Council, the only obstacle which stood between Angus and the complete control of the state. But the act of the three Estates, which entrusted the keeping of the royal person to certain peers in rotation, still remained in force; and as Angus had summoned the parliament to meet him at that precise time when the periodical guardianship of the king devolved upon himself and Beaton, now ^{Angus obtains possession of the king's person.} Archbishop of St. Andrews, the consequence of this politic manœuvre was to throw the supreme power entirely into their hands. A new Secret Council was nominated, composed exclusively of the adherents of Angus, and almost every office of trust and emolument in the kingdom was conferred on one or other of his supporters. His uncle, Archibald Douglas, of Kilspindy, was made high-treasurer; Erskine of Halton, secretary; and Crichton, Abbot of Holyrood, privy seal. The great seal was soon after taken from Beaton, and Angus himself assumed the office of chancellor, and wielded the full authority of regent, though without assuming the name.

The influence of the house of Douglas seemed now to have revived in all its ^{Tyranny of the Douglasses.} ancient strength, and once more threatened to destroy both the independence of the crown and the liberties of the people. An act of parliament was passed, granting to the leaders of this all-powerful faction a remission for all the crimes, robberies, or treasons, committed by them during the last nineteen years.* Murders, robberies, and other flagrant crimes were committed with impunity by their followers; the most sacred ecclesiastical dignities were violently seized, and bestowed upon the creatures of Angus, or sometimes even sold to the highest bidder; and so shamefully were the rules of justice perverted by the partiality of the earl for his kinsmen and vassals, that, according to an old historian, "there dared no man strive at law with a Douglas, or a Douglas's man; for if he did, he was sure to get the worst of the law-suit. And," he adds, "although Angus travelled through the country under the pretence of punishing thieves, robbers, and murderers, there were no malefactors so great as those who rode in his own company."

The government of Angus soon became as odious to the king as it was oppressive to the country, and James eagerly sought an opportunity to free himself from a yoke which he felt to be at once galling and degrading. He secretly made known his feelings and wishes to the Earl of Lennox, a wise and upright nobleman, who was now alienated from Angus on account of his tyranny and grasping ambition; and by his advice, it is believed, a plan was concocted for the deliverance of the king from the irksome restraint in which he was held. About the middle of summer Angus made a progress into Teviotdale, for the purpose of repressing some excesses which had taken place on the Borders, and carried the king with him. On reaching Jedburgh, the chiefs of the neighbouring clans were summoned to meet their sovereign, and enjoined to apprehend certain notorious criminals within their bounds. Before this, however, James had secretly sent an intimation to Sir Walter Scott, of Buccleuch, a powerful Border chief, that he should raise his clan and rescue his sovereign out of the hands of the Douglasses. Buccleuch eagerly obeyed the royal injunction, and immediately levied his retainers and friends, comprehending a large body of Elliots, Armstrongs, and other Border clans, over whom he exercised great authority. Angus, with his reluctant ward, had passed the night at Melrose on his return from Jedburgh, and the clans of Home and Ker, who had accompanied him in his expedition, had taken their leave of the king, when, in the grey of the morning, Buccleuch and his followers, to the number of a thousand horse, suddenly appeared on the northern slope of an eminence called Halidon Hill, and, descending into the plain, interposed between Angus and the bridge over the Tweed. A messenger was immediately sent to inquire of Sir Walter the reason of his appearance at the head of such a force. He answered, that he came to show his clan to the king, according to the custom of the Border chiefs when their territories were honoured by the royal presence. He was then commanded, in the king's name, to dismiss his followers; but he bluntly refused, alleging that he knew the king's mind better than Angus. On receiving this haughty answer, which was justly regarded as a defiance, the earl, addressing the king, said, "Sir, yonder is Buccleuch, and the thieves of Annandale with him, to intercept your passage; I vow to God they shall either fight or flee; and ye shall tarry here on this knoll (knoll), and my brother George with you, with any other company you please, and I shall pass and put yon thieves off the ground, and rid the gate (clear the way) unto your grace, or else die for it." With these words Angus alighted and hastened to the charge, while his brother Sir George, with the Earl of Lennox and Lord Maxwell, formed a guard around the king, and retired to a neighbouring hillock. Buccleuch and his retainers likewise dismounted, and received the assailants with levelled spears. The battle was fiercely contested; but the Borderers were unable to withstand the charge of the armed knights who were in the array of the Douglasses; and the Homes and Kers, who were at no great distance, returned on hearing the noise of the conflict, and, attacking the left wing and rear of Buccleuch's little army, decided the fate of the day. About eighty of the Scotts fell in this engagement; while, on the side of the Douglasses, the only material loss was the death of Ker of Cessford, who was killed in the pursuit by Elliot of Stobs, a retainer of Buccleuch.* In conse-

quenee of this untoward event, which was deeply lamented by both parties, a deadly feud arose between the Scotts and Kers, which raged during the greater part of a century, and ultimately led to the murder of Buccleuch himself, who was slain by the Kers, in the streets of Edinburgh, in the year 1552.*

As Lennox was suspected of having privately encouraged the attempt of Buccleuch, he became from this period an object of distrust to the victorious faction, and speedily retired from court. Shortly after, in concert with Archbishop Beaton and the queen-mother, he resolved to make another effort to rescue the king from the ignominious thralldom in which he was held by the Douglasses. Having collected an army of ten or twelve thousand men, he advanced from Stirling towards Edinburgh; but his march was intercepted near Linlithgow by the Earl of Arran, at the head of a superior force. This nobleman, the chief of the powerful family of the Hamiltons, had recently become reconciled to his former rival, Angus, and he was now despatched by the Douglasses to meet his nephew Lennox, with the hope of conciliating his hostility, and thus averting the odium of a contest with a peer who was universally esteemed and beloved. The effort, however, proved unsuccessful. Lennox declared, with great vehemence, that he would enter the capital or die in the attempt.† On this, Arran instantly despatched a messenger to Angus, then at Edinburgh, who commanded the city bells to ring, and the trumpets to sound, for the purpose of calling the citizens to arms; and having displayed the royal banner, he obliged the king himself to mount on horseback, to give countenance to the measures of the Douglasses against his own friends. James, however, on pretext of indisposition, delayed the march of the troops as much as possible, and Angus, unable to restrain his impatience, pushed forward to the assistance of Arran, leaving the king to follow under the charge of his brother, Sir George Douglas. On reaching Linlithgow, the earl found the Hamiltons drawn up on the bank of the river Avon, about a mile to the west of the town. Arran having seized the bridge which crossed the stream at that place, Lennox was compelled, by this skilful manœuvre, to attempt a passage by a difficult ford opposite the nunnery of called 'Skinner's Field,' by a corruption from 'Skirmish Field,' and forms part of the Abbotsford estate. A stone seat on the edge of Kaeside, about half a mile above the house of Abbotsford, marks the spot called 'Turnagain,' where Elliot turned and slew Cessford with a stroke of his lance. It was a favorite resting-place of Sir Walter Scott, and commands a magnificent view of Melrose and the vale of the Tweed.—See Abbotsford edition of the Waverley Novels, vol. v. p. 217. Cessford was the chief of the Roxburgh branch of the family of Ker, now represented by the Duke of Roxburgh.

Encounter with the Hamiltons and Douglasses

Manuel, a little further up, and his soldiers were thus exposed to a galling fire from the Hamiltons, who occupied the high ground above the river. They made good their passage, however, and, pressing up the opposite bank, were in the act of closing with the enemy, when the shout of 'Douglas!' announcing the arrival of Angus, carried dismay into their ranks, and they gave way on all sides, and fled in great confusion. Meanwhile, the king and his escort were slowly approaching the scene of conflict. On reaching the village of Corstorphine, the distant sound of the artillery announced the commencement of the battle, and Sir George Douglas, enraged at the king's obvious reluctance to proceed, broke out into fierce reproaches and brutal menaces. 'Bide where you are, sir,' said he, 'for if they get hold of you, be it by one of your arms, we will seize a leg, and pull you in two pieces rather than part from you,'—a threat which the king never forgave.* Tidings now came from the field of battle that Angus had gained the victory, and the young king, dismayed at the news, urged his attendants to gallop forward, for the purpose of putting a stop to the slaughter, charging them especially to save the life of the Earl of Lennox. Sir Andrew Wood, of Largo, one of the king's most trusty servants, arrived on the field in time to save the Earl of Glencairn, who, protected by some strong ground, was still fighting gallantly, though he had scarce thirty men left alive. But Lennox, about whose safety the king was so anxious, had been murdered in cold blood by Sir James Hamilton, of Draphane, the bastard son of Arran, a bloodthirsty ruffian, who took him from the Laird of Pardovan, to whom he had surrendered himself.† Arran himself was found kneeling beside the bleeding body of his nephew, which he had covered with his scarlet cloak, and weeping bitterly he exclaimed: 'The hardest, stoutest, and wisest man that Scotland bore, lies here slain!' Along with Lennox, there fell in this conflict the Abbots of Melrose and Dunfermline, Stirling of Keir, and the Laird of Houston.

The victorious army spent the night at Linlithgow, with great rejoicings, but the young king was overwhelmed with grief on account of the death of Lennox, to whom he was warmly attached. The failure of the double attempt to rescue the king from the hated yoke of the Douglasses, served only to rivet his chains more firmly than ever, and to place the supremacy of Angus on a seurer basis. Determined to avail himself of this favourable opportunity to crush entirely the power of his enemies, he made a rapid flight of Beaton and the queen-mother. march to Stirling, with the view of seizing the queen and the Archbishop of St. Andrews; but they had both made their escape. Margaret, according to Pitscottie, 'gaed vagrant disguised ane lang time, for fear of the Douglasses;' while Beaton fled to the hills of Balgruno, in Fife, where he assumed the disguise of a shepherd and tended a flock of sheep for three months, in order to elude the pursuit of his enemies. The Douglasses, meanwhile, wreaked their vengeance on his estates, and pillaged the abbey of Dunfermline and the castle of St. Andrews.* These measures met with the cordial approbation of Henry VIII., who, soon after, sent letters to Angus and Arran, in which, after congratulating them on their success, he offered them his best advice for the education of his nephew, and exhorted them to crush their enemies,—especially the archbishop, the mainspring of the coalition against their authority.†

The conduct of Angus and his associates sufficiently shows that they needed no exhortations to adopt vigorous measures against all who refused to submit to their sway. A parliament was convoked at Edinburgh, on the 12th of November, in which an act was passed vindicating the conduct of Angus and Arran, in the late conflict with Lennox; sentence of forfeiture ^{of the adherents of Lennox.} was passed against the insurgent barons who had espoused his cause, and their possessions were distributed among the dominant faction. The lands of the Earl of Cassilis and Lord Evandale were allotted to Arran. The ample estates of Lord Lindsay of the Byres, and of the eastern and northern barons who had supported Lennox, fell to the share of Angus, and his uncle Archibald Douglas of Kilspindy; while Sir George Douglas obtained a grant of the lands of Stirling of Keir, who fell in the battle of Linlithgow. Angus behaved with great lenity towards the queen-mother, who at the intercession of her son was forgiven, and invited to the capital, where she was treated with respect, and inducted into the same apartments in the palace of Holyrood which were formerly occupied by the regent Albany. The young king resided with her, and slept in a room over her bed-chamber, and would scarcely ever leave her company for a moment, except when he was hunting or sporting. "It is thought," wrote Sir Christopher Dacre to his brother, "that if the queen remains thus near her son, the whole court will have a turn, for the king has no affection either to the Earl of Angus or to the Earl of Arran."

The Archbishop of St. Andrews had meanwhile succeeded in making his peace ^{Reconciliation} with the Douglasses by liberal gifts ^{between Angus and Beaton.} of money, and the surrender of the abbey of Kilwinning,‡ and after the terms of the pacification were finally arranged he gave a sumptuous entertainment in his castle of St. Andrews to the king, the queen-mother, Angus and the other chiefs of the Douglas faction. "There," says Pitscottie, "he made them great banqueting and merriness, and also propined (presented) them with great gifts, that he might the better pacify their wrath towards him, and obtain their favour."* He prudently declined, however, to attend the court, or to interfere with the administration of public affairs; † whilst the Earl of Arran, who was now advanced in years, and overwhelmed with grief and remorse for the death of his nephew Lennox, shut himself up in one of his castles, and left the supreme power wholly in the hands of Angus. The Earl himself was chancellor, and had the law completely under his control, his uncle, Archibald Douglas of Kilspindy, was treasurer, and commanded the whole revenues of the country, while his brother Sir George Douglas, who was the object of the king's special aversion and dread, was master of the royal household. Above all, the Douglasses had possession of the royal person, and could compel the king to affix his signature to any deed or letter which their tyranny or caprice might dictate. So long as the king remained in their hands, therefore, they could wield at will the whole resources of the government, and resistance to their overgrown power therefore was certain to be visited with all the pains and penalties of treason. The nobility were either gained over by the prospect of personal advantage, or cowed into submission by the disastrous results of the recent attempts to rescue the king from his captivity; while the people groaned under the oppression of their feudal tyrants, without the possibility of resistance or the hope of redress. The tyranny of the unprincipled faction

Miserable state of the country. Authority became every day more intolerable to the nation. The arm of the law, paralyzed by their power, was unable either to repress or to punish their excesses, and crimes of the deepest dye were openly committed with impunity. 'As for the ordering of God's justice,' says a contemporary writer, 'there is none done in all Scotland.' Even during the sitting of Parliament Sir James Gordon of Lochinvar, who had murdered the Laird of Bomby at the door of St. Giles's church, had the audacity to walk openly abroad in the streets of the capital, † no one daring to arrest him, because he was an adherent of Douglas. husband of Angus's niece, was assassinated by the Douglasses and Homes at the very gates of Edinburgh, though he had in his possession a safe conduct from Angus himself.* The Earl of Cassilis was murdered by Hugh Campbell of Loudon, Sheriff of Ayr, at the instigation of the ferocious Hamilton of Draphane; † and Maclean of Dowart, during a visit to the capital, was surprised when in bed, and put to death, by Sir John Campbell of Calder. Shortly before this, the Laird of Drumelzier slew Lord Fleming, while engaged in the sport of hawking, and the Laird of Meldrum was assassinated by the Master of Forbes, ‡ so that the whole country seemed fast relapsing into a state of barbarism.

But although the law was too feeble to exact vengeance for these foul murders, An example of their perpetrators did not always feudal revenge. escape unpunished. Under the feudal system it was considered a sacred duty, which no lapse of time could set aside, to avenge the death of a clans man or friend, not only upon the actual homicide, but, in the phrase of the time, upon 'all his name, kindred, maintainers and upholders.' A striking example of this inveterate determination to exact blood for blood, occurred at this lawless period. A groom of the late Earl of Lennox had brooded over the murder of his master, to whom he was warmly attached, till at length he formed the resolution to avenge his death. With this intention he set out for Edinburgh, where meeting a fellow-servant in the street, he inquired if he had seen Hamilton, the bastard of Arran. Having received an answer in the affirmative, he exclaimed, 'Ungrateful wretch, didst thou suffer the villain to live who murdered our best of masters? Begone! Thou deservest to be hanged.' With these words he straightway proceeded to Holyrood, where two thousand of the Douglas and Hamilton clans were mustering in the palace yard for a projected expedition to the Borders. Singling out Sir James Hamilton, he watched him closely, till he saw him leave the assembly and enter a dark archway over the gate, when he suddenly sprung upon him, and repeatedly stabbed him with his dagger, leaving him extended on the ground with six severe wounds, none of which however proved fatal. An alarm was soon given, but as the perpetrator of this audacious deed had immediately mingled with the crowd, he might have escaped detection but for an order which was issued, that the palace gates should be shut, and all within the court should draw up in single file against the walls. The assassin was speedily seized with his dagger in his hand stained with recent blood. He boldly avowed the vengeful deed, and only lamented that the attempt had not been successful. He was subjected to the most cruel tortures, which he bore with unflinching courage, and when previous to his execution his right hand was cut off, he observed that it merited its fate because it had failed to do its duty.*

When robberies and murders were openly committed in the streets of the capital and at the threshold of the royal palace and the cathedral church, the condition of the more remote districts of the country must have been deplorable in the extreme. The outrages of the Borderers became so frequent and destructive that Angus was at length constrained to undertake an expedition to Liddesdale for their suppression. Some of the most notorious offenders were executed, and the chiefs of the border clans compelled to make their submission, and to give hostages for their future peaceable behaviour.† Angus next proceeded to the north for the purpose of composing a deadly feud which had raged for some years between the powerful families of Lesley and Forbes, and had plunged the districts of Mar, Garioch and Aberdeen into fierce contention and bloodshed.‡

While the more civilized provinces of the country —and of the Highlands. were thus frequently the scenes of rapine and slaughter, the Highlands, at all times in a lawless and barbarous condition, were now reduced to a state of almost total disorganization. 'Every man did that which was right in his own eyes,' without regard either to the decrees of the law or the authority of the government. Lauchlan Macintosh, the chief of the clan Chattan, 'a verrie honest and wyse gentleman,' as he is styled by Lesley, 'wha keptit his whole kin, friends and tenants in honest and guid rule,' was murdered by James Malcolmson, one of his principal kinsmen, for no other reason than that he had restrained the excesses of his vassals. The assassin fled for refuge to an island in the lake of Rothiemurchus, but his retreat was discovered, and he and his accomplices were summarily put to death by their infuriated clansmen. The infant son of the murdered chief was delivered to the custody of his uncle the Earl of Moray, and Heeter, a bastard brother of Lauchlan Macintosh, was appointed to lead the clan during the minority of his nephew. The new chieftain immediately demanded that the infant should be delivered up to him (for no good purpose it was believed), and enraged at Moray's refusal he mercilessly ravaged his lands, especially the parish of Dyke, in which the castle of Tarnaway, the chief seat of the earl, was situated, sparing neither men, women, nor children in his indiscriminate fury. The ferocious savage then proceeded to the castle of Pettie, belonging to Ogilvie of Durness, the kinsman of Moray, who had been entrusted by him with the keeping of the young heir of Macintosh, and carrying the fortalice by assault, he put to death twenty-four of its inmates. Vengeance, however, speedily overtook him; for Moray, who had procured a royal commission authorizing him to suppress these disorders, rapidly collected an army, and making a sudden onslaught upon the Macintoshes, defeated them with great slaughter. Three hundred of the principal depredators were captured and instantly hanged, but Hector himself made his escape, and neither tortures nor rewards could induce his clansmen to disclose the place of his concealment. His brother William, however, was taken prisoner and beheaded, while the chief, in despair, resolved at length to throw himself on the royal mercy; and, by the assistance of Alexander, Dean of Moray, succeeded in reaching the capital, where he was pardoned and restored to favour. But he was soon after slain in St. Andrew's by a priest named John Spence, who was executed for the crime, the motive of which is unknown.*

These scenes of violence and bloodshed, though they disturbed the tranquillity of the country, did not shake the government of Angus. He sedulously cultivated the friendship of the English court, and strengthened his party by an apparent reconciliation with Archbishop Beaton, whose great wealth and political experience rendered him a most valuable ally. Sir George Douglas in vain opposed this step, and warned his brother to be on his guard against the intrigues of the crafty prelate. The shrewd and sagacious Dr. Magnus, in a letter to Wolsey, expressed his conviction that the fatal effects of this course of policy would soon be perceived, and predicted the speedy overthrow of Angus, whom he characterizes as 'gentle and hardy, but wanting wit in the conveyance of great causes.'† Beaton was not slow to avail himself of the power which he had gained to promote the aggrandizement of the church, and the celebrated Patrick Hamilton, the proto-martyr of the Reformed Church of Scotland, fell a victim to the reconciliation which now took place between Angus and the primate. The condition of the people under the combined yoke of political and ecclesiastical despotism, seemed more hopeless than ever. The only safety lay in prompt submission. The queen-mother, alarmed, it is supposed, by an attempt on the part of Angus to deprive her of her dowry-lands, fled for refuge, along with her husband and his brother, into the castle of Edinburgh. But Douglas collected a large force, and, taking the young king with him, laid siege to the fortress, and summoned Margaret and her husband to surrender. As soon as the queen saw that her son was present with the besieging army, although she knew that he was hostile to their proceedings, she caused the gates of the castle to be thrown open, and, falling upon her knees before the king, she implored pardon for her husband and his brother, and refused to rise till the boon had been granted. But, in spite of her humble submission, they were committed to prison for a short time in the castle which she had just yielded.*

James had now entered his seventeenth year, and began to develop an energy of character, and a strength of natural talent, which rendered it highly improbable that he would submit much longer to be used as a puppet in the hands of a grasping and imperious faction. The thralldom of the Douglasses grew every day more hateful to him, and his mind became intently occupied with projects for his escape.

With this view, he prevailed on his mother to exchange with him her castle of Stirling for the royal demesne of Methven, to be conferred, along with a peerage, on her husband. Having thus secured a safe retreat, he committed this important fortress to the charge of a trusty governor, and probably with the assistance of Beaton, caused it to be garrisoned, and furnished with military stores and provisions. The king was now residing at Falkland, within a moderate distance of St. Andrews, so that it was easy for him to communicate with the crafty primate, of whose intrigues the Douglasses appeared to entertain no suspicion. James was apparently absorbed in the pleasures of the chase; and a long course of success, and the complete discomfiture of their enemies, had lulled his keepers into security, and thrown them off their guard. Angus had gone to Lothian on his private affairs; Archibald Douglas, his uncle, to Dundee; and Sir George Douglas, his brother, had paid a visit to St. Andrews, for the purpose of concluding some transactions with Beaton; so that only Douglas, of Parkhead, captain of the royal guard, remained with the king. The youthful monarch instantly resolved to avail himself of this favourable opportunity to escape; and to lay all suspicion asleep, he called for Balfour of Ferny, the keeper of Falkland forest, and chamberlain of Fife, and issued orders for a hunting party next morning. According to the graphic description of old Pitscottie † he "caused him to warn all the whole tenants and gentlemen thereabouts who had the speediest dogs, that they should come to Falkland wood on the morn, to meet him at seven hours; for he was determined he would slay a fat buck or two for his pleasure; and to that effect caused warn the cooks and stewards to make his supper ready, that he might go to his bed the sooner, and to have his dejune (breakfast) ready by four o'clock, and commanded James Douglas, of Pathhead, to pass the sooner to his bed, and caused bring his collation, and drank to James Douglas, saying to him, that he should have good hunting on the morrow, bidding him be early astir. Then the king went to his bed, and James Douglas thought that all things had been sure enough, and passed in like manner to his own bed. When the watch was set," continues the historian, "and all things in quietness, the king called on a yeoman of the stable, and desired him to bring one of his suits of apparel, hose, cloak, coat, and bonnet, and putting them on, stept forth as a yeoman of the stable, and was unperceived of the watchmen, till he had passed to the stables, and caused saddle a horse for himself, and one led, and took two servants with him, namely, Jocky Hart, a yeoman of the stable, and another secret-chamber boy, and leapt on a horse, and spurred hastily his journey to Stirling, and came there by the breaking of the day, over the bridge, which he caused to be closed behind him, that none without license might win that passage. After this, he passed the castle, and was received there by the captain, who was very glad of his coming, and prepared the castle with all things needful. Then he caused shut the gates, and let down the portecullis, and put the king in his bed to sleep, because he had ridden all that night." Having thus regained his liberty, James proceeded to act with great promptitude and vigour against those who had so long held him in bondage. He immediately summoned a council, which was attended by the Earls of Arran, Argyle, Moray, and Eglinton, with the Lords Evandale, Maxwell, Montgomery, and Sinclair, and issued a proclamation forbidding Angus or any of his adherents to approach within six miles of the court, under pain of treason.

Meanwhile, the flight of the king was still unknown to the Douglasses, who believed him secure in the palace of Falkland. Sir George Douglas, the master of the household, returned from St. Andrews at eleven o'clock on the preceding evening, and hearing from the guards that James was asleep, made no farther inquiries, but retired to his own chamber. Early next morning, a loud knocking awoke him, and Peter Carmichael, the Bailie of Abernethy, rushing in, asked him if he knew what the king was doing. 'He is still asleep in his own chamber,' replied Sir George. 'You are deceived,' exclaimed Carmichael; 'he passed the bridge of Stirling last night.' On hearing this, Douglas started up in haste, and ran to the king's chamber; and having in vain knocked for admittance, he burst open the door, and, to his consternation, discovered that the apartment was empty. Overwhelmed with apprehension and rage, he cried, 'Treason! the king is gone, and no man knows whither.' After a brief consultation, a messenger was despatched in haste to Tantallon, to convey to Angus the news of the king's escape. By this time Archibald Douglas had returned from Dundee, and within a few hours Angus himself arrived, in breathless haste, and without loss of time set out for Stirling, along with his brother and uncle, and attended by a slender retinue. But on their journey they were met by a herald bearing the royal proclamation, which interdicted their approach to court under pain of treason. Some of the Douglasses declared their determination to proceed in defiance of the royal mandate; but the earl and his brother were well aware that a single step forward would render them liable to the fearful penalties of treason, and place their lives and property at the mercy of the crown. Feeling that, at such a moment, resistance to the royal authority would entail upon them certain ruin, they resolved to obey the proclamation, and accordingly retreated to Linlithgow.*

James, thus freed from a degrading restraint to which he had long submitted with ill-concealed impatience, was at liberty to follow the natural bent of his character; and though at this period little more than sixteen years of age, he speedily displayed all the qualities of an able and popular sovereign. His personal appearance was dignified and prepossessing. Though not above the middle height, he was graceful, but robust in form, remarkable for agility, and capable of severe and continued exertion; while his handsome and expressive countenance conveyed the impression of high intelligence, combined with sweetness and generosity.

His mind, naturally acute and vigorous, had early excited the fears and redoubled the watchfulness of the faction who sought to enslave him; and the foreign ambassadors who visited the kingdom reported favourably of his dawning sagacity and prudence. In spite of the unfavourable circumstances under which his education had been conducted, and the efforts of the Douglasses to enervate his intellect by low and vicious pursuits, he had profited largely by the means of improvement within his reach. His acquaintance with the laws and institutions of his kingdom was profound and comprehensive, considering his years; and the decisions which he pronounced were in general characterized by a strict regard to justice, and an anxiety to promote the true interests of his subjects. Like his ancestor, James I., he cultivated the art of poetry; and though scarcely any of his pieces survive, contemporary authors speak of them in terms which, after all the allowance necessary in the circumstances, indicate their high excellence. In his own dress, the decorations of his palaces, and the public buildings which were reared by him, he displayed rather correctness of taste than profusion and splendour; and the beauty of the gold coins struck during his reign, together with the attention bestowed by him on the construction of the naval armament of the kingdom, which, during his minority, had become miserably inefficient, amply attest his appreciation of the elegant and useful arts. The character of James is said to have been sullied by two vices: a propensity to indulge in low amours, and a parsimony in his expenditure which bordered on avarice. The first is accounted for, and may be partly excused, by the vicious training of which he became in some degree the victim; and the second wears the aspect even of virtue, if it be regarded as an honest attempt to replenish his exchequer, which, in consequence of the profligacy of Angus, had become nearly exhausted; while the expenditure of the wealth which his prudence speedily amassed in the construction of princely edifices, and of an efficient navy, seems to exonerate him from the charge of a sordid love of money.

* Pitscottie, vol. ii. pp. 331—335. Lesley, p. 140.

The sterling qualities of the young monarch more than counterbalanced his vices in popular estimation. Brave, even to rashness, and indifferent to personal fatigue, he exposed his life and health without scruple in promoting the welfare of his kingdom; while his affable manners, the ease with which he could be approached by the humblest of his people, the patience with which he listened to their complaints, and the promptitude with which he redressed their grievances, the sympathy which he manifested for the poor and the oppressed, around whom the shield of his protection was instantly thrown, and the delight which he took in visiting the houses of the peasantry in disguise, that he might learn their habits and wrongs, acquired for him the name of 'The King of the Commons,' a title of which he was justly proud.*

The measures already taken by James to secure his liberty and vindicate his authority, were followed by others equally prompt and vigorous. He left Stirling, and proceeded to Edinburgh, accompanied by the Archbishop of Glasgow, the Bishops of Dunkeld, Aberdeen, Galloway, and Brechin, the Earls of Argyle, Arran, Rothes, and Bothwell, the Lords Maxwell, Evandale, Forbes, Seton, Home, and Yester, together with three hundred spearmen, the retainers of these dignitaries and nobles. Three days after his arrival in the capital, a proclamation was issued, declaring it treason for any subject to hold intercourse with Angus, his two brothers, and uncle, and requiring the departure from the city of any of their vassals before four o'clock on that day, on pain of instant death. At a subsequent meeting of council it was agreed that parliament should assemble on the second of September following, and meanwhile Gawin Dunbar, the Archbishop of Glasgow, and former preceptor of James, was appointed chancellor of the kingdom, in the place of Beaton, from whom Angus had wrested the seals, and who now, from age, was unfitted for the fatigues of office. Cairncross, Abbot of Holyrood, was made treasurer, and the privy seal was intrusted to the Bishop of Dunkeld, Lord Maxwell became Provost of Edinburgh, and commander of the city, and Patrick Sinclair was despatched to the English court, for the purpose of acquainting Henry with the recent proceedings, and the assumption of the supreme power by his nephew, and of removing any misunderstandings which might arise from the misrepresentations and plots of Angus.† James, though naturally indignant at the conduct of his uncle, who had scrupled at no means, however unworthy, to destroy the independence of Scotland, adopted the wise policy of disarming hostility for which he was ill-prepared, by a candid statement of the treasons of Angus, and by making overtures for a lasting peace between the two kingdoms.

† Pinkerton, vol. ii. p. 295.

The young monarch was now surrounded by those from whom he had been estranged by the jealousy and selfish ambition of the Douglasses. His mother, and her husband, Henry Stewart, now created Lord Methven, along with Maxwell and Buecleuch, enjoyed a large portion of his friendship; and the valour of Hamilton, the bastard son of Arran, in spite of his great crimes, gained him the royal favour and confidence. Though Angus was now stripped of his authority, his daring courage and extensive resources rendered him still an object of dread to the court; and so great were the apprehensions entertained of some sudden attempt on the king's person, that the nobles and their armed retainers mounted guard over the palace by day and night; and even the king himself, dressed in complete armour, became for one night captain of the watch.* After a few days, James returned to Stirling, and the nobles retired to their estates till the meeting of parliament, where measures for the public safety were to be formally arranged. On receiving intelligence of the decisive steps which had been taken by the king, Angus retired to the

His brothers, Archibald and Sir George Douglas, entered Edinburgh, and sought to create a diversion in his favour; but the terror of the royal vengeance was sufficient to prevent any manifestation of sympathy for the fallen chiefs, and they were attacked by Lord Maxwell, and compelled to seek safety in flight. There is reason to believe that the intentions of James towards the Douglasses were upon the whole lenient, and that the compliance of Angus with the injunction to retire beyond the Spey, and to surrender his brothers as hostages for his appearance at the approaching parliament,† would have been followed by the adoption of conciliatory measures; but the haughty tone which the earl assumed, and his treasonable attempts to regain the power he had lost, roused the indignation of the young monarch, and justified the most rigorous exercise of his authority.

Accordingly, in the meeting of parliament, which was held on the 2nd of September, Angus and his brothers were formally accused of high treason, before a jury consisting of six clerical dignitaries and five peers, and an act of attainder was passed against them, mainly on the ground of the illegal restraint in which Angus had held the person of the king.‡ The forfeited estates of the Douglasses were divided amongst the supporters of the royal authority, Argyle, Arran, Buecleuch, Maxwell, and Hamilton of Draphane, James retaining only the castle of Tantallon, and the superiority of the shire of Angus.§ The more difficult task of carrying the sentence into execution still remained, and the obstinacy and power of Angus enabled him for some time to baffle the efforts of his enemies, and seriously endanger the newly-acquired supremacy of the king. On the news of his attainder, the Earl left Tantallon for Coldingham abbey, a benefice held by his brother William, from which he could more readily cross the English border, if he should find himself unable to maintain his ground. After an abortive attempt at negotiation, James despatched a detachment of troops into Douglasdale, to besiege the castle of Douglas, while he followed in person with the main body of the army, consisting in all of eight thousand men. By the advice, however, of the peers who accompanied him, he was induced to delay his operations until the harvest was reaped; and he accordingly disbanded his forces, and returned to the capital. Scarcely had he retired, when Angus swept the country with his horsemen, and a party of the Douglasses daringly set fire to two villages on the road to Stirling, remarking with savage pleasantry, in allusion to the late escape of the king, that the light might serve him in his journey, if he set out before dawn. Irritated by these insults, James collected his troops, and proceeded to Coldingham, from which Angus retired on his approach. The custody of the abbey was committed to Lord Home, but on the same night Angus returned and drove out the royal troops from their newly-acquired possession, while the king himself fled in haste to Dunbar. Enraged at these failures, James now determined to reduce Tantallon, the chief stronghold of his enemy, and having collected an army of twelve thousand men, and a powerful train of artillery, brought from Dunbar and other fortresses, he sat down before the castle. After a siege of nearly twenty days, during which, in spite of all his efforts, he failed to make any impression on the sea-girt hold, he was compelled reluctantly to abandon the attempt; and, to add to his mortification, the detachment left to protect and bring off the artillery was suddenly attacked and routed by Angus, and David Falconer, captain of the royal guard, and esteemed one of the best naval officers in Scotland, was slain. The indignation of James was increased by the destruction of a richly-freighted vessel, which, having been stranded near Innerwick, was plundered by the Douglasses, and then abandoned to the peasantry, who, with ignorant wastefulness, used as fire-wood the cinnamon which formed part of the cargo.* On receiving intelligence of these disasters, the young monarch is said to have declared with an oath that, while he lived, the Douglasses should never find a resting-place in Scotland.† The task of driving the recusant faction from the kingdom having been declined by Bothwell, was ultimately assigned to the Earl of Argyle, who, with the assistance of the Homes, prosecuted the enterprise so vigorously, that Angus was compelled to fly into England.

During the whole of his treasonable proceedings, Douglas had maintained a close correspondence with Henry, urging the English monarch to send a strong body of troops to his assistance, or, in the event of failure, requesting an asylum in his kingdom. The conduct of the earl, however, had been so flagitious, that it was condemned even by the English envoys, and the amity of Scotland was so necessary to the safety of his own kingdom, now menaced by the ambitious designs of the Emperor Charles V., that Henry wisely declined any active interference in behalf of the banished faction; but he graciously received Angus at his court, admitted him into his privy council, and awaited the chances of diplomacy to secure his restoration to his honours and estates. Accordingly, when negotiations were commenced for a renewal of the treaty of peace between the two kingdoms, the English commissioners, Dr. Magnus and Sir Thomas Tempest, received instructions to make the amnesty of Angus an indispensable article in the agreement; and with the view of securing the compliance of the Scottish council, Magnus advanced to Berwick, where he entered into correspondence not only with the young king, but with the queen-mother, the Bishops of Dunkeld and Aberdeen, and Adam Otterburn, the king's advocate. These attempts, however, to procure the recal of the Douglases, were fruitless. James, in reply, professed his deep obligations to Henry for protection during the perils of his minority, intimated his willingness to become the ally of his uncle, in preference to Charles V., and, to prove his sincerity, offered a pacification for five years, instead of three, as was proposed; but he firmly declined any mediation in favour of Angus, whose life, however, though forfeited by numerous acts of treason, he promised to spare.* The answers transmitted by the Scottish council, and by the Bishops of Dunkeld and Aberdeen, were couched in similar terms; and though Wolsey is said to have shed tears of rage, and the English council were filled with indignation at these refusals, they were compelled to abandon the cause of Angus as hopeless. The banished earl was forced to remain for fifteen years an exile in England; nor was he permitted to return to his native country till after the death of James, when his diminished power and the altered state of parties, rendered his presence less formidable to the public tranquillity. A treaty of peace for five years was shortly after concluded between the two countries, and ratified on the fourteenth of December, 1528.

James was now at liberty to turn his attention to the internal condition of his kingdom, many districts of which had become completely disorganized during his minority. The border clans had resumed those habits of plunder and lawless violence which the vigorous measures of James IV. had to a great extent repressed; and their excesses were connived at by Angus, who overlooked their delinquencies in order that he might strengthen his own interests, by securing the support of the Border chiefs of England.* The scene of their forays was principally the opposite border, but not unfrequently the inland Scots were also heavy sufferers by the midnight incursions of these marauders. They affected to despise the treaties of peace which were formed between Scotland and England, declaring their independence of both James and Henry; and by their devastating inroads they perpetually endangered the pacific relations between the two kingdoms. To punish these turbulent chiefs was no easy task, as besides the number of their followers and the natural strength of their fastnesses, they were each protected by some one of the great Border barons, who profited largely by the fruits of their plunder. James, however, with characteristic promptitude and resolution, undertook the difficult task of repressing and punishing the depredations of these banditti. Having convened his council at Edinburgh, and represented the impossibility of preserving the tranquillity of the country, while the Borders remained in this disorganized state, he avowed his intention to reduce them to order, and then commanded the imprisonment of the Earl of Bothwell, Lord Home, Lord Maxwell, Scott of Buccleuch, Ker of Ferniehirst, and other powerful chiefs, whose interested opposition might have defeated his plans.† Having thus secured the principal abettors of the Border freebooters, he passed rapidly into the recesses of Eskdale and Teviotdale, with a force of eight thousand men, doing justice on various marauders as he proceeded. Execution of the Border freebooters. Cockburn of Hender- son, and Scott of Tushylaw, two notorious offenders, were arrested, and hanged before the gates of their own castles.‡ But the fate of Johnnie Armstrong, of Gilnockie, near Langholm, produced a deeper impression of terror, not unmingled with commiseration. This noted freebooter, ‡ Scott was so distinguished a freebooter that he was usually called the King of the Border. He was hanged upon an elm tree, which still exists among the ruins of his castle. It is called the 'gallows-tree,' and it is curious to observe, that along its principal branches there are yet visible a number of nicks or hollows, over which the ropes had been drawn wherewith Scott performed his numerous executions.—See Chambers' Picture of Scotland, vol. i. p. 166.

According to tradition, Cockburn was sitting at dinner when he was surprised by the king, and without ceremony led out and hanged over the gate of his own castle. While the execution was going forward his unhappy wife is said to have taken refuge in the recesses of the Dowden, a dell formed by a mountain torrent called the Henderland Burn, which passes near the site of the tower. A place termed the Lady's Seat is still shown, where she is said to have striven to drown, amid the noise of a water-fall, the shouts which announced the close of her husband's existence. This touching incident gave occasion to the simple and affecting ballad, entitled 'The Lament of the Border Widow.'—Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border, vol. iii. p. 94.

who levied black-mail from the inhabitants of an extensive district, comprehending even a portion of England, and is said to have spread the terror of his name almost as far as Newcastle, was generally popular throughout the western marches, both on account of the high courage and generous qualities which he exhibited, and of the exemption which his tributaries enjoyed from the exactions of other and less powerful thieves. On learning the approach of the royal cavalcade, the private advice of some courtiers, or, as others allege, a determination to brave it out before the king, induced Johnnie to present himself before James; and accompanied by forty-eight of his followers, richly arrayed in all the pomp of Border chivalry, the dauntless freebooter proffered his submission and entreated the royal grace for himself and his men. But Johnnie had entirely miscalculated the effect likely to be produced by the imposing appearance of his train, for James sternly refused to listen either to his excuses or offers of service. "When the king saw him," says Pitscottie,* "and his men so gorgeous in their apparel, and so many braw men under ane tyrant's command, he turned about his face, and said, 'What wants yon knave that a king should have?' and ordered him and his followers to instant execution." "But John Armstrong," continues this minute chronicler, "perceiving that the king kindled in fury against him, made great offers to the king: that he should sustain himself with forty gentlemen, ever ready at his service, on their own cost, without wronging any Scottishman: as, indeed, had never been his practice. Secondly, that there was not a subject in England, duke, earl, or baron, but within a certain day he should bring him to his majesty, either alive or dead." All was unavailing: James would listen to no offer, however great. At length, seeing no hope of favour, Johnnie said, very proudly, "It is folly to seek grace at a graceless face; but had I known this, I should have lived upon the Borders, in despite of King Harry and you both; for I know King Harry would down weigh my best horse with gold, to know that I was condemned to die this day." Johnnie and all his retinue were accordingly hanged on the trees of a little grove,† at a place called Carlinrig Chapel, about ten miles above Hawick, and were buried in a deserted church-yard, where their graves are still shown. The extent to which James carried his severity was, without doubt, excessive and cruel. But such was the terror which he thus struck into the Border marauders, that for a season he made 'the rush-bush keep the cow;' and, according to an old chronicler, "thereafter there was great peace and rest a long time, where through the king had great profit, for he had ten thousand sheep going in the Ettrick Forest, in keeping by Andrew Bell, who made the king as good count of them, as they had gone in the lands of Fife."

Having thus vindicated his authority, and repressed for a time the insubordination of the Border chiefs, James returned to Edinburgh; and on his arrival restored the imprisoned barons to freedom, with the exception of Bothwell, whose turbulent spirit and great influence rendered him peculiarly dangerous. Meanwhile in other parts of his dominions the fierce factions of the nobility, strengthened by the long minority, were producing continual broils. The Earl of Rebellion in the Caithness sought to detach the Orkneys.

Orkneys from Scotland, and erect them into an independent kingdom under his own sovereignty. With the assistance of Lord Sinclair, he led an army to these islands; but the inhabitants, during their fifty years' connection with Scotland, had become warmly attached to the Scottish cause, and under the leadership of James Sinclair, the governor, offered such a strenuous resistance, that the invaders were ultimately defeated, though not without great loss on both sides. The Earl of Caithness himself was slain, along with five hundred of his men, and the rest, including Lord Sinclair, were taken prisoners.* The western islands also continued to be the scenes of sanguinary contests between the Earl of Argyle and the M'Leans of Dowart. The chief of that powerful clan had married a sister of

State of the Isles.
Argyle, and either from the circumstance of their union proving unfruitful, or more probably, from some domestic quarrels, he caused his lady to be exposed on a lonely rock, near Lismore, which at high water was covered by the sea. From this perilous situation she was rescued and conveyed to her brother by the crew of a fishing boat, which happened to pass by the spot. Her wrongs were speedily avenged by her brother, Sir John Campbell, of Calder, who surprised M'Lean in his bed, during a visit to Edinburgh, and put him to death, though the chief had procured letters of protection, guaranteeing his safety.† This gross breach of faith roused the M'Leans to immediate revenge, and the conduct of Argyle having excited the animosity of some of the other islesmen, they combined their forces with those of the clan Ian Mhor, and led by Alexander, of Isla, wasted the possessions of the Campbells with fire and sword. Reprisals were immediately made by the vassals of Argyle, who laid waste great part of the Isles of Mull and Tyree, and the district of Morvern, so that the western highlands became in a short time almost completely disorganized. The measures adopted by the young monarch for the purpose of quieting these disaffected districts were characterized by great wisdom and moderation. He caused extensive preparations to be made for the purpose of reducing the rebellious chiefs to obedience; but he sought at the same time, by offers of forgiveness and promises of redress, to avert hostilities, and to win them back to their allegiance. The generosity and justice of the monarch completely disarmed the insurgents. Nine of the principal chiefs, with Hector McLean, of Dowart, hastened to tender their submission to the king, who immediately granted them letters of protection; and soon after John of Isla visited James at the palace of Stirling, and on expressing contrition for his offences, and promising to support the royal authority, to assist the king's chamberlain in collecting the crown rents, and to maintain the church in all her privileges,* was confirmed in his possessions, and restored to favour.

That the clemency of the king did not originate in weakness, and that relentless animosity might be engrafted on a character naturally generous, was sufficiently evinced by his conduct in one memorable instance, which occurred about the same period. Archibald Douglas, of Kilspindie, uncle to the banished Earl of Angus, had been driven into exile along with the rest of his family. Remarkable for his great strength and skill in martial exercises, he had early attracted the notice, and won the affection of James, who called him his 'Graystiel,' after a renowned champion, in the romance of 'Sir Egar and Sir Grime.' Weary at length of exile, and seized with irrepressible longings for home, the aged warrior recollecting the king's personal attachment to him, determined to return to his native land, and to cast himself on the royal clemency. As James was returning from hunting in the park of Stirling, the banished baron threw himself in his way; but the monarch, mindful of his oath, that while he lived no Douglass should find a refuge in Scotland, passed hurriedly on without any sign of recognition, and though Kilspindie, in spite of the heavy armour which he wore under his clothes for fear of assassination, ran by the side of the king's horse to the castle gate, he failed to move the purpose of his implacable master. He sat down at the gate weary and exhausted, and asked for a draught of water; but even this was refused by the royal attendants. The king afterwards blamed their discourtesy, but Kilspindie was obliged to return to France, where he shortly after died of a broken heart. This pitiless display of rigour to a man who had never personally injured him is a serious blot on the character of the monarch, and called forth the condemnation even of his vindictive uncle, Henry VIII., who quoted the saying, 'a king's face should give grace.†

At this period a league with Scotland became a matter of importance alike to the Matrimonial negotiation. Emperor Charles V. and the kings of France and England, who had combined to resist his ambitious views. Both parties were eager to form a matrimonial alliance with the Scottish monarch, with the view of securing his co-operation in the event of a struggle; and Henry, by his ambassadors, had already offered his daughter, the Princess Mary, as the bride of James. Charles, on the other hand, jealous of the power which so near a connexion with the Scottish king might give to his enemies, proposed his sister, the Queen of Hungary. James, who was not indifferent to the advantages of this alliance, sent letters to Albany, then residing at the court of Francis I., urging him to secure the consent of that monarch to the completion of the match. But Albany ungenerously betrayed the plan to the English council,* who resolutely opposed the union, as dangerous to the league between France and England; and as the lady herself preferred the opulent and independent government of the Netherlands, to which, on the death of her aunt, she was likely to succeed, the proposal was speedily abandoned. Charles showed his anxiety for an alliance with the Scottish monarch by offering next his niece, a daughter of Christian II., the deposed king of Denmark, with a dowry of the whole of Norway. But as James was already the ally of Frederick, the reigning monarch of Denmark, and would, moreover, have required to win by the sword the distant and barren portion of his proposed bride, he prudently declined the connexion. Foiled in his attempts to secure a matrimonial alliance, Charles, who, notwithstanding the recent peace of Cambrai, anticipated war with Francis and Henry, sought to form a league, offensive and defensive, with Scotland; but as there was no advantage to be gained by the friendship of so remote a power as Austria, which could compensate for the sacrifice of the ancient amity of France, and the risk of war with England, James firmly declined the proposals of the emperor, who was reluctantly compelled to abandon in the meantime all attempts to secure the co-operation of Scotland in his plans.

James now proceeded to correct those evils in his kingdom which the long minority had fostered, as well as to provide for its future prosperity. In a parliament which assembled at Edinburgh on the 26th of April, some severe laws were passed against the crimes of assassination and robbery, which the annals of his times exhibit as of fearful frequency. Sir James Inglis, Abbot of Culross, had been murdered in the preceding month by the Baron of Tulliallan and his followers, among whom was a priest named Lothian. The chief criminals managed for a time to escape, but were ultimately captured by the vigour of the government, and the priest, after being solemnly degraded from his office, was, along with his lay accomplice, publicly beheaded.† An important commercial treaty between Scotland and the Netherlands, which had been concluded by James I. for one hundred years, was about to expire; and as the alliance had been productive of great benefit to the kingdom, James despatched Sir John Campbell of Lundie, Sir David Lindsay of the Mount, Lion King-at-arms, with David Panter as Secretary of legation, to Brussels, with proposals for the renewal of the league. The Scottish envoys were received with distinguished respect, both by the Queen of Hungary, who had now assumed the prefecture of the Netherlands, and by the Emperor Charles V., who was at that time resident at her court, and returned, after having renewed the treaty between the two countries for another century.*

As his experience increased, James was naturally led to seek aid in the internal administration of his kingdom, from those whose wisdom and long-trying fidelity justified his confidence. The breach between him and his nobles had been gradually widening. Their ignorance, ferocity, and open combinations to control or resist the authority of the crown, not only incapacitated them for any share in the government, but rendered them its worst and most powerful foes. James therefore not only relinquished those friendships, which the necessities of his position or the inexperience of his character had led him at the outset of his reign to form with some of the greater barons, but proceeded firmly to punish, without respect of persons, all who presumed to infringe the laws. Angus had been banished, Crawford was stripped of the greater portion of his estates, Argyle was imprisoned, Moray and Maxwell remained unnoticed, and Sir James Hamilton, who, in spite of his flagitious crimes, had hitherto enjoyed the royal confidence, was now treated with coldness and distrust. As the influence of the feudal aristocracy declined, that of the clergy steadily increased, and the principal counsellors of the crown were chosen from among the dignitaries of the church. Dunbar, Archbishop of Glasgow; the Chancellor, James Beaton, Archbishop of St. Andrews; and his nephew, David Beaton, Lord Privy Seal—enjoyed the chief share of the royal confidence and favour; and though the influence of this intimacy was afterwards prejudicial to the spread of the Protestant faith, it was justified by the position of the youthful monarch, and proved meanwhile most beneficial to the kingdom. The nobles viewed their waning influence with alarm, and sought to recover their ascendancy by measures which it required all the wisdom and vigour of James to defeat. Bothwell, whose turbulent conduct had been punished by temporary imprisonment, passed at this time into the north of England; and having obtained an interview with the Earl of Northumberland, he endeavoured to enlist that nobleman, and through him the English monarch, in treasonable designs against the authority of his sovereign. After enumerating his own grievances, and representing James as in league with the worst foes of Henry,

he intimated that the time was favourable for an invasion of Scotland, where the nobles, exasperated by the tyranny of the king, were, he alleged, ripe for rebellion; and offered his own allegiance and services, with those of one thousand gentlemen and six thousand commoners, to aid any English force which, in conjunction with the Douglasses, might attempt the conquest of the northern kingdom. He had no doubt, he said, that with his own power and that of the Earl of Angus, he would, if properly supported, be able to crown the English monarch within the town of Edinburgh in a short time.* These base and treasonable negotiations were happily discovered by James, who, on the return of Bothwell to Scotland, ordered his immediate arrest and imprisonment; but though his traitorous journey failed in its main object, it was not without influence in renewing the Border wars, which broke out shortly afterwards with a ferocity that threatened the general peace of the two kingdoms.

In the early part of the following year an important change was introduced in the Institution of the settlement of civil causes, by the College of Justice. the institution of the College of Justice, which is generally said to have been framed after the model of the parliament of Paris. Before the establishment of this new court, civil causes were determined by standing committees, consisting of the chancellor and certain members chosen by the king from each of the three Estates, who sat thrice in the year, at such places as the king should appoint. "The plan," as Pinkerton remarks, "was attended with many inconveniences: the expense to which the members were exposed rendered them reluctant in performing this duty, and precipitant in its accomplishment. And the deputies of the commons being annually changed, if a suit were prolonged, the change of judges, who were again to be instructed in the whole of the procedure, rendered the embarrassment and protraction extreme; not to mention that perhaps none of the members except the clergy were conversant in the laws."† Many serious evils also resulted from the heritable jurisdiction of the barons who held courts of their own, the decisions of which were often grossly partial; while relief could only be obtained by the tedious and expensive process of an appeal to the king and the privy council. To remedy these evils, the parliament which met at Edinburgh on the 17th of May, 1532, instituted a new court, consisting of fourteen members, one-half selected from the clergy, the other from the laity, with a president, who was always to be a clergyman. Its jurisdiction embraced all causes except those which belonged to the privy council and high court of justiciary, and its annual expenses were ordered to be defrayed from the revenues of the clergy. The avowed object of the new court was to simplify the administration of justice, and to protect the humbler classes from the oppression of the nobles; nor can it be doubted that it was in many respects an improvement on the cumbrous legal machinery of former times; but its benefits were exposed to constant hazard by one unfortunate regulation, which provided that the chancellor might preside when he pleased, and that in the settlement of any question of importance or difficulty, the king might send three or four members of his privy council to influence the deliberations. It was thus a ready-made and formidable weapon in the hands of a despotic monarch; nor are the strictures of Buchanan on its servility,—even making allowance for his Protestant leanings,—to be regarded as partial or unjust, supported as they are by many oppressive acts in this and the following reign.*

In spite of his pacific policy, James speedily found himself engaged in a harassing and pitiless

Border war. contest with England. The charge of aggression seems clearly brought home to his enemies. The representations of Bothwell as to the state of feeling in Scotland, and his promises of aid to an invading force, excited among the banished Douglasses the hope of regaining their ascendancy; and though Henry made no formal declaration of war, and even affected to regard the renewal of hostilities between the two countries as an untoward event, there is reason to conclude from the correspondence of Northumberland, that he secretly encouraged the inroad in the expectation of forcing James to renounce his connexion with the pope and the emperor.† A large English force, led by Sir Anthony Darcy and Sir George Douglas, marched from Berwick, and after burning Coldingham, Dunglas, and other towns and villages in the neighbourhood, returned loaded with plunder. On the other hand, the Scots broke across the border, and set fire to a village near Warkworth, the seat of Northumberland, who dressed himself at midnight by the blaze of burning houses.‡ The Earl threatened Kelso with a similar fate, that no place near the Border might remain to hold a Scottish garrison; but though this design failed, he detached sixteen hundred men, who burned Branxholm, the seat of Buccleuch, and, amid the sight of flaming villages, carried off a number of prisoners, and a large booty of horses and cattle. James prepared to resist this sudden inroad, though the condition of his kingdom was far from satisfactory. Argyle and Crawford, two potent nobles, had been deprived of their command in the Isles, and were ready to aid the treasonable proceedings of Bothwell and the Douglasses;§ while a great portion of the clergy had become discontented in consequence of an attempt to raise from their dioceses

a tax of ten thousand crowns within the period of one year. The refusal of parliament to sanction an impost for the maintenance of three thousand men in the Border garrisons, increased the king's embarrassment; but his measures, notwithstanding these difficulties, were prompt and vigorous. The Earl of Moray was appointed lieutenant-general of the kingdom, and the military array of the country was divided into four parts, to each of which in turn the defence of the marches was entrusted for forty days;¶ while, to secure the hearty co-operation of the Border chiefs, an amnesty was proclaimed for all previous offences. McLan, who had gained the confidence of the king by his valour and fidelity, was despatched with seven thousand Highlanders to Ireland, that he might assist O'Donnel, the Irish chief, in his efforts to free that country from the yoke of England. The Scots now poured across the Border, and retaliated on their foes by devastation and plunder. Buccleuch, Ferniehirst, and Cessford compelled the English forces to retire, and after an inroad of unexampled ferocity returned loaded with booty. As the war advanced, the passions of the combatants became more exasperated, and their inroads more frequent and destructive. Nor did the rigours of winter produce any abatement in the savage strife. The contest had now raged for nearly a year, and Henry, at length convinced that neither honour nor profit was to be gained by its continuance, became anxious that it should cease. In an embassy to Francis, his ally, he detailed the inroads of the Scots, whom he stigmatized as the aggressors, and threatened to chastise them by an immediate declaration of war. Francis despatched an envoy to Scotland, with the view of mediating between the two sovereigns; but his interference was rejected by James, who was justly displeased at the preference which the French king had of late given to the interests of England over those of Scotland, the ancient ally of his kingdom. Beauvois, a second envoy from Francis, found the Scottish monarch more accommodating. He consented to a truce with England, and shortly after appointed Sir James Colville ^{Truce} with England and Adam Otterburn to meet with Magnus and the other English commissioners at Newcastle, with the view of arranging the conditions of a satisfactory peace. Negotiations accordingly commenced; but, in consequence of unforeseen difficulties, they were protracted till the month of October.‡

The war still continued to rage on the Borders, where, properly speaking, peace scarcely ever prevailed; but although the conduct of the English monarch towards his nephew was calculated to provoke his warmest resentment, James was well aware that it was for the interest of his kingdom to put a stop to hostilities with England, even at some sacrifice of personal feeling; and accordingly despatched the Bishop of Aberdeen and Sir Adam Otterburn to the English court, with full powers to conclude a lasting pacification. After some negotiations at London with the English commissioners, Secretary Cromwell and Dr. Fox, a treaty of peace was concluded, which was to continue during the lives of the two monarchs, and for a year after the death of him who first deceased. It was agreed that the Border fortalice of Edrington, which had fallen into the hands of the Douglasses since their banishment, should be restored to the Scots; while on the other hand, James consented that Angus, with his brother and uncle, should be permitted to reside in England, as the subjects of Henry. The treaty was concluded on the twelfth of May, 1534, and speedily ratified by both monarchs, with more than usual solemnity.* The Order of the Garter was soon after transmitted to James, by the hands of Lord William Howard, brother of the Duke of Norfolk; while the Emperor Charles the Fifth bestowed upon him the order of the Golden Fleece,† and Francis the First requested his acceptance of that of St. Michael.

James being thus freed, by the conclusion of peace with England, from the apprehension of external hostilities, turned his attention to the negotiation of a matrimonial alliance. His marriage was earnestly desired, both by his councillors and the great body of his subjects. He was the last of his line, and frequently exposed himself to imminent danger in the suppression of disturbances, and the apprehension of the lawless banditti who infested the remote districts of the country;‡ and at other times he hazarded his person less justifiably in private and nocturnal adventures, which he undertook from the love of enterprise and intrigue. The dagger of an assassin, or an accidental blow in a midnight brawl, might have exposed the kingdom to all the perils of a vacant throne and a disputed succession. Some overtures had already been made to the French king, for a matrimonial alliance between James and his daughter Magdalene; but the tender years and delicate health of that princess prevented the completion of the union at this time. The Emperor Charles V. having heard of this negotiation, endeavoured to induce the Scottish monarch to abandon the French alliance, by offering him in marriage his own niece, the Princess Mary of Portugal; but the proposal was courteously declined.

In the meantime the principles of the Reformation had been steadily making progress among the people of Scotland, and now began to excite great alarm among the Roman Catholic clergy. But although the king was fully aware of the idleness, ignorance, and dissolute lives of a large portion of the clergy, and had become convinced of the necessity for a reform in the general morals of this body, he was not prepared to imitate the conduct of his uncle in shaking off the yoke of Rome. Unhappily for himself, in spite of his hatred to the Douglasses, he adopted the policy of Angus towards the reformers, and commenced a fierce persecution against those whom he doubtless esteemed the enemies of the truth. Several of the disciples of the Reformation were condemned for heresy, and brought to the stake. Some, terrified by the threats of tortures and death, submitted to make a public recantation of their opinions; and a number more were compelled, by the intolerant and cruel conduct of the king, to flee for safety to England.* They received a cordial welcome from Henry VIII., who had now entirely renounced the authority of the papal see, and used every effort to induce his nephew to follow his example. In order to open his eyes to the tyranny of the papal usurpations, he sent to James a work entitled, 'Embassy from England. The Doctrine of a Christian Man,' in which the superstitions of the Romish church were exposed; and despatched successively Dr. Barlow, his chaplain, and Lord William Howard, to request a conference with his royal nephew at York, for the purpose of discussing matters of the greatest importance to the welfare of both countries. According to the Scottish historians, the English envoys were instructed to make the most splendid offers to induce him to comply with his uncle's wishes.† But James, though anxious to maintain amicable relations with his powerful and imperious relative, did not wish, in present circumstances, to draw these ties closer. He therefore declined to accept of the treatise which Henry had sent him, acting, it was supposed, by the advice of his clerical counsellors, whom Barlow describes as 'the pope's pestilent creatures, and very limbs of the devil.‡' James himself, he says, was of an excellent and generous disposition, but his ecclesiastical council was decidedly hostile to England. The royal chaplain, who was a persuasive preacher, was instructed by his master to display his eloquence before the Scottish king, if he could obtain permission; but the clergy shut up all the pulpits against him. James had at first consented to the proposal of a conference, through the importunity of the queen dowager;§ but this

§ The reappearance of Margaret on the political stage on this occasion shows that she still retained her old habits of treachery and intrigue. She had contrived to elicit from the king some information respecting the secret orders which he had given to his ambassador, Sir Adam Otterburn, then resident at Hampton Court, how he was not to agree to Henry's 'new constitution of religion,' and that he meant to change the place of the proposed conference from York to Newcastle, 'on account of the free sea adjacent.' She immediately wrote down an account of all that James had told her in confidence, and transmitted it by express to her brother. Her base treachery was speedily discovered, and naturally excited the king's severe displeasure. Dr. Barlow, in a letter to his master, states that the queen 'was then in high displeasure with King James, he bearing her in hand, or accusing her of receiving gifts from her brother to betray him, with many other unkind suspicious words.' (State Papers, vol. v. p. 47.) Shortly after, when Margaret was renewing her importunities, that James should accede step was strenuously opposed by the Hamiltons, who, after the Duke of Albany (now advanced in years and childless), were the next heirs to the throne, and were therefore unwilling that the king should marry at all; and by the clergy, who dreaded that the influence of Henry might induce their sovereign to throw off the dominion of the Romish Church. They represented to him the danger of placing himself in the power of a monarch whose ancestors had frequently acted with bad faith towards the kings of Scotland. Two aged prelates, James Beaton, Archbishop of St. Andrews, and George Crichton, Bishop of Dunkeld, implored the king with tears not to abandon the religion of his fathers, and solemnly warned him that the overthrow of the church was certain to be followed by the ruin of the kingdom; and as a last resource, the clergy bestowed lavish bribes on those courtiers who possessed the greatest influence over the king, that they might dissuade him from the dreaded interview.*

The king himself appears to have lent a willing ear to these interested representations. It was impossible but that he must have been displeased with the violent and dictatorial manner of the English monarch, the countenance he had given to the banished house of Douglas, and the intrigues which he had carried on with the discontented portion of the Scottish nobles. James must also have been well aware, that by renouncing the authority of the Pope, and confiscating the property of the church, he would inevitably forfeit the friendship of France and the other continental powers, and place himself wholly in the hands of a monarch whose haughty and imperious disposition rendered the maintenance of amicable relations with him an exceedingly difficult task. The proposed conference was therefore indefinitely postponed, and the matrimonial negotiation fell to the ground. Soon after, an embassy consisting of David Beaton, the Laird of Erskine, and Sir David

Lindsay, was despatched to the French court, for the purpose of forming a treaty of marriage between the Scottish king and Marie de Bourbon, the eldest daughter of the Duke of Vendôme, the first prince of the blood royal of France. Francis was eager to promote the match, and offered to declare the lady his adopted daughter, and to endow her with a portion of a hundred thousand crowns; and in spite of the opposition of England and Spain, and the intrigues of the Hamiltons, the negotiations proceeded so far, that not only was the assent of the French monarch signified by to his uncle's request for an interview, he sternly answered, 'If your brother means, by your aid, to betray me, I had liefer (rather) it were done while I am in mine own realm than in England.' The fidelity of Otterburn himself was not proof against the bribes of Henry. He had long been in the habit of furnishing secret information to the English court, and was afterwards imprisoned for a secret negotiation with the Douglasses.

letters under the great seal,* but a portion of the lady's dowry was paid down beforehand.

In the autumn of this year, Clement VII. died, and was succeeded in the papal chair by Paul III. The new pontiff feeling satisfied that the breach between Henry and the court of Rome was now irreparable, prepared a bull excommunicating the English monarch and his abettors, declaring him to have forfeited his crown, absolving his subjects from their oaths of allegiance, and commanding them to take up arms against him. He at the same time declared, that all the treaties and alliances of Henry with Christian princes were dissolved, and laboured earnestly to form a coalition against him, as the common enemy of Christendom. With the view of confirming James in his allegiance to the papal see, and inducing him to join the alliance against his imperious neighbour, the pontiff despatched his legate, Antonio

Visit of the papal legate to Scotland.

Campeggio, into Scotland, with instructions to depict, in the darkest colours, the conduct of the English king, his divorce, his scandalous marriage with Anne Boleyn, his separation from the church of Rome, and his cruel execution of Fisher and Sir Thomas More, for their refusal to acknowledge his supremacy in spiritual matters. At the same time the papal legate addressed the Scottish king by the title of Defender of the Faith, of which Henry had proved himself unworthy, and presented to him a cap and a sword, which had been consecrated by the Pope at the Feast of the Nativity, with an intimation that the weapon might be most appropriately wielded against the English heresiarch. Permission was also granted to James to levy an additional contribution upon his clergy, which was probably not one of the least powerful of the inducements held out by the legate to confirm the Scottish monarch in his attachment to the papal court.†

Meanwhile the Scottish king became impatient at the obstacles which were interposed to his marriage, principally to his unwillingness on the part of Francis to give offence to Henry VIII., who, he was aware, was intent upon accomplishing an alliance with Scotland, and adopted the romantic resolution to pay a visit in disguise to the court of his intended father-in-law, in order to obtain a view of the lady for whom he was in treaty, and to obviate the difficulties which had delayed the match. Having made the necessary preparations with the utmost secrecy, he embarked at Leith, on the 26th of July, with a slender retinue of nobles and knights, without informing any person either of the object or the destination of his voyage. It was supposed by some that he intended to proceed to the English court; but this illusion was speedily dissipated; for when the vessel in which he had embarked got out to sea, it encountered a severe gale, and the pilot inquiring what course they should steer, the reply of the king was, 'Land me on any coast except England.' When the royal purpose was understood, it proved so unsatisfactory to the nobles, that after the king fell asleep, they resolved to alter the course of the vessel, and to carry him back to Scotland; and Sir James Hamilton taking upon himself the responsibility of the deed, seized the helm, and put about the ship. When the king awoke and found himself once more close to the Scottish coast, he was so much displeas'd, that he threatened to hang the captain; and according to Buchanan, he was never completely reconciled to the nobles who had thus sought to frustrate his plans, vowing that 'if he lived he should remember and reward them for their good-will.*

But James, with characteristic tenacity of purpose, adhered to his design in spite of the interested opposition of a portion of his nobility; and as his intention had now become known, he resolved to make suitable preparations for his romantic expedition. A regency was appointed, consisting of the Archbishops of St. Andrews and Glasgow, with the Earls of Eglinton, Huntley, and Montrose, and Lord Maxwell, who were empowered to conduct the affairs of the kingdom during the absence of their sovereign; and James, after performing a pilgrimage on foot from Stirling to the Chapel of our Lady of Loretto, near Musselburgh, and offering up prayers for a prosperous voyage, sailed a second time from Leith, with a fleet of seven vessels, accompanied by the Earls of Argyll, Arran, Rothes, the Lords Fleming and Maxwell, the Abbot of Arbroath, the Prior of Pittenweem, and other nobles and dignitaries, with about three or four hundred attendants. On the tenth day they landed at Dieppe; and the king having resolved, before proceeding to Paris, to obtain a view of his affianced bride, repaired in disguise to the ducal chateau of Vendôme, and mingled with the crowd of attendants and spectators who filled the lower end of the hall during a public fête. He was speedily recognised, however, by his resemblance to a miniature portrait which the princess had procured from Scotland. "Wherefore," says Pitscottie, "she past to her coffer, and took out his picture which she had gotten out of Scotland by some secret means; and as soon as she looked upon the picture it made her know the king inccontinent, where he stood among the rest of the company, and she past pertly to him, and took him by the hand, and said, 'Sir, you stand over far aside, therefore, if it please your Grace to talk with my father or me, as you think for the present, a while for your pleasure, you may if you will.'" James being thus discovered, was forthwith introduced to the Duke and his court, by whom he was received with great cordiality. "Then," continues the chronicler, "there was nothing but merriness, banqueting, and great cheer, with music and playing on instruments, and all other kind of pastime for the fields, with lutes, shawms, trumpets, and organs; jousting and running of great horses, whilk pastimes were all to delight the King of Scotland. For the duke prepared ane fair palace to the king, decorated with all costlie ornaments. The walls thereof were hung with tapestry of gold, and wrought with silk; the floor laid over with green frieze; a pall (a state canopy) of gold set with precious stones was placed over the king's head when he sat at meat, and the halls and chambers were perfumed with sweet odours, very delectable to the senses of men. In spite, however, of all these honours which the duke paid to his royal guest, and the love tokens which passed between the king and the young lady, who is said to have been deeply captivated by his handsome appearance and gallant accomplishments,† the marriage treaty was ultimately broken off; and James transferred his addresses to the Princess Magdalene, the beautiful daughter of Francis, for whose hand he had already made repeated overtures to her father. Magdalene is said, by the French historians, to have fallen in love with the Scottish monarch at first sight; and although Francis earnestly dissuaded the match, on account of the extreme delicacy of his daughter's constitution, her physicians having assured him 'that she was not strong enough to travel to a colder climate than her own, and that if she did, her days would not be long'—the youthful lovers turned a deaf ear to his remonstrances, and their nuptials were solemnized with unusual splendour, on the first of January, 1537, in the cathedral of Notre Dame. The president and members of the parliament of Paris, clad in scarlet robes, went in state to offer a congratulatory address to the Scottish king, and then headed the procession which preceded that monarch in his state entrance into the capital, as the affianced husband of the Princess Magdalene—an honour which had never before been paid to any foreign prince or potentate.‡ At the celebration of the marriage the Kings and Queens of France and Navarre, the Dauphin of France, the Duke of Orleans, and other French nobles, with a deputation from the Scottish nobility, and many illustrious foreigners, † Francis attempted to compensate the Lady of Vendôme for her disappointment, by offering her another consort of suitable rank, but she declined all matrimonial overtures and retired into a convent.

‡ The parliament strongly objected to this unusual proceeding, and entreated Francis to consider well the bad consequences that might result from such an innovation upon their ancient customs. They also protested against any alteration in the costume of the parliament, and spent nearly a week in debating on this matter before they would submit to the royal pleasure.—See Lives of the Queens of Scotland, vol. i. pp. 303, 304. It is mentioned in the ancient account of the proceedings that James did not make any speech in reply to the complimentary address of the president, 'because he knew so little of the French language.'

surrounded the altar, and seven cardinals assisted at the ceremonial.* "There was never sic (such) solemnitie," says Pitseottie, "nor sic nobilitie seen in France in one day, as was at that time there. For through all France that day there was jousting and tournaments, with all other manly exercises, as also skirmishing of ships through all the coasts and firths; so that in towns, lands, seas, villages, castles and towers, there was no man that might have heard for the reard (roaring) and noise of cannons and other munitions, nor scarcely have seen for the vapours thereof. There was also within the town of Paris cunning carvers and profound negromancers, who by their art caused things appear which were not; dragons flying in the air, spouting fire on others; rivers of water running through the town, and ships fighting thereupon, as it had been in bullering streams of the sea, shooting of guns like cracks of thunder; and these wonders were seen both by the nobility and common people.†" The Scottish king and his youthful queen remained at her father's court until the spring; and such was the influence which James possessed with his father-in-law, that he is said to have disposed of civil and ecclesiastical preferments, and to have dispensed pardons to prisoners as freely as if he had been in his own kingdom; for Francis could refuse him nothing, and was entirely guided by his wishes.

Meanwhile his own subjects having become impatient under the protracted absence of their sovereign, which had now extended to nearly nine months, preparations were made for the departure of the royal couple. An application to the English monarch for permission to pass through his dominions was discourteously refused, partly, it appears, from the dissatisfaction felt by Henry at the refusal of his request for the pardon of the Douglasses, and partly from unwillingness to incur the expense of entertaining his nephew in a manner suitable to their return to his rank.‡ James was therefore Scotland. compelled to return by sea; and having embarked at Dieppe, after a stormy passage§

§ The vessel which carried the royal couple was compelled to anchor for some time off Scarborough, in consequence of the violence of the wind, and many of the inhabitants of the Yorkshire coast came out in boats to see the Scottish king, some of whom, it appears, went down on their knees to James, entreating him to enter England with an army to deliver them from the tyranny of Henry. The Duke of Norfolk, who had come to Scarborough, apparently with the hope that the stormy weather would compel the royal voyagers to land on the English coast, where there can be no doubt they would have been made prisoners, says in a letter to Cromwell, "If God had sent such good fortune that the King of Scots had landed in these parts, I would so honestly have handled him, that he and his bride should have drunk my wine at Sheriffe-Hutton before he had returned to Scotland. I was in some hope of this, for the wind was very straineable on Wednesday morning."—Norfolk to Cromwell, dated Bridlington, May 18th, 1537; Lives of the Queens of Scotland, vol. i. p. 317.

he arrived with his bride at Leith, on the nineteenth of May. They were received with great rejoicings by an immense concourse of all classes of the community, who came to welcome their sovereign home, and to see their new queen. As soon as she landed, Magdalene knelt down upon the ground, and 'kissed the moulds thereof,' whilst she returned thanks to God for having brought the king and her safely through the seas, and prayed for the happiness of her new country: an incident which seems to have greatly endeared her to the affections of the Scottish people.* Preparations were commenced on a scale of great magnificence for the coronation of the young queen, which was intended to be a day of gladness and festivity throughout the whole realm.† But scarcely had the rejoicings for her arrival ceased, when it became apparent that Magdalene was sinking under that insidious malady the seeds of which she had long carried in her constitution; young queen.

and to the inexpressible grief of her husband and the whole nation, she expired on the tenth of July, before she had completed her seventeenth year. Brantome states that "she was very deeply regretted, not only by James V., but by all his people, for she was very good, and knew how to make herself truly beloved. She had a great mind, and was most wise and virtuous." "All the great triumph and joy of her coming," says Pitseottie, "was turned to dolor and lamentation, and all the play that should have been made, was turned into soul masses and dirges; and such mourning throughout the country, and lamentation, that it was great pity for to see; and also the king's heavy moan that he made for her was greater than all the rest." She was interred with great pomp in the royal vault, in the Abbey of Holyrood, near the coffin of James II., and her epitaph was composed in elegant Latin verse, by the celebrated George Buchanan; and her untimely death occasioned the first general mourning ever worn in Scotland.‡

open maintenance of Angus and his brothers at the English court, and his ungenerous refusal to allow the Scottish king and his bride to pass through England on their return to their own country. Carrying out the base policy invented by Lord Daere, of sowing disunion and treachery amongst the Scottish nobles, by means of an organized system of corruption and bribery, Henry had sent into Scotland Sir Ralph Sadler, an able and crafty diplomatist, who continued for the long period of half a century to exert an injurious influence on the affairs of the northern kingdom. Sadler was instructed to communicate with the queen-mother, to gain over the nobility to the English interest, to sound the inclinations of the body of the people on the subject of peace and war, and to ascertain the sentiments generally entertained respecting the secession of Henry from the Papal see.* He found

State of parties in Scotland. Margaret eagerly prosecuting a suit of divorce against Lord Methven, her third husband; whom she accused of wasting her estates, and burdening them with debts. She was as ready as ever to betray the counsels of the government, and to lend herself to the treacherous intrigues of her brother's agents; but her venality and falsehood, together with her unblushing profligacy, had completely destroyed her influence. The council of regency, according to Sadler, was entirely devoted to the interests of the Romish see, and had artfully fomented hostile feelings towards England in the minds of the people, as the most effectual means of arresting the progress of the reformed opinions. The knowledge of these intrigues doubtless helped to alienate the feelings of the Scottish king from his selfish and unprincipled Policy of James. relative, and to dispose him to join in the league which the Pope was labouring to form against Henry as the common enemy of the faith. His close alliance with Francis, whom the violence and haughtiness of the English monarch had once more estranged—the influence of his clerical councillors, who dreaded the extension of the Reformation into Scotland, and his displeasure at the favour shown to the banished Douglasses, all combined to render an open rupture with England by no means improbable. An order was issued for supplying the people with arms and defensive armour, and the king laid out the greater part of his revenue in military preparations, and especially in strengthening the fortresses of Tantallon and Dunbar, and providing them with an adequate train of artillery. It is stated by Sir Thomas Clifford, in a letter to Henry, dated 26th July, 1537, that for a month past James had, at least twice in the week, secretly repaired to Dunbar at midnight, with a train of only six persons, and after remaining there a day or two, returned also by night. He adds, that the Scottish artillery was in a high state of efficiency, as the king devoted to it his whole attention; and that Berwick, from the ruinous condition of its fortifications, was exposed to imminent danger.† The insurrection which had recently broken out in the northern districts of England, in consequence of the suppression of the monasteries, as well as the hostile league now forming against Henry on the Continent, gave greater significance to these warlike preparations on the part of the Scottish king, and it was generally believed that he was revolving some important change in his policy.

At this period the life of the monarch was twice menaced by secret conspiracy, and although the ramifications of the plots are involved in much obscurity, there is every probability that they were

Conspiracy of the Master of Forbes—

both connected with the intrigues of the faction of the Douglasses. At the head of the first was the Master of Forbes, a turbulent and bloodthirsty baron, who, under the regency of Albany, treacherously slew the Laird of Meldrum in the town of Aberdeen. Having married a sister of the Earl of Angus, he had taken a prominent part in all the treasonable intrigues and lawless deeds by which the Douglasses had sought to regain their forfeited power and possessions. In June, 1536, Forbes was accused, by the Earl of Huntley, of a design to assassinate the king as he passed through Aberdeen, and of instigating a mutiny against the governor when the Scottish army was on its march to repel an invasion of the English. He and his father, Lord Forbes, were imprisoned upon these charges, but their trial did not take place till fourteen months after. The latter was acquitted, but the son was found guilty, condemned, and executed on the same day (14th July, 1537), at Edinburgh.* Some of the Scottish historians, while they admit that Forbes deserved his fate, yet affirm that he was innocent of the crime for which he suffered, and insinuate that the jury by whom he was tried were corrupted by Huntley.† But of this there is no evidence, and the conduct of James in liberating Lord Forbes, and not only abstaining from the forfeiture of his estates, but admitting the brothers of the criminal to his favour, and one of them even to an office in his household, proves the absence of all vindictive feeling on the part of the king, together with a consciousness of his own integrity, and a confidence in the acknowledged justice of the sentence, very remarkable in that age, when revenge for any intentional injury or dishonour was deemed a sacred duty.‡

The principal actor in the second plot, which was, in all probability, a branch of the same conspiracy, was Janet Douglas, a sister of the banished Earl of Angus, and the widow of Lord Glammis, after whose death she had married a gentleman named Campbell of Skipnish. Within a week after the death of the queen, and while James was overwhelmed with grief, on account of his recent bereavement, the nation was astounded to learn that another plot against the life of their sovereign had been detected; and only two days after the execution of the Master of Forbes, Lady Glammis and her husband, her son the young Lord Glammis, then only sixteen years of age, a priest, and a barber named John Lyon, were accused of conspiring the king's death by poison, and also of having treatsonably assisted the Earl of Angus, and George Douglas, his brother, who were traitors and rebels. Lady Glamis was found guilty, and condemned to be burned at the stake, the common mode of death in that age for all females of rank in cases of treason and murder. She suffered the dreadful sentence on the castle-hill of Edinburgh, (July 17th.) in the presence of a crowd of spectators, who were deeply moved by her noble birth, her matured beauty, and the courage with which she endured her cruel punishment. Her son, Lord Glamis, was found guilty, upon his own confession, of concealing the conspiracy, but out of compassion for his youth his life was spared, and he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, from which he was not released till the death of James, when he was restored to his estates and honours.* Archibald Campbell, the husband of the unfortunate lady, in attempting to escape from the castle of Edinburgh, was dashed to pieces on the rocks. John Lyon, her accomplice, was found guilty, (Aug. 22,) of having been art and part in conspiring the death of the king, and beheaded; whilst on the same day, Alexander Makke, or Mackay, who had sold the poison, knowing from Lyon for what purpose it was bought, had his ears cut off, and was banished from all parts of Scotland, except the county of Aberdeen.†

The horrible punishment inflicted upon Lady Glamis excited great sympathy at the time, and Buchanan, and other writers, have pronounced her innocent of the crimes laid to her charge, and have ascribed her condemnation to the implacable hatred which James entertained to the house of Douglas. But a careful and candid examination of the evidence adduced against her, shows that this opinion is unfounded. There can be no question that Lady Glamis was guilty of treason in assisting her brothers in their attempts to 'invade' the king's person and re-establish their authority in Scotland, and the whole circumstances of the case lead to the conclusion that she was also guilty of the other crime laid to her charge—the compassing the death of the king.‡

James was not long a widower; within a few months after the death of his youthful and delicate queen, he despatched David Beaton, nephew to the primate, to open negotiations for his marriage with

The king's second marriage. Guise, and widow of the Duke of Longueville. The preliminary arrangements were speedily concluded, and in June, 1538, Mary landed at Balcomie, in Fife, under the escort of Lord Maxwell and an admiral of France; and the nuptials were celebrated with due pomp at St. Andrews.§ But neither the attraction of this new alliance, nor the anxiety occasioned by the recent conspiracies, diverted the king from the line of policy which he had adopted with a view to the increase of his wealth and the extension of his authority. His efforts to extend the royal authority. Several of the lucrative offices connected with the ecclesiastical establishments at St. Andrews, Holyrood, Melrose, Kelso, and Coldingham, were made to minister to his aggrandisement, being conferred upon his illegitimate children, whose minority entitled him to draw, and enabled him to appropriate, the entire revenues.* He exacted large fines from Sir Adam Otterburn and an Edinburgh merchant of the name of Chisholm, who had been lately imprisoned on a charge of treasonable intercourse with the Douglasses.† Colville, the comptroller of the royal household, was arrested, and compelled to render an account of the sums which had passed through his hands in the discharge of his official duties.‡ The Earl of Bothwell was deprived of the lordship of Liddesdale, § on the plea that a district of the country so lawless and turbulent required the immediate control of the royal authority; and similar pretexes were employed to justify the king's resumption of certain lands held by Murray, his natural brother, and his cousin, the Earl of Huntley.|| Such encroachments on the power of an arrogant church and a jealous nobility, required both tact and firmness on the part of the sovereign. But James was by no means destitute of the ability to carry out, with combined prudence and resolution, his purpose of augmenting the influence of the crown. Whatever dissatisfaction may have been awakened in the minds of the individuals immediately interested, these measures seem to have been effected without provoking any general outbreak of discontent and opposition. In the course of the same year, the enmity against the Protestants Persecution of the Reformers. found vent in fresh and violent persecutions. Jerome Russell, a learned friar, and another still more eminent supporter of the Reformation, the historian Buchanan, were among the persons seized and thrown into confinement. The latter, however, contrived to escape from prison and took refuge in England, whence he subsequently fled to France.

The relations with England were at this period in an uncertain and unstable condition. Henry the Eighth professed indeed a desire to maintain a friendly understanding with his nephew, the Scottish king; but James, either distrusting this profession, or disinclined to meet it in a similar spirit, had been strengthening Danbar and other strongholds on his southern frontier. The principal disturbing element was the conflict of religious opinions in the two kingdoms. Henry had thrown himself into the work of reformation with all the impetuous energy that characterized his disposition. James, on the other hand, though not unwilling to see some restraint placed upon the Catholic Church, was still one of its avowed adherents, and lent his countenance to its oppression of the Protestants. Either country accordingly presented a ready asylum to the persecuted refugees of the other. The victims of Popish bigotry in Scotland sought safety under the shadow of Henry's throne; and English Catholics fled from Protestant intolerance to find shelter within the territories of James. It would appear that in the latter instance, the representations of the fugitives were permitted to affect the temper of the court on whose protection they had cast themselves. The Scottish monarch was not sorry to hear their report of general discontent prevailing in the neighbouring kingdom, and of the currency there of popular rhymes which foretold his speedy accession to his uncle's throne. In a letter to the Council of York, indeed, he repudiated these predictions, and stigmatized them as 'fantastic prophecies,' which he treated with disbelief and contempt.* Nor did he hesitate to issue edicts denouncing death and confiscation against all who should be found circulating them in his dominions. At the same time he disliked, and perhaps feared, the proud impetuous temper of Henry; his recent matrimonial connection, also, tended to bias his mind more decidedly towards France; and it can hardly be doubted that, while he professed a wish to maintain friendship with England, he contemplated with some satisfaction the unsettled state of that country, as favourable to his own independence and advancement. These feelings were strengthened by the return of David Beaton, whom the Elevation of Pope had recently elevated to the rank of a cardinal, and by the accession of that able but unprincipled prelate to the honours of the primacy, in the room of his relative, James Beaton, Archbishop of St. Andrews, who died in the autumn of 1539. The new primate was a man of great abilities and towering ambition. Eager and unscrupulous in his devotion to the Papal Church, he signalized his return to his native land by fanning into a fiercer flame the fire of persecution against the Protestants. In company with Chisholme, Bishop of Dunblane, whose character, like his own, was stained with the gross vices which have so often accompanied the ordinance of celibacy, he presided in an ecclesiastical court before which five individuals were tried for heresy—Keillor and Beveridge, two Dominican friars, Dean Forret, Vicar of Dollar, Simpson, a priest at Stirling, and Robert Forrester, a notary of the same town. All towards the five were, without hesitation, condemned to the stake, and the cruel sentence was executed on the Castle-hill of Edinburgh, on the first of March, 1538-9.† And soon after, at Glasgow, Russell, a grey friar, who had been imprisoned during the previous year, and Kennedy, a youth of eighteen, passed through a similar fiery trial to the honours of martyrdom.* The memory of James must bear, in part, the stain of these unjust and cruel proceedings. But he seems to have viewed them with no unalloyed satisfaction. He was selfish, but not bloodthirsty; a stern politician rather than a blind zealot. He had enough of candour to disapprove of the haughty and licentious spirit of the Catholic hierarchy, and sufficient wisdom to perceive that such sanguinary acts tended to injure the cause which they were designed to advance. During the remainder of his reign, the spirit of religious persecution was compelled to content itself with a bloodless sacrifice.

In the beginning of the next year, Sir William Eure, on the part of England, met Negotiations with Bellenden and Balnavis, with England. commissioners from James, for the purpose of negotiating respecting the old interminable question, the lawless and troublesome state of the Borders. It was agreed, for the ends of justice and order, that fugitives from either kingdom should be seized and sent back to answer for their crimes under the jurisdiction of their respective sovereigns. The English envoy had also a private conference with Bellenden, an aged and experienced statesman, respecting the views and feelings prevalent at the Scottish court; on the ground of which he reported to his master, that James and many of his nobles were willing to see some reformation effected in the church. This induced Henry to entrust Sir Ralph Sadler,‡ in February, with Mission of Sir Ralph Sadler to James—the task of persuading the Scottish monarch to withdraw his confidence from Beaton, to renounce the Papal supremacy, and divert the ample revenues of the monastic establishments into the treasury of the state. The embassy had reference to another matter, which was causing considerable anxiety at the English court. The conference of Francis with the emperor at Paris boded no good to England, and Henry could not avoid fearing that his nephew was a party to some secret alliance which had begun to be formed against him. To inquiries on this point James returned a satisfactory answer, denying solemnly on oath the existence of the rumoured confederacy, in so far as he was concerned; but Henry's proposal for a personal conference he dextrously evaded, on the plea that his nobility were strongly opposed to the step; and that besides, in his existing relations with France, he could not give his consent unless the French monarch should be present on the occasion. Sadler had little success in —its failure. the other department of his commission. In vain did he accuse Beaton of secret dealings with Rome, and produce in evidence letters said to have been found in a Scottish vessel which had been wrecked on the coast of Northumberland. James affirmed that the purport of these letters had been previously made known to him, and declared his conviction of the Cardinal's loyalty. In vain did the ambassador enlarge on the indolent and vicious habits of the monks; the king intimated his intention of taking order for their restraint, but refused to entertain the idea of confiscating the monastic property. It has been said that the influence of this embassy was prejudiced by the paltry present which accompanied it; and certainly the gift of a few horses from the sovereign of England to his royal nephew, contrasted unfavourably with the profusion of French gold that found its way into the service of James. But there were other considerations, more honourable and more important, which powerfully influenced the mind of the Scottish king. He was firmly attached to the Catholic Church; he needed the support of the prelates as a counterpoise to the power of the nobles; and the illiterate condition of the latter made it hardly possible to dispense with the employment of the educated ecclesiastics in many of the highest offices of state. Henry, moreover, was still showing favour to the exiled Douglasses, and there was too much reason to suspect, that under all his professed zeal for Protestant principles he was actuated mainly, if not exclusively, by ambitious and selfish motives. Few, then, will marvel that the Scottish king shrunk from the course into which the mission of Sadler was designed to urge him; nor will many regret that Henry the Eighth failed to leave the impress of his spirit on the Scottish Reformation.

On the 22nd of May, the royal residence at Birth of a St. Andrews was filled with rejoicings by the birth of a prince,* who was named after his father: and no sooner was the health of the queen restored, than James proceeded to execute a design which he had been contemplating for some time, with a view to strengthen his authority in the northern provinces of his kingdom. He wisely judged that the insubordination and deadly feuds which still prevailed in these remote districts would be most effectually quelled by a royal progress, undertaken with such a display of pomp and power as might awaken at once admiration and fear among the rude clansmen of the highlands and isles. Accordingly he set sail from the Frith of Forth, with a numerous and imposing retinue, in a fleet of twelve large vessels, which had been carefully fitted out and well armed for the expedition. Six of these carried his personal suite and body guard; three others were laden with provisions and stores which were required on the voyage; and the remaining three were severally assigned to the Cardinal, the Earl of Huntley, and the Earl of Arran. Beaton commanded five hundred men from Fife, and Angus; Huntley conducted a force of five hundred men from the northern shires; while Arran led an equal number from the western districts, besides the royal suite and many gentlemen who followed in their train. About the end of May, after the auspicious birth of the heir to the throne, the royal fleet, thus gallantly equipped and manned, quitted the Frith of Forth, sailed along the coasts of Fife, Angus, Buchan, and Caithness, and crossing the Pentland Frith, reached the Orkney islands, where the king and his attendants were hospitably entertained by Robert Maxwell, Bishop of Orkney. The expedition next proceeded to the coast of Sutherland, for the purpose of seizing Donald Mackay of Strathnaver; and then doubling Cape Wrath it touched at the Lewia, where Roderick Macleod and his kinsmen met the king, and were compelled to accompany him in his progress. The squadron then visited in succession the islands of Harris and Uist, and crossing over to the west coast of Skye, received on board Alexander Macleod, of Dunvegen, lord of that part of the island; and coasting round by the north of Skye, the king reached the district of Trouterness, where he was met by John Moydertach, captain of the Clanranald, Alexander of Glengarry, and other chieftains, claiming their descent from the ancient Lords of the Isles. James next steered for Kintail, where he was joined by the chief of the Mackenzies, and then proceeding southward by the Sound of Sleat, he visited in succession the islands of Coll, Tiree, Mull, and Isla, and sweeping along the coast of Argyle he passed the promontory of Kintire, and after a short stay at Arran sailed up the Frith of Clyde, and landed in safety at Dunbarton.*

The beneficial results of this voyage did not fall short of the wisdom that planned it, and the magnificence with which it was executed. Many of the turbulent chiefs, attracted by the splendid pageant, or awed by the strong array, paid ready homage to their sovereign as he passed; others, who ventured to assume an attitude of resistance, were seized and detained in confinement until some time after the king's death. A new train of thought and feeling, favourable to the interests of order and industry, was stirred among the contentious marauding clans; and to James V. belongs the honour of having first effectually undermined and shaken the partition wall of mutual jealousy and aversion which had so long separated the Scottish people into two discordant and hostile races. Other minor advantages resulted from this laudable undertaking. The king had caused Alexander Lindsay, a skilful pilot and hydrographer, to attend him on the voyage; and the charts and nautical observations, which he published on his return, were reckoned of such value, that besides being printed at London, they appeared at Paris in a French translation, under the auspices of the Royal Geographer there. It was also from information acquired in this expedition, that James was led in the close of the same year to adopt measures for checking the intrusion of foreign vessels on the fishing grounds belonging to the Orknéy and Shetland isles.

* Lesley, p. 156; Gregory's Highlands and Isles of Scotland, pp. 147, 148. The date of this expedition has been mistaken by Lesley, Buchanan, and all our early historians, some placing it in 1535, others in 1539. Pinkerton was the first to point out that the true date is 1540.

Soon after his return from his northern expedition, James received a private communication, which involved a charge of treason against Sir James Hamilton of Evandale and Draphane, an illegitimate son of the Earl of Arran. The knight had been a favourite with the king in former days, and during the royal minority had possessed considerable influence at court. He had subsequently fallen into disgrace, however, in consequence of various acts of cruelty and oppression, into which his fierce and passionate temper had hurried him. He was also a bigoted adherent of the Catholic church, and had taken a prominent part in the persecution of the Protestants; and no hand was more deeply stained than his with the blood of his own relative, Patrick Hamilton, who suffered in 1528. At a more recent period, when the bishops were empowered to elect a Special Justiciary, for the more effectual punishment of heretics, their choice had fallen on the knight of Evandale, in whom they were certain of finding a fierce and unscrupulous agent of their sanguinary designs.* He was now accused of having conspired, with some adherents of Angus, against the authority of the crown, and even, it is said, against the king's life. The crime, however, was of old date, twelve years having elapsed since its occurrence, though it was now revealed for the first time. James was on his way from Edinburgh to Falkland, when a young man hurriedly met him, and requesting a secret audience, gave him notice of the matter. Without interrupting his journey, the king despatched the messenger with his ring to Learmonth, master of his household, authorising him and two other officers of his court to receive the deposition of the informer, and act upon it according to their judgment of its credibility and importance. Sir James was immediately arrested and thrown into prison; and being soon afterwards brought to trial, on the accusation of James Hamilton of Kineavil, sheriff of Linlithgow, and brother to the first Scottish martyr, he was found guilty and beheaded. To the last he affirmed his innocence; and at this day it is difficult to penetrate the obscurity which time has thrown over the facts of the case. But he seems to have had a fair assize, and his general character was not such as to affix any improbability to the question of his guilt. His death was viewed by some of the Protestants as a divine judgment against the persecutor of God's people. An old chronicler, after narrating the circumstances in detail, makes allusion to the Scripture history of Haman, and adds,

This incident exerted an unfortunate influence on the mind of the king. Whether the memory of his former friendship for Hamilton awakened some train of gloomy reflection in his breast, or whether, as is more probable, a painful impression of his insecurity was forced upon him by the thought of the long concealment of the baron's crime, he became depressed and melancholy, forsaking his wonted amusements to spend the day in solitude and heaviness. Images of terror haunted his fancy, and night brought to his pillow fearful dreams, which frequently startled him from his sleep, to see in the creatures of his disordered brain vengeful and threatening apparitions of the dead.† Such is the picture presented by some historians of the period; and though its dark features are probably exaggerated, it seems to contain a basis of truth. It is not unlikely that the king's mind began to display at this time something of that morbid sensibility which, under the influence of coming misfortunes, unnerved his frame, and operated as a principal cause of his early death. These gloomy forebodings, however, if they did exist, were not of long continuance. By the close of the year, when the parliament met, James was prepared to carry on with renewed energy his schemes for the reduction of the overgrown power of the nobility, and the extension of the royal prerogatives. An act was passed, confirming an edict which he had issued three years before at Rouen, for the revocation of all the crown-rights which had been alienated during his minority. This was followed by another act, annexing to the throne the Hebrides, the Orkney, and the Shetland isles, the superiority of the earldom of Angus, and the Evandale estates, with a number of other lordships, among which were Liddesdale, Glanmis, Douglas, Crawford-Lindsay, Crawford-John, Preston, Tantallon, and Bothwell; the declared grounds of forfeiture being the disaffected condition of the districts, and the treasonable practices of the feudatories. At the same time the dissatisfaction which these sweeping measures tended to awaken among the aristocracy, was sought to be allayed by a general amnesty, from which, however, the banished Earl of Angus, his brother, Sir George Douglas, and their adherents, were specially exempted. Orders were also issued for the regular holding of the 'weapon-shaws' twice a year throughout the country; and there was added a careful specification of the arms with which the various classes composing the military array of the kingdom were to provide themselves. The next meeting of parliament, held in Mareh, 1541, was chiefly distinguished by the statutes which it enacted with reference to ecclesiastical affairs. The denial of the Pope's supremacy was made a capital crime; conventicles were strictly prohibited; suspicion of heresy was declared a disqualification even for municipal office; all correspondence with protestants was forbidden, and a reward offered for the discovery of those who favoured the obnoxious faith: while over against these oppressive acts was placed a meagre general ordinance, enjoining the clergy to greater purity of life, and a more faithful discharge of their religious functions. In the matter of trade, the manufactures of the country and its commerce with foreign lands were made the subject of several regulations; in the judicial department, the recent institution of the college of justice was confirmed; notaries and other legal functionaries were required to pass through a certain course of preparatory training; and it was ordered that the acts of parliament should be printed and circulated among the people, from a copy authenticated by the signature of the elerk. Some additions were also made to the rules for the arming and training of the persons liable to military service.

† Lindsay, vol. ii. p. 300; Buch. book xiv. chap. lviii.; Drummond, 336. All these historians mention the report that Sir James Hamilton appeared to the king in a dream, brandishing a naked sword, with which he cut off both his arms, and then threatened to return after a short time and take away his life. The superstitious connected this dream with the death of the king's two sons which took place almost immediately after.

The prospect of continued peace with England was becoming more and more insecure. Beaton and the clergy contemplated a rupture between the two kingdoms as the most effectual means of closing the ear of James against the arguments with which his uncle still urged him to embrace the cause of the Reformation. Their influence in the councils of their sovereign may be traced in a proclamation which appeared soon after the dissolution of parliament, ordering the preparation of sixteen large and sixty small pieces of ordnance; and enjoining the whole military array of the country to be in readiness for taking the field on a day's notice. The middle of the year, however, brought a series of events which concentrated the thoughts of the Scottish king with painful interest on his domestic affairs.

In the month of April, 1541, Mary of Guise gave birth to another son; but the joy which this event occasioned was immediately clouded by the death of the infant; and nearly at the same moment his elder brother, the heir to the crown, was attacked with a mortal malady, and died at St. Andrews before his afflicted father could reach that town.* "The death of the two infant princes," says Pitseottie, "caused great lamentation to be made in Scotland, but especially by the queen, their mother. Yet," continues he, "the queen comforted the king, saying, they were young enough, and God would raise them more succession." The princely infants were buried on the same day in the royal vault at Holyrood, "and there was more dolour in all the land for their death, than there had been joy for their birth."

Shortly after the death of the infant princes, Margaret the queen dowager closed her varied and turbulent life at Methven Castle, in the fifty-second year of her age. In spite of excellent talents and great energy of character, her treacherous intrigues, violent temper, and licentious life, had lost her the confidence of all parties in the kingdom, and entirely ruined her influence. Shortly before her death, she was eagerly engaged in seeking to obtain a divorce from Lord Methven, her third husband; but, to her grievous discontent, her son pre-emptorily quashed the scandalous procedure. She was interred with great magnificence in the church of the Carthusians, at Perth, in the tomb of James the First and his queen, the founders of the monastery.*

James, thus suddenly rendered childless, felt keenly the severity of the blow; but did not long yield to the enervating influence of sorrow. He sought relief in that which, next to religion, is the best comforter—active exertion in useful enterprises. For the improvement of the breed of horses in his dominions, he began to import a superior stock from Sweden and Denmark.† The skill of the French and Flemish armourers was tasked to increase the efficiency of his military resources. A number of mechanics skilled in the ornamental and industrial arts were attracted from the continent by the promise of royal patronage and liberal remuneration. The University of Aberdeen was honoured with a visit; and for fifteen days the king and his consort were entertained with literary disputations and classic dramas enacted by the students.‡ On their return, Sir John Campbell of Lundie was despatched to the Netherlands, with instructions to procure redress for some encroachments on the Scottish fisheries. These laudable attempts to promote national interests, which were then so generally undervalued and neglected, will be viewed as interesting features in the reign of a monarch, who, with all his defects and errors, deserves to be remembered in Scotland with affection and esteem.

The Cardinal, with Panter the Secretary, proceeded, in July, through France to Rome, ostensibly for the purpose of obtaining his appointment as legate in Scotland, but probably also with secret powers to communicate with the Pope, the Emperor of Germany, and the French king, respecting a scheme which was understood to be under consideration, for a powerful confederacy against the haughty champion of the Reformation in England. once more despatched on an embassy to Scotland. But Henry altogether miscalculated the spirit of his nephew when he dictated the terms of the message which his envoy was commissioned to deliver to James. The exhortation not to be 'a brute or a stock' in the hands of the clergy; the offer of a wise man to instruct him; the reference to crafty juggling priests leading the blind by the nose,*—must have deeply offended the Scottish king; and it was only by repeated importunity that he was at length persuaded to give a reluctant consent to the proposal for an interview with Henry at York.† Ere the time fixed for this meeting arrived, the English Borderers, headed by their wardens, broke into the south of Scotland, committing the savage excesses by which such forays were usually characterized; and James reckoned this a sufficient reason for absenting himself from the projected conference.‡ Henry proceeded to York in the autumn of the year 1541, and remained there six days, in expectation of the arrival of his nephew, who, however, failed to appear. The proud temper of the English monarch at once fired at the supposed insult. Hurrying back in deep indignation to London, he ordered immediate preparations to be made for commencing hostilities, and took steps for the revival of the old ridiculous claim of feudal superiority over the Scottish kingdom. At this crisis the Scottish king was evidently desirous to remain at peace. The security of his throne had been affected by the loss of his children; he was in debt; and he had reason to suspect that the fidelity of his nobles could not be relied on. Under these circumstances, public policy and private feeling alike made him dread hostilities with England; and he endeavoured to avert a rupture by sending an embassy to excuse his failure to appear at York, and to express a desire for reconciliation. The outbreak of hostilities was thus delayed for a time, and the risk of an open rupture might probably have passed by, had not disputes respecting the crown of Ireland, and the incessant complaints from the Borders, renewed and strengthened the feelings of jealousy and suspicion on both sides.

The English monarchs had long borne the title of Lords of Ireland; for which Henry had recently substituted the more august designation of King of that country. But his actual possessions there were of trifling extent, and his authority in other districts was little more than nominal. Many of the insular chiefs resented his new claim to regal jurisdiction, which was the more offensive to them because his zeal in the cause of the Reformation ran counter to their own religious principles. It was natural for them to turn their eyes towards Scotland, a country with which they were connected by ancient ties of affinity; and towards James, who had lately been styled 'Defender of the Faith,' by the head of the Catholic Church. The embassy, which they sent to the Scottish king at this time, not only requested his aid, but offered him the titular sovereignty of their island. James in all likelihood did not contemplate, for the present at least, any decided movement in the direction to which they pointed; but his reception of their envoys was of such a kind as to aggravate the suspicion and displeasure of his uncle, who was now opportunely freed from the risk of any powerful combination against him on the continent, by a new quarrel between the Emperor and Francis. Henry was resolutely bent on war; and, though commissioners once more met, in July, 1542, to attempt an amicable adjustment of the points in dispute, their negotiations failed to prevent, and indeed scarcely retarded, the outbreak of hostilities. On which party the first acts of aggression were chargeable cannot now be easily determined. The manifesto of the English king asserts, that on the 4th of July the Scots made a hostile inroad on his dominions; while James, on the other hand, maintained that his territories had been twice invaded before he instituted reprisals. The outrages referred to were, probably, Border forays, such as had often occurred, and been redressed without provoking a national contest. But the state of feeling on both sides placed insuperable obstacles in the way of a reconciliation, and the hope of avoiding a rupture was finally extinguished by the battle of Hadden-Rig, in which the English were defeated by Huntley and Home. It was in the month of August, when Sir Robert Bowes, who held the command of Norham and the wardenship of the Eastern Marches, assembled a band of three thousand horsemen, and swept across the frontier into Scotland. Accompanied by Sir John Widdrington, his brother, and several other knights, along with the Earl of Angus and Sir George Douglas, he ravaged Teviotdale, and was preparing to advance towards Jedburgh, when he was met at Hadden-Rig, a few miles to the east of Kelso, by the Earl of Huntley, to whom James had committed the defence of the Borders. A fierce encounter took place, which was decided in favour of the Scots by the timely arrival of Lord Home with four hundred lances. The English were completely defeated, and left six hundred prisoners in the hands of the enemy, among whom were the warden himself, his brother Richard, Sir John Widdrington, Sir William Mowbray, and many other persons of note. Angus would have shared the same fate, but he succeeded in dispatching with his dagger the knight who had seized him, and saved himself by flight.*

Mortified and enraged at this defeat, Henry lost

The Duke of Norfolk invades Scotland— no time in taking measures for inflicting vengeance on the Scots.

He ordered a muster of twenty thousand men at York, and instructed the Duke of Norfolk, whom he had styled 'the scourge of the Scots,' to hasten thither for the purpose of directing the formidable array against his northern neighbours. Not fewer than six English earls joined the Duke's standard, besides Angus and his partizans; but the advance of the expedition was delayed for a month by the arrival of another embassy from James, proposing a renewal of the negotiations, and indicating a disposition to grant Henry the long-sought interview. If the Scottish king still really desired a pacification, his hope was disappointed; if he merely wished to temporize, he gained a considerable advantage by the delay which he effected. The winter had begun to set in ere Norfolk took the field; and it was with little more than half the force which had been ordered to assemble under his command at York, that he entered Scotland in the middle of October. His progress at first was unopposed; and he pillaged and burned the towns of Kelso and Roxburgh, with a number of granges and villages. But he found it impossible to carry his ravages far beyond the frontier. The inclemency of the season, and the appearance of Huntley, at the head of a powerful force, compelled him to draw his troops together, and assume a more cautious attitude. The Scottish leader prudently avoided a decisive engagement, and Norfolk was, in little more than a week, under the necessity of retiring to Berwick, and disbanding the greater part of his army, which had begun to suffer severely from the want of provisions.

Meanwhile James had mustered an army of thirty thousand men-at-arms on the Borough-Muir of Edinburgh. But this imposing array contained elements of discord which neutralized its numerical strength. Not a few of the barons had a strong sympathy for the Protestants; others had been hoping to share in the rich spoils of the Catholic Church; and nearly all cherished suspicion and discontent under the remembrance of recent attacks on the power and privileges of their order. Their attachment to their sovereign had less effect than the presence of a hostile army within the Borders, in drawing them to the field. Accordingly, when they reached Fala, on the verge of the Lammermuir hills, and there heard of Norfolk's retreat, they resolutely refused to proceed further. It was the anxious wish of the king to press forward with energy; but in vain did he urge the favourable opportunity presented, and the abundant means which they possessed, for carrying the war into the heart of England. The sullen leaders, conscious of their power, persisted in their refusal, magnifying the difficulty of procuring supplies at that season,

Refusal of the nobles to advance into England. and maintaining that the law of their feudal service did not require them to do duty beyond the boundaries of the kingdom. It has been confidently affirmed by some historians, that the refractory barons manifested a disposition to renew the tragic scenes of Lauder Bridge, and to execute summary vengeance on the confidential advisers of the king, but that a difference of opinion among the leaders of the revolt, respecting the selection of their victims, prevented them from carrying their sanguinary design into execution.* They all but unanimously agreed, however, in obstinately refusing to cross the Border in pursuit of the retreating invaders, alleging as their reason, the scarcity of provisions, and the advanced season of the year. It was to no purpose that James remonstrated, and entreated them, as they valued their own honour and his, not to allow their villages to be burned and their country to be plundered and laid waste with impunity. Their feelings of loyalty and patriotism, at no time very powerful, seemed now to be completely extinguished. Even the desire of revenge against the enemy yielded to a determination to make their sovereign feel the effects of their dissatisfaction with his policy; and the king was ultimately constrained to disband his mutinous troops, and return to the capital, overwhelmed with shame and indignation.

Immediately after his return, James held a council at Holyrood, on the second or third of November, when, according to Knox, a scroll was presented to him by Cardinal Beaton, containing the names of more than a hundred of the principal nobles and gentry, including the Earl of Arran, next heir to the throne, who were either tainted with heresy, or in the pay of England, and leagued with the Douglasses.† Appended to this scroll was Insidious counsel of the prelates.

* Knox's History of the Reformation in Scotland, vol. i. p. 80, edited by David Laing, Esq.; Pitscottie, vol. ii. p. 400. Sir John Scott of Thirlestane was the only baron who declared himself ready to follow the king wherever he should lead. As a reward for his fidelity, James added the royal tressure to his arms, and assigned for his crest a bundle of spears, with the motto, 'Ready, eye ready.' Lord Napier is the representative of this family. See Appendix to the Lay of the Last Minstrel, note C, 2.

† This remarkable statement is corroborated by a letter of Sir Ralph Sadler to Henry VIII., dated 27th March, 1543, in which he details a conversation he had with Arran, the governor, who told him, "That a number of noblemen and gentlemen the late king had gotten written in a roll, which were all accused of heresy, of the which (he said) he was the first, and the Earl of Cassilis, the Earl of Glen-

a minute account of the possessions of the persons included in this sweeping denunciation. A similar paper had previously been laid before the king by the Cardinal and his party on the return of James (July, 1540) from his voyage round the Isles; and it was hinted to him that the crown might derive great pecuniary advantage from so many rich forfeitures. This base and selfish policy, however, was at that time peremptorily rejected by the prudent counsel of the high treasurer, James Kirkaldy of Grange, and the high-spirited monarch indignantly replied, "Pack, you javells!* get you to your charges, and reform your own lives, and be not instruments of discord betwixt my nobility and me; or else I vow to God I shall reform you—not as the King of Denmark does, by imprisonment; neither yet as the King of England does, by hanging and heading; but I shall reform you by sharp whingaris (swords), if ever I hear such motion of you again." James, at the period when he gave this stern rebuff to his intriguing prelates, evidently contemplated a reform in the Scottish church, the abuses of which had grown to an intolerable height; but the circumstances in which he was now placed had completely alienated him from his feudal nobility, and thrown him into the hands of the clergy; and when, after the mortifying affront which he had received at Fala, the Cardinal and his friends ventured to present to him the document which he had previously rejected, and to renew their former recommendation, it was at once accepted by the king, with an expression of great regret that he had so long neglected their advice. He saw plainly, he said, that the nobility were hostile to his person, and rejoiced in his dishonour, for they would not, to please him, ride a mile to follow his enemies.†

In these circumstances the clergy, with a few of the nobles who still remained faithful to the royal cause, resolved to make another effort to re-assemble the army for the invasion of England. A force of ten thousand men was collected with great expedition and secrecy, chiefly by the exertions of Lord Maxwell, and it was determined to make a sudden inroad cairn and his son, the Earl Marishal, and a great many gentlemen, to the number of eighteen score, because they were all well-minded to God's word, which then they durst not avow.—Sadler's Papers, vol. i. p. 94.

† Knox's History, vol. I. pp. 81—83, and note, Laing's Edition. From an interesting letter of Sir William Eure to Cromwell, dated from Berwick, 20th January, 1539-40, it seems that either this or a similar reprimand was delivered to the prelates by the king at Linnithgow, immediately after he had witnessed the representation of Sir David Lindsay's play, called 'Ane Satire on the Three Estates.' After describing the 'Enterlude,' Eure proceeds, "My lord, the same Maister Bellenden showed me, that after the said 'Enterlude' finished, the King of the Scots did call upon the Bishop of Glasgow (Gavin Dunbar), being chancellor, and divers other bishops, exhorting them to reform their fashions and manner of living, saying, that unless they so did, he would send six of the proudest of them unto his uncle of England, and as they were ordered, so he would order all the rest that would not amend."—State Papers, vol. v. p. 170.

into England by the western marches, and to plunder and lay waste the country; while, in order to mislead the enemy as to the point of attack, the Cardinal and the Earl of Arran were directed to advance as far as Haddington, and to make a demonstration against the eastern Borders. James rousing himself from his depression, advanced with the army as far as Lochmaben,* where, by agreement with his council, he halted, and Lord Maxwell broke across the Border, and began to ravage and destroy the country with fire and sword, while the inhabitants were taken by surprise, and totally unprepared for resistance. The king's distrust of his nobles, however, was still undiminished, and he had given secret orders that as soon as the expedition entered the English territories, his favourite, Oliver Sinclair, should assume the supreme command. Accordingly, when the Scottish army reached the river Esk, a halt was ordered near Solway Moss, the royal banner was displayed, the trumpets sounded, and the new general was elevated on the bucklers of the soldiers, whilst the royal commission appointing him to the supreme command was produced and read aloud by a herald.† This imprudent step was speedily followed by the most disastrous consequences. Many of the nobles were indignant at the preference thus unwisely given to the royal minion, and declared that they would not serve under such a leader; a spirit of discontent, and almost of open mutiny, spread from rank to rank; discipline and order were at an end; and the whole army fell into a state of hopeless confusion. At this critical moment a party of the English Borderers, consisting of three hundred horse, under Thomas Daere and John Musgrave, two active leaders, advanced to reconnoitre, and approaching near enough to perceive the disordered condition of the Scottish forces, though ignorant of the cause, they instantly availed themselves of the favourable opportunity, and boldly charged them with levelled spears. The effect of this surprise was instantaneous and fatal. The Scots, panic-stricken at the sudden attack, and taking their assailants for the van of a powerful army, threw away their weapons, and fled without even attempting resistance.

* Knox's History, vol. i. p. 83. Lochmaben was a royal castle, and was in ancient times the property of King Robert Bruce. Lesley, however, states, that during the time of this raid, the king remained in Caerlaverock,—a castle belonging to Lord Maxwell. Pitscottie agrees with Knox that the king 'was in the castle of Lochmaben.' The distance of either place from the Solway Moss was not considerable.

† Drummond mentions a report which has been adopted both by Pinkerton and Sir Walter Scott, that Sinclair was only raised to read the commission appointing Lord Maxwell general. This story, which is in itself extremely improbable, is contradicted by the direct testimony of Buchanan, Pitscottie, and Lesley. Oliver Sinclair was the third son of Sir Oliver Sinclair of Roslin. He was not a young favourite, but an old attached servant of the crown, and held the office of a gentleman of the bed-chamber when James V. was an infant. He was entrusted with the charge of Stirling castle, when the king took refuge there on his flight from Falkland. After the expulsion of the Douglases he was appointed governor of Tantallon castle.

In the confusion the greater number made their escape, a few were slain, but a thousand prisoners fell into the hands of the enemy, including the Earls of Cassilis and Glencairn, the Lords Maxwell, Somerville, Gray, Oliphant, and Fleming, Oliver Sinclair, the Masters of Rothes and Erskine, Home of Ayton, and almost every person of distinction who was engaged in the expedition. It is alleged that not a few of the nobles, who were in the pay of the English monarch, were taken willing prisoners, and that others chose rather to surrender to the enemy than to escape to their own country, and encounter the displeasure of their offended sovereign. A considerable number, according to Bishop Godwin, entangled themselves in the neighbouring morass, and were captured by the Scottish freebooters, and sold to the English.

The king had remained at Lochmaben, that he might earlier receive the intelligence, which he eagerly expected, of the success of the expedition.

When the news of the shameful discomfiture of his army first reached him he broke out into furious transports of rage against the perfidy of his nobles, under the conviction that they had conspired to betray the independence of their country, in order to gratify their personal revenge. His mind, already overstrained by previous disappointments and anxieties, sunk under the blow, and he fell into a state of the deepest melancholy and despair. After a sleepless night, during which he continued to reiterate at intervals the melancholy exclamation, 'O fled Oliver! Is Oliver ta'en?' he returned next day (November 25th) to Edinburgh, where he remained till the 30th, in strict seclusion. The queen was then at Linlithgow, in hourly expectation of her confinement; but as if desirous to avoid her presence in the hour of despondency and gloom, he secretly quitted the capital, and crossing over to Fife, went to Hallyards, the residence of the High Treasurer, where he was received with respectful sympathy by Lady Grange, a venerable and pious matron. He was accompanied only by William Kirkaldy, afterwards the celebrated Laird of Grange, and a few of the gentlemen of his bed-chamber. At supper his hostess observing his depression began to comfort him, entreating him to take the will of God in good part. 'My portion of this world is spent,' he mournfully replied, 'for I shall not be with you fifteen days.' When his servants came to inquire of him where he wished preparation made for his Yule, or Christmas festival, which was near at hand, he answered with 'a disdainful smirk,' as Knox terms it, 'I cannot tell—choose ye the place; but this,' continued he, 'I can tell you, ere Yule day ye will be masterless, and this realm without a king.' From Hallyards he proceeded to Falkland, where he shut himself up brooding over his disgrace, and refusing to listen to any consolation. A slow fever preyed upon his frame, the result of a wounded spirit, a malady for which human physicians can devise no remedy. He would sit for hours in speechless despondency, or would only mutter at intervals the old strain: 'Fy! fled is Oliver! Is Oliver ta'en? All is lost!' This could not last; 'he became,' says Pitscottie, 'so heavy and dolorous, that he neither eat nor drank anything that had good digestion, and became so vehement sick, that no man had hope of his life.' When in this hopeless condition, 'the post come out of Linlithgow, showing the king good tidings that the queen was delivered.' He briefly inquired 'whether it were man or woman that had been born to him.' The messenger replied that it was 'ane fair daughter.' The unhappy monarch, who had lost his two sons, had clung to the hope that his next child might be a boy, and was again met by disappointment. He seemed to have drained the cup of sorrow to the dregs, and his thoughts wandering back to the time when the crown of Scotland was brought into the Stewart family by the daughter of Bruce, he uttered the melancholy remark, 'Fare well, it cam wi' a lass, it will gang wi' a lass.' (It came by a girl, it will go with a girl.) 'And so,' continues the chronicler, 'he commended himself to Almighty God, and turned his back to his lords and his face to the wall.' The silence of this solemn moment was broken by Cardinal Beaton, who vociferated in the deafening ear of his royal master, 'Take order, sir, with your realm! Who shall rule during the minority of your daughter? Ye have known my services, what will ye have done? Shall there not be four regents chosen, and shall not I be principal of them?' Whatever was the nature of the king's answer, the Cardinal succeeded in obtaining the royal signature to what his enemies affirmed to have been a blank sheet of paper, in which he afterwards wrote anything he pleased.* In this mournful condition the king remained for some time, but sense and consciousness appear to have remained till the last moments of his existence, for he turned him about once more, looked upon the few faithful nobles and councillors who stood round his bed, and as the chronicler expresses it, 'gave a little laughter,' kissed his hand to them in mute farewell, and then stretched it out for them to perform their last act of homage by pressing it to their lips, and this done, he 'held up his hands to God and yielded up his spirit.†

James V., who was thus cut off in the flower of his age, by a death far more painful than that of his father at Flodden, was undoubtedly one of the ablest sovereigns of his age. His natural talents were of a very high order; and in spite of his vicious and neglected education, his mental vigour and energy of character enabled him to make up for the time which he had lost in youth, and to become as distinguished for his mental accomplishments, as for his skill in those athletic exercises which were the great objects of ambition among the nobles and princes of that period. He possessed a remarkable genius for the fine arts, and more especially for poetry and architecture. He managed the revenues of his kingdom with prudence and economy, 'encouraged fisheries, wrought mines, cultivated waste lands, and understood and protected commerce.' He was frank and affable in his manners, and easy of access to the poor; and he manifested the most praiseworthy zeal to punish the oppressors of his people, and to administer strict justice to all classes of the community. "The dangers of the wilderness," says Pinkerton, "the gloom of night, the tempests of winter, could not prevent his patient exertions to protect the helpless, to punish the guilty, to enforce the observance of the laws. From horseback he often pronounced decrees worthy of the sagest seat of justice; and if overtaken by night in the progresses which he made through the kingdom, or separated by design or by accident from his company, he would share the meal of the lowest peasant with as hearty a relish as the feast of his highest noble." According to Buchanan, James was sparing in his diet, and very rarely used wine; patient of fatigue, cold, heat, and hunger; and in the depth of winter often continued day and night on horseback, that he might surprise the robbers in their lurking-places. On the other hand it must be admitted, that with many virtues the character of this unfortunate monarch was stained by great vices. His licentiousness must be in part attributed to the wicked counsels of those unscrupulous courtiers who sought in this way to degrade and weaken his mind, in order that they might prolong their ascendancy over him. His violent passions, implacable resentment, and immoderate love of power, led him, fatally for himself and for his kingdom, to adopt a course of policy which ultimately alienated from him the affections of his nobility, threw him entirely into the hands of the clergy, and induced him, in opposition to his better judgment, to support a cruel and rapacious hierarchy, in all their vindictive measures against the professors of the reformed faith. He died (13th December, 1542) in the thirty-first year of his age, and the twenty-ninth of his reign, leaving one legitimate child, Mary, his successor, and six natural children, amongst whom was James, afterwards the celebrated Regent Moray.*

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

The history of the church during the earlier part of this period presents few incidents deserving of notice. James I., who sought to enlist the clergy in his plans for repressing the insolence and tyranny of the nobles, and promoting the social improvement of the country, had wisely guarded their ancient privileges, and secured the restoration of church lands which had been alienated during the preceding reigns; but he vindicated at the same time the independence of the ecclesiastical establishment, by forbidding the purchase of pensions and benefices from the pope, and permitting no clerk to pass beyond the seas without the royal licence, and security being given that he would not be guilty of simony. The same wise but jealous policy was adopted by James II., who procured from a provincial council of the clergy held at Perth in 1457, a declaration that the king had an undoubted right, by the ancient law and custom of Scotland, to the ecclesiastical patronage of the kingdom, by which it belonged to him to present to all benefices during the vacancy of the see. The prerogative thus firmly asserted does not appear to have been often used, nor was the freedom of election by the clergy to the higher ecclesiastical offices in any way interfered with until the reign of James III., who assumed not only the right of nomination to vacant benefices, but openly sold them to laymen. This monarch, whose character and conduct have been severely arraigned by the ecclesiastical historians of that age, has been accused by them of having unscrupulously invaded the rights and privileges of the church, whenever these interfered with the gratification of his favourites, and the replenishment of his exhausted treasury. In 1481, in order to give the sanction of law to his proceedings, an act was passed, declaring that "it is ordained by the king and his three Estates, concerning the privilege of the crown used and observed in all times past in the presentation to benefices during a vacancy in the sees of bishops, that our sovereign lord and his successors shall in future, during the vacation of a see, have power to present to benefices till the bishop show his bulls to the king's highness and to the chapter. And in case that our sovereign lord, of his special grace and favour, admit any prelate to his temporalities before he show his bulls, such admission shall imply no prejudice or harm to his highness concerning the said privilege or right of presentation."* Such enactments, which occur more frequently in the statute-book as we advance, may be accounted for and vindicated by weighty considerations of political expediency. The wealth and power of the church had reached a height which seriously endangered the welfare of the community. During many years, the practice of bequeathing money or land to the church, with the view of averting the consequences of a wicked life, had been so successfully fostered by the priesthood, that more than one-half of the wealth of the kingdom had passed into their hands. The right of presentation to the church livings thus munificently endowed, had been at first conceded to the original donors and their heirs; but gradually and by the same process which had secured the grant of the benefice, the power of nomination was ceded by the laity, and the patronage annexed to one of the bishoprics, abbeys, or priories of the kingdom. The clergy had thus become absolute proprietors of a great portion of Scotland, while their subjection to the see of Rome and their freedom from the control of the civil law, rendered their influence in the state alike anomalous and dangerous. It became, therefore, the policy of the king and nobles not only to check the farther growth of this system, but to reduce it within such limits as would neutralize the evils which it necessarily produced. The assertion of the royal right of presentation to vacant sees, and the recovery of lay patronage, seemed the easiest and least objectionable mode of gaining these desirable ends. The policy or superstition of James IV. led him, indeed, to restore freedom of election to the clergy in 1493; but he imposed a salutary check on the encroachments of the Romish See, by enacting that no legate was permitted to enter the kingdom unless he was a cardinal or native of Scotland; and vigorous efforts were at the same time adopted to induce all the king's subjects, whether clergymen or laymen, who had pleas depending in the papal court, to withdraw their litigation, and submit to the decisions of their own sovereign.* In the following year, in consequence of the impoverished state of the kingdom, he forbade the exportation of money to Rome, under the penalties of rebellion and treason. In the last parliament of James V., the same heavy penalties were denounced on all intruders into bishoprics and abbeys during a vacancy. These measures were not without effect in restraining the cupidity of the clergy, and guarding the independence of the kingdom; but so exorbitant had the power of the church become, that at the period of the Reformation only two hundred and sixty-two benefices out of the whole number, consisting of nine hundred and forty, were not under its absolute control.

Meanwhile, the internal condition of the church was such that it provoked the contempt and indignation of the people, whose minds were gradually becoming imbued with the simple and scriptural doctrines disseminated by the Lollards. As the wealth of the ecclesiastical establishment increased, its higher offices were more eagerly coveted by men who were utterly disqualified for the sacred duties of the priesthood; and appointments to vacant sees were secured by intrigue and acts of unblushing simony which outraged the ordinary decencies of life. Some of the bishops were men of dissolute habits, who lived in a state of open concubinage, and had large families, which were amply provided for from the patrimony of the church; and while surrounded by every luxury which their wealth could at this time command, they manifested a selfish indifference alike to the temporal condition and spiritual necessities of the people. Nor were the inferior clergy more favourable specimens of their order. The monks and friars were seldom restrained by the vows which bound them to a life of devotion and good works, but encouraged by the example of their superiors, became idle, dissolute, and profane. There were not wanting, indeed, among the dignitaries of the church, men of saintly character, who deplored the increasing corruptions of the priesthood, and sought to reform the abuses which they saw were slowly undermining the establishment. The venerable Kennedy, Bishop of St. Andrews, was a model prelate, learned, pious, thoroughly conscientious, and devoted to his office, which he zealously employed in securing from his clergy the due administration of the ordinances of religion, and in the removal of hirelings and profligates from the ministry; but his exertions, though successful for a time in arresting the tide of degeneracy, failed to produce any permanent improvement. His successor, Patrick Graham, imbued with a similar spirit, succeeded in raising his bishopric to a metropolitan see, and returned from Rome armed with full powers from the pope to prosecute the work of reformation; but the clergy took instant alarm, and by bribing the king, secured the degradation and imprisonment of the prelate on the ground that he had violated the law, by leaving the kingdom and corresponding with the pope without the royal license.† Shevez, who had been the chief agent in the prosecution of this unfortunate prelate, succeeded him in the primacy, and by his unscrupulous and profligate conduct increased the evils which his predecessors had vainly endeavoured to remove. The clergy being responsible only to their diocesans or superiors, were able in a great degree to set at defiance the popular indignation which their vices provoked; but public opinion found expression in the satirical effusions of the poets belonging to this period, who lashed with no lenient hand

the follies and crimes of the priesthood. Among these satirists, Dunbar and Lindsay occupy the chief place, and their poems, abounding in broad humour and biting wit, furnish a sad picture of clerical ignorance and profligacy. Dunbar represents his abbot as having a concubine; sending his sons to be educated at Paris; and though unable to preach, as skilful in playing at cards, dice, and tables; and Lindsay execrates the extortions of the vicar, whom he accuses of grinding the faces of the poor under the cloak of religion; while in the par-doner, or vagabond who hawks about his false relics, and sells indulgences for sins, he has given us a graphic picture of impudent knavery. These plays, some of which were not only printed, but acted in different parts of the kingdom, tended to swell the gathering tide of public indignation, and gave a powerful impetus to the progress of Protestant opinions which afterwards assailed and overthrew the ancient establishment.

The dissolute lives of the clergy were not re-deemed by the possession of great professional learning or aptitude for the general Ignorance of the duties of their office. In spite of clergy, and their the erection of the universities neglect of their duty. and colleges, their theological requirements were lamentably deficient, and contrasted unfavourably with those of the same class in England. A ludicrous example of ignorance, even in a dignity of the church, is mentioned by Lindsay of Pitscottie, who states, that Andrew Forman, Bishop of Moray, being called to Rome on business connected with the church, entertained the pope and his cardinals at dinner, and was requested, as the host, to say grace. The bishop, "who was not a good scholar, and had not good Latin, began rudely in the Scottish fashion, in this manner, saying, 'Benedicite,' believing that they should have answered 'Dominus,' but they answered 'Deus' in the Italian fashion, which put this noble bishop by his intendment that he wist not how to proceed forward; but happened out in good Scottish in this manner, the which they understood not, saying, 'The devil I give you all false carles to, in nomine Patris, Filii, et Spiritus Sancti.' Amen, quoth they. Then the bishop and his men laughed. And the bishop showed the pope the manner that he was not a good clerk, and his cardinals had put him by his intendment, and therefore he gave them all to the devil in good Scottish. And then the pope laughed among the rest."* Comparatively few of the higher clergy condescended to inculcate by preaching the doctrines and duties of religion, and those of inferior grade were either disqualified for the office, or entirely neglected it. This flagrant omission of duty, along with the progress of Lollard opinions, led to the institution of the order of preaching friars, who Preaching of the perambulated the country, preach- friars. ing to the people, and deriving their subsistence from the charitable gifts of their hearers. These

* Pitscottie, vol. i. p. 255. It is but fair to state, however that though grossly ignorant of their own profession, and in many cases totally unacquainted with the Sacred Scriptures, the Scottish clergy were still greatly superior to the nobility in general information, and in talents for political management. Sir Ralph Sadler, in a letter to a member of the English privy council, in 1540, bears testimony to their great ability and experience in the conduct of public business. "To be plain with you," he says, "though the noble men be well-minded, and diverse others that be of the council and about the king; yet I see none among them that hath any such agility of wit, gravity, learning, or experience to set forth the same, or to take in hand the direction of things. So that the king so far as I can perceive is of force driven to use the bishops and his clergy as his only ministers for the direction of his realm. They be the men of wit and policy that I see here."

men were in no respect superior to the regular clergy, either in learning or morals; but their discourses, though crude and coarse, and frequently directed rather to the enforcement of the superstitious practices of the church, than to the exposition of the simple and sublime principles of Christian faith, tended nevertheless to keep alive the spirit of national piety. Sir David Lindsay, in his poem of the Papingo, written in 1530, says,

"War nocht * the preaching of the begging frieris, Tynt † war the faith among the secularis."

As these mendicant friars were regarded with feelings of mingled jealousy and contempt by the regular clergy, and from their associating on familiar terms with the common people caught something of the popular spirit and opinions, they began to assail, with no ordinary vehemence, the wealth, indolence, and pride of the ecclesiastical dignitaries, and contributed to increase the odium in which these were generally held. The censures of the church, which at first inspired the greatest dread, began gradually to lose their terrors; and even so early as the reign of James II. it became necessary to enforce them by civil penalties. This result was chiefly owing to the clergy themselves, who, by their scandalous abuse of this grand engine of priestly power, brought it at last into general contempt. The defence of William Airth, a friar, who was summoned to answer to the charge of having calumniated the clergy, may be cited as an illustration. Airth appeared at St. Andrews, before his judges, consisting not only of the doctors and masters belonging to the University, but of several of the dignitaries of the church; and having selected for his theme, "Verity is the strongest of all things," proceeded to argue, that cursing, if it were rightly used, was the most fearful thing on the face of the earth, for it was the very separation of man from God; but that it should not be used rashly, nor for every light cause. But now, said he, "the avarice of the priests, and their ignorance of their office, has caused it altogether to be vilipended; † for the priest, whose duty it is to pray for the people, will stand up on Sunday, and exclaim, 'Anne has lost her spindle.' 'There is a flail stolen behind the barn.' 'The good woman on the other side of the way has lost a horn spoon.' 'God's curse and mine I give to them that know of these things, and restore them not.'" In proof of the contempt into which this desecration of the censures of the church had brought the office of the ministry, the friar proceeded to relate to his audience a 'merry tale.' "After a sermon that he had preached at Dunfermline, he said he entered a house where gossips were drinking their Sunday's penny; and he being dry, asked drink. 'Yes, father,' said one of the gossips, 'ye shall have drink, but ye maun first resolve ane doubt which is risen amongst us, to wit, What servant will serve a man best on least expense.' 'The good angel,' said I, 'who is man's keeper, and makes great service without expense.' 'Tush,' said the gossip, 'we mean no so high matters, we mean what honest man will do the greatest service for the least expense.' And while I was musing, said the friar, what that should mean, he said, 'I see, father, that the greatest clerks are not the wisest men. Know ye not how the bishops and their officials servo us husbandmen? Will they not give to us a letter of cursing for a plack, to last for a year, to curso all that look over our dyke (fence); and that keeps our corn better nor the sleeping boy, that will have three shillings of fee, a sark (shirt) and pair of shoon (shoes) in the year. And if their cursing do anything, we hold the bishops the best cheap servants in that behalf that are within the realm.' " The testimony of Airth is entitled to respect, as besides being a worthy specimen of his order, he was warmly attached to the church, and remained through life its devoted adherent. When driven from Scotland by the persecutions of his enemies, he fled to England, where he was imprisoned for defending the claims of the Pope, and the doctrines of the Roman Catholic faith, against the encroachments of Henry VIII. †

While the scandalous lives of many of the clergy and their ambition and avarice were rapidly alienating the affections of the people from the church, the doctrines of the Lollards were making silent but rapid progress in the country. The tenets of Resby and Paul Crawar werestill cherished by great numbers of the Scottish people, though the fate of these intrepid martyrs prevented for a time any open display of sympathy for their opinions. At first little notice seems to have been taken by the bishops of the spread of these new doctrines, either because they were ignorant of the extent to which they prevailed, or had ceased to fear their influence; but at length in 1494, during the reign of James IV., Blackadder, Archbishop of Glasgow, summoned no less than thirty persons from the districts of Kyle

† The Scottish parliament passed an act on the subject, on the 12th of June, 1533, in which the cause of this disregard of the censures of the church is mainly attributed to "the dampnable persuasions of heretick and their perversit doctrine," which, it is added, "gave occasion to lightly (or despye) the process of cursing and other censures of holy kirk." (Acts. of Parl. vol. ii. p. 342.) There is a singular production by one of the early Scottish poets, a priest named Sir John Rowll, called his 'Cursing,' which exemplifies the abuses to which this process was perverted. It was written between 1492 and 1502, and is directed chiefly against the stealers, among other articles,

"Of fyve fat geese of Sir John Rowll, With caponis, hennis, and uther fowls;"

but it also contains a general invective against persons who defraud the clergy of their tithes or dues. It appears from certain entries in the Treasurer's Books that even ecclesiastical persons were not exempted from such censures, for on the 3rd of November, 1533, payment was made of forty shillings to Sir John Smyth, notary, "to pass and to execute the process upon the Abbot of Melrose and the Prioress of Jedburgh, for non-payment of their taxes;" and on the 1st of June, 1534, the sum of twenty shillings was made to "ane chaplain to pass to curse the Prioress of North Berwick and Eccles for non-payment of their taxes."—Knox's History, vol. i. p. 33, note.

and Cunningham, in Ayrshire, to appear before the Lollards of council, to answer on a charge of heresy. These were not illiterate and unimportant individuals, but comprehended George Campbell of Cessnock, John Campbell of Newmilns, Adam Reid of Barskimming, Andrew Shaw of Polkemmet, and the Ladies Stair and Polkellie, besides other persons of note in the subsequent struggles for religious freedom. They were designated the Lollards of Kyle, and stood charged with no less than thirty-four articles of heresy, the more prominent of which consisted in condemning the worship of images; veneration for relics; and the offering of prayers to the Virgin Mary; the rejection of the doctrine of transubstantiation, and the denial of the lawfulness of tithes, the supremacy of the Pope as the successor of Peter, and that the mass is of the nature of a sacrifice for sin. The issue of the trial signally disappointed the expectations of their enemies. So ably was the defence conducted by their leader, Adam Reid, a man of strong judgment and ready wit, that the king who was present treated the proceedings with ridicule; and it was thought prudent to dismiss the accused with a caution to beware of new doctrines, and content themselves with the faith of the church. Their peculiar opinions became thus generally known, and the failure of this attempt to suppress them by force gave a powerful impetus to the progress of Scriptural truth.*

An interesting incident of a similar kind, which occurred about this period, affords satisfactory evidence that the New Testament in the vernacular tongue, in manuscript, was in existence and in use among the Scottish people under the reign of James IV. The narrative is contained in the reply of Alexander Ales to the calumnies of Cochæus, published in 1534.† Arguing in favour of the reading of the Scriptures, especially in families at home, and addressing James V., the writer says:—"I will now add the decisions of princes; and, that I may omit others, I will relate to you a domestic example. I remember the most excellent king, your father, a very brave prince, by a remarkable testimony approved of this domestic practice. There was in your kingdom a man, not only of rank, but also distinguished for his exalted piety—John Campbell, Laird of Cessnock. His house might have been an example of Christian instruction, for he had a priest at home, who read to him and his family the New Testament in their vernacular language; and the morals, both of himself and of his family, corresponded with the glad tidings. He also assisted the poor in all kind offices; and although he had learned from the Gospel that superstition and hypocrisy are displeasing to God; that he might not seem partial to any rank, he was wont to receive also the monks into his hospitable abode. There, when he at times would familiarly converse with his guests upon Christian doctrine, certain hypocrites, as it happened, understood that he attacked some of their superstitions. At last, his mind having been often sounded, the monks, violating the law of hospitality, and, as it is said, 'passing by the eating-table and the salt,' they carried his name to the bishop, and accused him of heresy.

"In that suit, when, after a long disputation, it appeared that both he and his wife were in danger of their lives, Campbell appealed to the king. Although the monks were grievously offended that the king should call the cause before himself, still he thought it belonged to his good faith and humanity that to good and noble men he should not fail to do his duty. He therefore graciously heard the cause on both sides; and when the husband, from natural reserve, and not a little agitated by fear of the monks, answered with modesty, the king commanded the wife to plead the cause. She then, quoting the Scriptures, refuted the charges brought against them so distinctly and wisely, that the king not only acquitted the defendants, Campbell, with his wife and the priest; but also, rising up, he caressed the woman, and extolled her diligence in Christian doctrine. Having severely reproved the monks, he threatened, that if ever after they created trouble of this sort to such honourable and innocent persons, he would punish them severely. To Campbell himself, indeed, he presented certain villages, that there might remain an honourable token of his decision, and of his good-will towards him; lest there should be supposed to lurk in his (the king's) mind any suspicion against Campbell because of the accusation of the monks."

With regard to the first introduction into Scotland of the sacred Scriptures in a printed form, it has recently been discovered, that Tyndale's version of the New Testament was imported into the country in the year 1526, nearly about the same time that it found its way into England. The proof of this interesting fact is furnished by a letter of John Hackett, the English ambassador to the Netherlands.* It appears that a considerable number of copies of Tyndale's translation of the New Testament had been discovered in Antwerp, and that Hackett had exerted himself to procure the destruction of these books, 'for the preservation of the Christian faith.' At this period a considerable traffic was carried on between Scotland and the Low Countries; and certain of the Scottish merchants, who, by the authority of parliament, generally went along with their goods, had purchased a considerable number of the obnoxious volumes, and conveyed them to their own country, before Hackett was able to 'see justice done' upon them. In a letter which this busy agent of the English Romanists addressed to Cardinal Wolsey, dated from Mechlin on the 20th of February, 1526-7, there is the following account of this incident:—"I trust by this time that your Grace has ample information of such execution and justice as has been done in the towns of Antwerp and Barrow (now Bergen-op-Zoom) upon all such English books as we could find in these countries, similar to three such other books as your Grace sent unto me, with my Lord the Bishop of London's signature. By my last writing to Mr. Brian Tuke, I advertised him how that there were divers merchants of Scotland that bought many of such-like books, and took them into Scotland;—a part to Edinburgh, and most part to the town of St. Andrew's. For the which cause, when I was at Barrow, being advertised that the Scottish ships were in Zealand—for there the said books were laden—I went suddenly thitherward, thinking, if I had found such stuff there, that I would cause to make as good a fire of them, as there has been done of the remnant in Brabant; but fortune would not that I should be in time; for the foresaid ships were departed a day afore my coming. So I must take patience for all my labour, with leaving my Lady Margaret's letters, and good instructions with my Lord of Bever, and [the Scottish Conservator in Flanders, Mr. John Moffat,] concerning the foresaid business."

When this important event took place the Scottish primate was a fugitive, in terror of his life, in consequence of his quarrel with the Douglasses; so that the importation of the sacred volume appears to have been carried on without hinderance for several years.

During the concluding years of the fifteenth and the earlier part of the sixteenth century, no persecuting measures deserving of notice were employed against the adherents of the new faith. The untimely death of James IV., and the distracted condition of the country during the minority of his son, engrossed the attention alike of the ecclesiastical and civil rulers; while the contests for supremacy between the rival sees of St. Andrews and Glasgow, were favourable to the spread of the reformed doctrines, by suspending for a time the vigilant jealousy of the church. On the elevation, however, of James Beaton to the primacy of St. Andrews, matters speedily took a less favourable turn; and under the direction of this active prelate, the ecclesiastical courts, now thoroughly alive to the dangers which menaced the hierarchy by the circulation of the writings of Luther and the other reformers, took prompt and vigorous measures to prevent the increase of the principles of the Reformation. The first victim of priestly intolerance was Patrick Hamilton, a noble youth, whose eminent acquirements, unfeigned piety, and resolute bearing amid the horrors of martyrdom, have deservedly embalmed his name in the grate-
 Martyrdom of Patrick Hamilton—
 and the grandson of the Lord Hamilton who married

a sister of James III. His mother was a daughter of John Alexander, Duke of Albany, the second son of King James II. From his birth he was designed for the church, and accordingly in childhood had conferred on him the abbacy of Ferne.* It is uncertain at what period he adopted the religious opinions for which he afterwards suffered; but his altered manner, combined with the preference which he manifested for ancient literature instead of the barren philosophy taught in the schools, and his condemnation of the abuses of the church, appear early to have drawn on him the suspicions of the priesthood. With the view of escaping the consequences of this jealousy, and of acquiring a deeper insight into the reformed opinions, that he might afterwards more intelligently explain and defend them, Hamilton left Scotland for Germany, then heaving under the impulses of that new life which the Reformation had created. In the city of Wittenberg he visited Luther, and his amiable colleague Melancthon, who, won by the genius, piety, and thirst for knowledge displayed by the young Scotsman, entered warmly into his plans of study; and after instructing him in the principles of Scriptural truth, recommended him to the care of Francis Lambert of Avignon, who then presided over the College of Marbourg. Under this learned and devoted reformer, who had given up an excellent situation in his own country for the sake of his principles, Hamilton made rapid progress in learning, and mastered the great points of controversy between the Roman Catholic and Protestant churches. He was now seized with an irresistible desire to revisit Scotland, for the purpose of disseminating among his countrymen the views which he had adopted. He returned therefore in 1527, and began a course of preaching in which the distinctive doctrines of Christianity were boldly proclaimed, and the errors of the Romish church as faithfully exhibited and denounced. His noble birth, great talents, youthful appearance (he was then only twenty-eight), and winning rhetoric, attracted crowds who listened with eager delight to his discourses; and the clergy becoming greatly alarmed resolved to destroy him. This however could not be easily effected; for besides his near relationship to the king, the young reformer manifested a prudent caution in his public discourses, contented himself with proclaiming the simple truths of the gospel, so that it was difficult to fasten upon him the charge of heresy. It was at last resolved to obtain possession of his person, and by artful means to draw from him such admission of his views as would justify the summary proceedings which were contemplated. He was accordingly decoyed to St. Andrews, under the pretext that the clergy desired a free conference with him on important matters of Christian faith and practice; and when he arrived in the city, Beaton, the archbishop, instructed Alexander Campbell, a Dominican friar, to insinuate himself into his confidence, and under pretence of conscientious doubts regarding the disputed points, to extract from him an avowal of his opinions. This base scheme was completely successful. Hamilton, interested by the well-feigned anxieties of the friar, and encouraged by what seemed the gradual triumph of truth over error, disclosed every secret of his mind; and the unscrupulous tool, having gained his end, returned to his employer, and reported the gratifying result of his visits. The plot was now deemed ripe for execution, and Hamilton was apprehended during the night, and committed to the castle. On the following day he was summoned before the ecclesiastical court at which Beaton presided, assisted by the Bishops of Glasgow, Dunkeld, and Brechin, besides many other dignitaries of the church. Campbell appeared as his accuser, and charged him with holding the following tenets:—1. That corruption of sin remains in children after their baptism. 2. That no man by the power of his free will can do any good. 3. That no man is without sin as long as he liveth. 4. That every true Christian may know himself to be in a state of grace. 5. That a man is not justified by works, but by faith only. 6. That good works make not a good man, but that a good man doeth good works, and an ill man ill works, although these ill works, if truly repented, do not make an ill man. 7. That faith, hope, and charity, are so linked together, that he that hath one of them hath all, and he that wanteth one wanteth all. 8. That God is the cause of sin in this sense,—that he withdraweth his grace from man, and grace withdrawn he cannot but sin. 9. That it is devilish doctrine to teach that by any actual penance remission of sin is purchased. 10. That auricular confession is not necessary to salvation. 11. That there is no purgatory. 12. That the holy patriarchs were in heaven before Christ's passion. 13. That the Pope is antichrist; and 14. That every priest hath as much power as the Pope.*

* Hamilton however was merely titular Abbot of Ferne, and was not in holy orders. Ferne is a parish in the eastern part of the shire of Ross. The abbey was founded by Farquhard, first Earl of Ross, in the reign of Alexander III.

To the first seven of these articles Hamilton gave an unqualified assent, "whereunto he offered to set his hand; the rest he said were disputable points, but such as he could not condemn unless he saw better reason than yet he had heard." The council, after some discourse with the accused, deliberated upon the articles, and pronounced the whole of them to be heretical and contrary to the faith of the church; on which sentence was immediately passed against the accused, condemning him to the flames; while to give to it greater weight, not only were the signatures of the bishops and ecclesiastics present attached, but those of persons of rank attending the university, among whom was the Earl of Cassilis, a boy only thirteen years of age. Hamilton received sentence of death on the 28th of February, 1528;* and in the afternoon of that day he was conducted to the stake, which had been erected in front of the College of St. Salvador,† his judges being desirous it is said to anticipate the return of the king, who was absent at that time on a pilgrimage to St. Duthoc, in Ross-shire,‡ as well as to strike terror by his sudden and terrible fate. The calm and intrepid demeanour of the young martyr, during the closing scene of his life, is narrated with simple pathos by Spottiswood. "Being come to the place he put off his gown, and gave it, with his bonnet, coat, and other apparel, to his servant, saying, 'This stuff will not help in the fire, yet will do thee some good. I have no more to leave thee but the ensample of my death, which I pray thee keep in mind; for albeit the same be bitter and painful in man's judgment, yet is it the entrance to everlasting life, which none can inherit that denieth Christ before the congregation.' Then was he tied to the stake; about it a great quantity of coal, wood, and other combustible matter was heaped, whereof he seemed to have no fear, but seriously commending his soul into the hands of God, held his eyes seriously fixed on the heavens. The executioner firing the powder that was laid to kindle the wood, his left hand and the side of his face were a little scorched therewith; yet the fire did not kindle. Whereupon some were sent to the castle to bring more powder; whilst this was bringing, he uttered divers comfortable speeches to them that stood by: the friars all that time molesting him with their cries, bidding him convert, pray to our Lady, and say Salve Regina. Amongst them none was more troublesome than friar Alexander Campbell, who, as we said, kept company with him at his first coming to the city; often he besought him to depart and not to vex him; but when he would not cease his crying, he said, 'Wicked man, thou knowest that I am not an heretic, and that it is the truth of God for which I now suffer; so much thou didest confess unto me in private, and thereupon I appeal thee to answer before the judgment-seat of Christ.' The powder by this time was brought, and the fire kindled; after which with a loud voice he was heard to say, 'How long, O Lord, shall darkness oppress this realm? How long wilt thou suffer the tyranny of men?' and then closed his speeches with these words, 'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!'"§ for which he suffered. The harmony of these with Scripture became more apparent from examination; and the heroism which the youthful martyr had displayed during his trial and execution, attested their wonderful influence in supporting the soul amid the most execrating tortures. A little treatise in Latin, composed by Hamilton, containing a brief but clear statement of the plan of salvation, and a commentary on the Christian graces, was extensively circulated, and contributed to deepen and perpetuate the impressions which his preaching had produced.* Nor was the miserable end of Campbell, his betrayer, without its influence in strengthening the general persuasion that he had suffered for the truth. Stung by the reproaches of conscience, and unable to dismiss from his memory the horrid scene which he had witnessed, and the dying abjurations of his victim, the reason of the unhappy friar at last gave way, and he died at Glasgow about a year afterwards, in a frenzy of madness. It was a common saying at the time, "That the smoke of Mr. Patrick Hamilton had infected as many as it blew upon."† In St. Andrews, the scene of the tragedy, and the head-quarters of the persecutors, the opinions of the martyr made daily progress. Gawin Logie, principal of St. Leonard's College, and John Winram, the sub-prior, taught the principles of the Reformation to the students of the university, and the younger monks and noviciates of the abbey; so that it was customary to say of a suspected Lutheran, that he had drunk of the well of St.

Leonard's. The king's own confessor, Alexander Seton,‡ a Dominican friar, became imbued with the new opinions, and boldly denounced the corrupt doctrines of the priests. He was in the habit of teaching that the law of God had been obscured by their traditions; that Christ was the end and perfection of the law; that man has no power to forgive sins, but that pardon can be obtained only by repentance and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. His commanding eloquence and ready access to the king rendered his influence doubly dangerous; and having in a public sermon at St. Andrews not only vindicated the doctrines he had previously taught, but openly declared that according to the Scriptures bishops ought to preach, and that they who did it not were dumb dogs, who fed not the flock, but their own bellies, he was summoned to appear before the archbishop, to answer for his language. "Your informers, my lord," said the friar, "must have been very ignorant persons, who cannot discern between Paul, Isaiah and Zechariah, and Friar Alexander Seton. I said indeed that St. Paul declared that bishops ought to preach; and that the prophet Isaiah that they who feed not the flock are dumb dogs; but of my own authority I affirmed nothing, but merely declared what the Spirit of God had before pronounced at whom, my lord, if you be not offended, you cannot justly be offended at me." The archbishop was highly indignant at this mode of reasoning, but he was afraid to take any open measures against Seton (for he was a person of great learning, courage, and influence), until by artful misrepresentations he succeeded in poisoning the king's mind against him. This was not difficult to accomplish, as James had been galled by his confessor's honest reproofs of his licentious conduct; and Seton, perceiving that 'the king's countenance towards him was changed,' retired from Scotland, and sought shelter in Berwick; from whence he wrote a letter to the king, offering to justify himself in his presence from the charges of his accusers, if he were allowed a safe conduct, and liberty of speech. To this offer no answer was vouchsafed; and Seton ultimately proceeded to London, where he became chaplain to the Duke of Suffolk, under whose protection he continued till his death, in the year 1542.*

The clergy were now thoroughly alarmed at the progress of the new opinions, and strove to extirpate them by the adoption of the most sanguinary measures. During the ten years which followed the death of Patrick Hamilton, a considerable number of persons in various parts of the country suffered martyrdom for their adherence to the cause of truth. Henry Forrest, a Benedictine monk, a native of Linlithgow, was arrested and thrown into prison by Archbishop Beaton, probably about the year 1532, on the charge that he had termed Patrick Hamilton a martyr, and affirmed that he was unjustly put to death, as the articles for which he was condemned were true. According to Foxe, he had expressed these sentiments under the seal of confession, to a friar named Walter Laing, who immediately reported them to Beaton. Forrest's confession was produced in evidence against him, and he was condemned to the flames as a pestilent heretic, 'equal in iniquity with Master Patrick Hamilton.' After being degraded from his holy orders, he was burnt at the north church-stile of the abbey church of St. Andrews, "to the intent," says Foxe, "that all the people of Angus might see the fire, and so might be the more feared from falling into the like doctrine."† Two years later (27th August, 1534), David Straiton and Norman Gourlay, a priest, were condemned to the stake. Straiton was a gentleman of good family, brother to the Laird of Lauriston. He had quarrelled with the Vicar of Ecclesgreig,* respecting the payment of tithes; and indignant at the exactions of the priest, he had directed his servants to cast every tenth fish they caught into the sea, and to bid the vicar's men seek their tax where he found the stock. In consequence of these violent proceedings, the thunders of the church were directed against him, and when these produced no effect, he was summoned to answer for heresy. Meanwhile he had received instruction in the principles of the Protestant faith, from the celebrated John Erskine of Dun, one of the earliest of the reformers, and had undergone a great change in his character and conduct. "He had before been very stubborn," says Calderwood, "and despised all reading, specially of good purposes; now he delighted in nothing but reading, albeit he could not read himself; and exhorted every man to peace and concord, and to the contempt of the world." It is related that, listening to a portion of the New Testament, which was read to him by the Laird of Lauriston, he came upon that passage where our Saviour says, 'He that denieth me before men, I will deny him in the presence of my Father and before his angels;' upon which he was deeply moved, and falling down on his knees, and extending his hands, he earnestly prayed, that although he had been a great sinner, God would never permit him to deny Him or his truth, from the fear of death or bodily torment. Norman Gourlay, who was 'a man of reasonabell condition,' was accused of having denied the existence of purgatory, and having affirmed that the Pope was antichrist, and had no jurisdiction in Scotland. He had been abroad, and had married upon his return, which was the chief offence for which he suffered. For as Pitscottie remarks, while the utmost licentiousness was freely tolerated by the ecclesiastical courts, "they would thole (suffer) no priest to marry, but they would punish and burn him to the dead."† Straiton and Gourlay were cited to answer for their alleged heretical opinions before an ecclesiastical court, which was held in the abbey of Holyrood. Henry, Bishop of Ross, presided as commissioner for the Archbishop of St. Andrews, and the king himself took his seat upon the bench, completely clothed in scarlet, the judicial costume of the time. Every effort was made to induce Straiton to purchase his pardon by abjuring his faith; but he steadily refused to listen even to the earnest solicitations of the king himself, who seemed anxious to save his life. He was executed along with his fellow-sufferer, at the Rod or cross of Greenside, on the Calton-hill of Edinburgh.‡

On the death of James Beaton, Archbishop of St. Andrews, his nephew, David Beaton, was appointed to the vacant see; and the elevation of this able but profligate prelate to the dignity of a cardinal and the primacy of the Scottish church, was speedily followed by a renewed and more inveterate persecution of the reformers. —of friar Keilor, a black friar; Sir Dunean Simpson, a priest; John Beveridge, also a black friar; Forrester, a notary in Stirling; and Dean Thomas Forret, Vicar of Dollar, and canon regular of the monastery of St. Colm's Inch—were summoned to appear before a council, presided over by Cardinal Beaton, and Chisholm, Bishop of Dunblane,* and were all condemned to the stake. Friar Keilor had, according to the custom of the times, composed a tragedy on the crucifixion of Christ, in which, under the character of the chief priests and Pharisees, who persuaded the people to reject our Saviour, and Pilate to condemn him, he painted in vivid colours the conduct of the bishops, who induced princes and judges to persecute the disciples of Christ. This play, which was acted before the king at Stirling, on the morning of a Good Friday, appears to have excited the most lively indignation among the clergy. The Vicar of Dollar, who suffered along with Keilor, belonged to the house of Forret, or Forest, in Fife, and was the son of the Master of the royal stables in the reign of James IV. After acquiring the rudiments of grammar in his native country, he was sent abroad by the kindness of a noble lady, for the purpose of completing his education at Cologne. Returning to Scotland, he was admitted a canon regular in the monastery of St. Colm's Inch. It happened that a dispute arose between the abbot and the canons respecting their allowance, and the latter got the book of the foundation, that they might examine into their rights. The abbot took the book from them, and gave them in its stead a volume of Augustine, which was in the monastery. "O happy and blessed was that book to me," did Forret often say, "by which I came to the knowledge of the truth." The study of the sacred Scriptures led him to embrace the doctrines of the reformed faith, and with the simple fearlessness of his nature he imparted his new views to his brethren in the monastery. He was successful in his efforts to convert the younger canons, 'but the old bottles,' he used to say, 'would not receive the new wine.' The abbot frequently advised him to say as others said, and to keep his mind to himself, else he would incur punishment. "I thank you, my lord," was his reply, "ye are a friend to my body, but not to my soul. Before I deny a word that I have spoken, ye shall see this body of mine consumed to ashes, and blown away with the wind." He was afterwards admitted to the vicarage of Dollar, where he rendered himself obnoxious to his superiors by his diligence in preaching to his parishioners, a duty then invariably abandoned to the orders of friars, and by his generosity in relieving them from oppressive exactions. He taught his flock the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, and the Ten Commandments, in the vulgar tongue; and also prepared a little catechism for the instruction of the young, and exhorted them all to look for salvation only through the blood of Christ. He was a diligent student, especially of the sacred Scriptures, and was most assiduous in the discharge of all the duties of the pastoral office. In his visitation of the sick and poor of his parish, he was in the habit of carrying provisions in his gownsleeve, to relieve their temporal wants while he fed their souls with the bread of life. When the agents of the Pope came into his bounds to sell indulgences, he said, "Parishioners, I am bound to speak the truth to you; this is but to deceive you. There is no pardon for our sins that can come to us either from Pope or any other, but solely by the blood of Christ." He incurred the enmity of his clerical brethren by refusing to exact what was termed the corpse-present, consisting of the best cow and uppermost cloth belonging to the deceased, which were claimed as a due by the vicar of the parish.* At the instigation of the friars, he was repeatedly summoned before the Bishop of Dunkeld, in whose diocese he resided, and accused of preaching and explaining the mysteries of the Scriptures to the people in the mother tongue. The Bishop, who seems to have been favourably disposed towards Forret, remonstrated with him, respecting his practice of preaching every Sunday, observing with great simplicity, that by so doing he might make the people think that the prelates ought to preach likewise. "It is enough for you," he added, "when you find any good epistle or any good gospel, that setteth forth the liberty of the holy church, to preach that, and let the rest alone." Forret replied that he had read both the Old and the New Testaments, and had never found an ill gospel or epistle in any of them; but if his lordship would point them out, he would preach the good and omit the evil. "Nay, brother Thomas, my joy, that I cannot do," said the bishop, "for I thank God I never knew either the Old or New Testament.† I will know nothing but my breviary and my pontifical; but go your way, and leave these fancies alone, else you will repent it when you may not mend it." When brought to —his execution.

Castle-hill of Edinburgh (March 1, 1538-39), he was annoyed by the impertunity of a friar named Hardbuckle, who urged him, but in vain, to pray to the Virgin Mary. The New Testament was then plucked from his bosom by one of the attendants, who held it up before the people, and cried 'heresy! heresy!' Then the crowd shouted, 'Burn him! burn him!' To which the martyr meekly responded, 'God be merciful to me a sinner.' 'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit.' He was then fastened to the stake, and continued to recite portions of the Psalms as long as consciousness remained.* Foxe says, that three or four men of Stirling suffered death at the same time, because they were present at the marriage of "the Vicar of Tullibody, and did eat flesh in Lent at the said bridal."

In the same year Jerome Russell, a grey friar, and Ninian Kennedy, a youth of ^{Martyrdom of Russell and Kennedy} eighteen years of age, were convicted of heresy, and burnt at Glasgow, in spite of the intercession of Archbishop Dunbar,† that their lives might be spared. Kennedy, who is said by Knox to have possessed a fine genius for Scottish poetry, quailed for a moment at the prospect of a death so dreadful, and it was expected that he would recant; but the exhortations of his fellow-sufferer, Russell, speedily restored his fortitude, and falling upon his knees, he expressed in ardent language his gratitude to God, who had saved him from the guilt of apostasy. "Now," said Russell, addressing his persecutors, "I defy death. Do what you please. I praise God I am ready. Now is your hour and the power of darkness; ye now sit in judgment, whilst we stand before you, falsely accused and most wrongfully condemned. But the day is coming when we shall have our innocence declared, and ye shall discover your blindness; meanwhile proceed, and fill up the measure of your iniquities.‡"

Besides those who suffered martyrdom, many persons, chiefly belonging to the ^{Protestant exiles.} inferior clergy, who had adopted the new opinions, were compelled to consult their safety by a hasty flight from the kingdom. Gawin Logie, principal of St. Leonard's College, St. Andrews, who contributed so much to spread the reformed doctrines, became at last suspected by the clergy, and found it necessary to consult his safety by escaping to England in 1533. Alexander Aless, a canon of St. Andrews, was so well versed in the chief points of the Lutheran controversy, that he undertook to reclaim Patrick Hamilton from his heresy; but the conversation of the martyr, and his constancy in death, produced so powerful an impression upon the mind of Aless, that he became a convert to the new faith. A discourse delivered by him against the vices of the clergy, brought upon him a charge of heresy, and he was thrown into prison, from which, however, after a year's confinement, he escaped to the Continent, and in 1540, became professor of divinity in the University of Leipsic.* John Fyfe also, who prosecuted his studies under Gawin Logie, at St. Andrews, fled in company with Ales to the Continent, where he obtained considerable academical distinction. His name is inscribed as Professor of Philosophy and Divinity in the Registers of the University of Frankfort, in 1547: he was created a doctor, and chosen rector in 1551; and he died in 1562, in the 72nd year of his age.† About the same time, John McBee, better known by his classical surname of Maccabæus, fled to Denmark, where he became professor of divinity at Copenhagen; and besides rendering important service to Christian III., in the settlement of the reformed religion in his dominions, he assisted in translating the Scriptures into the Danish language. The researches of Dr. McCrie have discovered the singular fact, that the real name of this eminent Scotsman was McAlpine, and that he belonged to the proscribed clan of McGregor—a circumstance which sufficiently accounts for his changed patronymic.‡ In this list of illustrious refugees, we must include the name of the celebrated George Buchanan, who in consequence of a biting satire against the order of Franciscan monks was imprisoned, but escaped by the window of his bedchamber, while his keepers were asleep.§ At a later period (1540), Sir John Borthwick, a younger son of William, third Lord Borthwick, who was slain at Flodden, was cited before Cardinal Beaton, and other prelates, at St. Andrews, on a charge of heresy contained in twelve articles of accusation. He disappointed the vengeance of his enemies, by escaping to England; but he was nevertheless condemned and excommunicated, besides being burned in effigy at the market-cross of St. Andrews. Soon after these proceedings Borthwick wrote a defence of himself, in the form of answers to the several articles of accusation. This production, which has been preserved by Foxe in his Latin Commentaries, contains, besides the vindication of his own conduct, a spirited and caustic attack on the Papal pretensions and the abuses of the church. While danger and death thus hung over the advocates of the reformed faith, it continued to make rapid progress in the country. The national character, at once patient in investigating truth, and cool and resolute in maintaining it, had secured for the new opinions the assent, not only of a large portion of the common people, but of considerable numbers of the nobility and gentry. In 1540, the following persons were already recognised as the earnest abettors of the reformation. William, Earl of Glencairn; his son, Alexander, Lord Kilmaurs; William Earl of Errol; William Lord Ruthven; his daughter Lilius, married to the Master of Drummond; John Stewart, son of Lord Methven; Sir James Sandilands, with his whole family; Sir David Lindsay, of the Mount; Erskine, of Dun; Melville, of Raith; Balnaves, of Hall-hill; Straiton, of Lauriston, and William Johnston and Robert Alexander, advocates.*

It appears that the importation of the works of the continental reformers had contributed greatly to the diffusion of Protestant principles in Scotland, and repeated attempts were made by the legislature to prevent their dissemination. In 1525, it was enacted, that no foreign ^{Enactments} merchants should bring into ^{against the im-} the realm 'any books or works of the ^{portation of Pro-} great heretic Luther, and his disciples,' under the ^{testant works.} pain of imprisonment, and the forfeiture of their ships and cargoes.† From this it appears, that in the first instance, the books and opinions of the reformers were circulated by strangers, who came into Scotland for the purpose of trade; but it was soon found necessary to extend the penalties of the act to natives of the kingdom; and in 1627 it was declared by the chancellor and lords of the council, that "all other the king's lieges assistaris to sic opinyons be punist in semeible wise, and the effect of the said act to strike upon them." The rehearsal or discussion of these heresies was strictly forbidden, unless "it be to the confusion thereof, and that by clerks in the schools alenarlie," (alone). These enactments were embodied in another statute, which was adopted by the parliament in 1535; and all persons who had any of the alleged heretical works in their possession were commanded to deliver them up to their ordinary, within forty days, under the penalty of confiscation and imprisonment.‡

In May, 1536, a public proclamation was made, prohibiting the selling or reading of the New Testament in the vulgar tongue, § and the sacred volume was openly denounced by the clergy as the cause of 'all the din and play' which had taken place in the church. Two years later, the statutes against the possession and perusal of heretical works were enforced with increased rigour, and a considerable number of wealthy individuals were imprisoned and stript of their property for 'breaking his Highness' proclamation in having and using such books as are suspected of heresy, and are prohibited by the Kirk.¶

As the principles of the Reformation continued to gain ground, the apprehensions of the clergy were manifested by the increasing severity of the statutes against heresy. In the parliament of 1540 it was made a capital crime to argue against the authority or spiritual infallibility of the Pope, all private conventicles, or meetings for the discussion of religious subjects, were strictly prohibited, and rewards were promised to those who revealed where they were held. No person even suspected of heresy was to be admitted to any office or privilege, either in the boroughs or elsewhere. Those who had fled from trial were to be held as confessed, and sentence passed against them; and so anxious was the church to protect her faithful subjects from the contamination of heresy, that all intercourse was forbidden with those who had at any time held heretical opinions, even although they had abjured their errors and received absolution. The exhortations which were at the same time given to the churchmen to reform their lives, and to attend more faithfully to their duties, show that the national council was well aware that the danger which now threatened the Popish church might be traced directly to the idleness, corruption, and ignorance of the clergy. A law which was passed by this parliament against the demolition of the shrines and images of the saints makes it evident that the iconoclastic spirit which afterwards raged with such violence in Scotland, had already manifested itself among the lower classes of the community.* During the last years of the reign of James V., the clergy obtained a predominant influence in the royal councils, and the project of Beaton, and the prelates, for the wholesale condemnation of the reformers, shows the desperate measures to which the hierarchy were prepared to resort for the extirpation of the new doctrines. And there can be little doubt that if the life of the unhappy monarch had been prolonged, an open struggle between the professors of the old and the new faith could not have been much longer averted.

CHAPTER XXIV.

LITERARY HISTORY OF THE PERIOD.

THE progress of literature during this period was considerable, and the establishment of several schools of learning indicated a desire at least to promote the moral and intellectual improvement of the people. In the month of January, 1450, at the request of Bishop Turnbull, a bull was granted for the foundation of a university in the City of Glasgow, by Nicholas V., 'a Pope distinguished by his talent and erudition, and particularly by his munificent patronage of Grecian literature.' The pious bishop did not leave the institution which he had founded to languish for lack of support. He endowed it out of his own revenues, establishing a chancellor, rector, dean of faculty, a principal who taught theology, and three professors of philosophy. Other royal and episcopal charters were subsequently granted by James II. (20th April, 1453), by Bishop Muirhead (1st July, 1461), and by King James III., (10th Dec., 1472). And in 1460 the first Lord Hamilton bestowed upon the infant university a piece of ground, with the buildings upon it, in the High-street of the city, on which the college stands at the present day. At first, however, it was very scantily endowed, and such was the insecurity of the times, and the general indifference to learning, that so late as the year 1521 it was attended by a very small number of students.* A second university was founded at St. Andrews about the year 1455, by the excellent Bishop Kennedy, a nephew of James I., and † one of the most illustrious names in Scottish history. In the first foundation charter which was conferred by Pope Nicholas V., the college is said to be built for theology and the liberal arts. It was dedicated to the honour of God, of our Saviour, and the Virgin —of St. Salvador's Mary, and was named St. Salvador's College— College. The institution was established for the maintenance of a provost, licentiate, and bachelor, who were all to be in holy orders and to lecture on theology on certain days in the week, —four masters of arts, and six 'poor elergymen.' The good bishop endowed the college with the tields of the parishes of Cults, Kemback, Denino, and Kilmany, and several chapelrics, all of which had till then belonged to the bishopric; and as

† The mother of this eminent prelate (see ante, p. 347) was Mary, a daughter of Robert III., who gave birth to the last Bishop and first Archbishop of St. Andrews, and was married four times: first to the Earl of Angus, by whom she had two sons, William and George Douglas, who successively became Earls of Angus; second to Sir James Kennedy, of Dunure, by whom she had two sons, James, the bishop, and Gilbert, afterwards created Lord Kennedy, the ancestor of the present Marquis of Ailsa; third to Lord Graham, of Dundresmore, by whom she had two sons, James Graham the first Laird of Fintray, and Patrick Graham the first Archbishop of St. Andrews; and fourth to Sir William Edmiston, of Culloden.

Martine informs us, bestowed upon the new institution "not only stoles for the priests, dalmatic tunics and copes, but chalices, goblets, basins, ewers, candelabras, censers, and crosses, and an image of the Saviour two cubits long, besides various gold and silver utensils; also large bells, small musical bells, and silk tapestry for adorning the church: in short, there was nothing outside or inside the college which did not evince the piety, taste, and munificence of the founder."* In the year 1512 a third college was founded at St. Andrews, under the title of St. Leonard's College, by Prior —and of St. Leonard's College, St. Andrews. John Hepburn, in conjunction with King James IV., and his son Alexander Stewart, Archbishop of St. Andrews, who fell along with his father in the fatal field of Flodden.† It was endowed with the tithes of St. Leonard's parish, with the revenues of an hospital which had been built for the reception of pilgrims who formerly repaired hither in great numbers to adore the relics of St. Andrew, and also with a variety of property which belonged to the prior and canons. The college was intended chiefly for the education of the members of the convent, but it soon acquired such a high reputation that many of the sons of the nobility and gentry repaired to it for instruction. The students, among other branches of education, were carefully instructed in sacred music, and became so celebrated for their skill in that art, that after the Reformation many of them were employed in teaching it.‡

Towards the close of the fifteenth century, King's College, Aberdeen, was erected at Of King's College, Aberdeen. the instance of the celebrated Bishop Elphinstone, who persuaded James IV. to apply for a bull from the Pope to carry the project into execution. Accordingly, in compliance with this application, a rescript was issued by Pope Alexander VI., 10th Feb., 1494, establishing a university in Old Aberdeen for the teaching of theology, canon and civil laws, medicine, and the liberal † Alexander Stewart studied at Sienna, under the celebrated Erasmus, who speaks in the highest terms of the progress of his pupil in Greek rhetoric and law, as well as in the practice of music. 'Even at meals he did not intermit his studies; the chaplain always read some useful book. At other times he would listen to tales, but short and connected with literature; and if he had any spare time he employed it in reading history, in which he took great delight. Nor did that happen to him which sometimes happens to others, 'the more apt at letters the less apt at morals,' for his morals were pure, yet mixed with uncommon prudence. Though his feelings were acute, he was remarkable for the mildness and moderation of his character. He greatly enjoyed wit and humour, but it was of a literary kind and not too caustic; in a word, he was religious without being superstitious. No king was ever blessed with a more accomplished son.' However great might be the merits of the royal student, it was certainly a gross abuse to elevate a youth of eighteen to the primacy of the Scottish Church. In the Appendix, Note XX., will be found two letters written by young Stewart, from Padua, to his father, which will serve to show the scandalous manner in which the patronage of the Church was disposed of in that age.

arts, and conferring upon the new institution all the privileges enjoyed by the universities of Paris and Bologna, two of the most highly favoured in Europe. It appears that the chief object of King James and the learned prelate in erecting this college was to introduce civilization and learning into the northern districts of the kingdom. In his letter to the pontiff the king gives a most deplorable account of the barbarous state of this part of his dominions. "The inhabitants," he alleges, "were ignorant of letters, and almost uncivilised; there were no persons to be found fit to preach the word of God to the people, or to administer the sacraments of the Church; and, besides, the country was so intersected with mountains and arms of the sea, or distant from the universities already erected (at St. Andrews and Glasgow), and the road so dangerous, that the youth had not access to the benefit of education in these seminaries. But," adds the king, "the City of Old Aberdeen is situated at a moderate distance from the highland country and northern islands, enjoys an excellent temperature of air, abundance of provisions, and the conveniency of habitations, and of everything necessary for human life." In allusion to these representations the bull states, that notwithstanding there were already two universities in Scotland, a third could in no sense be injurious, as "science has this distinguishing quality, that the diffusion of it tends, not to diminish, but increase the general mass." The members of the College were originally thirty-six in number; but by a second foundation, prepared by Bishop Elphinstone, but not published till 1531, seventeen years after his death, the number was raised to forty-two: namely, four doctors, in the faculties of theology, canon law, civil law, and medicine; eight masters in arts, three students of law (all the above, except the mediciner, to be ecclesiastics), thirteen poor scholars, eight prebends for the service of the College church, and six singing boys. No efforts were spared by the munificent prelate and his royal master to make the new university complete in all its educational arrangements. It was liberally endowed by the bishop during his life, and at his death he bequeathed to it the sum of £10,000 Scots—in those days a very large sum of money. Thus fostered, King's College soon became the most flourishing educational institution in Scotland. It was placed under an excellent system of management, and endowed with professors of eminent ability and learning; and it is not unworthy of notice that Hector Boece, the well-known biographer and historian, was its first principal.

In a parliament held during the same year in which King's College was founded, a remarkable law was passed, the chief object of which was to improve the attendance at the schools. Statute enjoining mainly, it is said, through the influence of Bishop Elphinstone, which is justly considered one of the most interesting acts of the Scottish legislature. By this memorable enactment it was ordained that, throughout all the realm, all barons and freeholders "that are of substance should put their eldest sons and heirs to the schools fra they be six or nine years of age, and to remain at the grammar schools until they be competently founded and have perfect Latin; and thereafter to remain three years at the schools of arts and jure (law), so that they have knowledge and understanding of the laws: Through the quick justice may remain universally through all the realm; so that they who are sheriffs, or judges ordinary, under the king's highness may have knowledge to do justice, that the poor people should have na need to seek our sovereign lord's auditor for ilk small injury; and what baron or freeholder of substance that holds not his son at the schools, having no lawful excuse, he shall pay to the king the sum of twenty pounds."*

A few years after the passing of this judicious act, the memorable invention of Introduction of printing, which had been imported printing into England by Caxton, as early as the year 1474, found its way into Scotland. Walter Chepman, a citizen of Edinburgh and a servant of the king's household, was the first Scottish printer. In the year 1508 he printed a volume of pamphlets and several of the poems of Dunbar; and in the following year the 'Breviary of Aberdeen.' His royal master, who in spite of his fondness for idle and frivolous amusements was a liberal friend to letters as well as to the useful and ornamental arts, patronized the ingenious typographer, both by purchasing books from him, and by granting him a royal patent to exercise his mystery.†

There can be no doubt that the establishment of the various colleges and schools throughout the country, together with the invention of printing and the importation of the works of continental authors, must have exercised a powerful influence upon the minds of the Scottish barons and gentry; softening the ferocity of their manners, and introducing among them a taste for liberal education. The unusual tranquillity, too, which, under the vigorous and wise administration of James IV., the nation enjoyed for a period of twenty-five years, must have been highly conducive both to the general prosperity of the country, and to the advancement of literature and art. Accordingly, we find that at this period there flourished in Scotland a considerable number of writers, whose learning and genius entitle them to rank with the most celebrated cotemporary authors, either in England or on the Continent. Among those distinguished Scotchmen, who, in the words of Warton, adorned the fifteenth century "with a degree of sentiment and spirit, a command of phraseology, and a fertility of imagination not to be found in any English poet since Chaucer and Lydgate," the chief place is due to Life of William Dunbar WILLIAM DUNBAR, who has been styled by the highest authority, "an excellent poet, unrivalled by any which Scotland ever produced." Of the personal history of that great genius little or nothing is known except what may be gathered from a few obscure hints, contained in his own verses. He describes himself as a native of Lothian, and appears to have been born about the middle of the fifteenth century, not later than the year 1460. Kennedy, a cotemporary poet, represents him as related to the Earl of March, and Mr. Laing conjectures, with great probability, that he was either the son or nephew of William, son of that Sir Patrick Dunbar of Beill who signalized himself on many occasions, and in 1426 was one of the hostages for James the First.† In the year 1475, when he was probably about fifteen or sixteen years of age, Dunbar was sent to St. Andrews, the most flourishing seat of learning and science at that period in Scotland. This fact Mr. Laing has ascertained from the old registers of the University, in which the name of William Dunbar is entered, in 1477, among the Determinantes or Bachelors of Arts, in St. Salvator's College; a degree which the students were not entitled to claim until the third year of their attendance. And two years later, in 1479, the name of the poet again occurs in the registers, as then having taken the degree of Master of Arts. From the colophon of one of his poems, there is reason to suppose that he also studied in the University of Oxford. At an early period of his life he was a novitiate of the order of St. Francis, and in that character travelled over England and a part of the Continent. This is evident from his poem entitled 'The Visitation of St. Francis.' Satan, in the guise of the Saint, appears to the poet in a vision, shortly before the dawn of day; and holding a religious habit in his hand, exhorts him to clothe himself in these vestments and to renounce the world. But at the sight of the seeming saint and his habit, the poet was scared like one who sees a ghost, and excuses himself with thanks for the intended benefit; observing, that in holy legends he had read of many bishops, but of exceeding few friars, that had been admitted to the honour of canonization,—

'Wherefore ga bring to me ane bishop's weid,
Gif ever thou wald my soul yeid unto heaven.'

He allows, however, that in his early years he had worn the obnoxious habit.

'Gif ever my fortune was to be a frier,
The date thereof is past full many a year,
For into every lusty town and place,
Of all England, fro Berwick to Cales,
I have unto thy habit made gude cheer.

In me, GOD wit, was mony wrink and wile;
In me was falsheit with ilk wight to flatter,

There can be no doubt, as Mr. Laing observes, that it was to this period of Dunbar's life that Kennedy alludes in his 'Flying,' when he taunts him with his pilgrimage as a pardoner, begging in all the churches from Ettrick Forest to Dumfries.

'Fra Ettrick Forest farth ward to Dumfries

It is not known how long Dunbar continued to lead this wandering life, nor how he employed himself after he had relinquished the character of friar. It seems certain, however, that he had visited foreign lands before he became attached to the Scottish court. In one of his poems he speaks of his long and faithful services to the king, and of his having been employed in many foreign countries, in England, Ireland, France, Spain, Italy, and Germany. His biographer conjectures with great probability, that in these extensive peregrinations he accompanied as 'ane clerk' the frequent embassies which James the Fourth was in the habit of sending to the continental courts; as the literary attainments of the clergy peculiarly fitted them for employment in such negotiations. In the register of the Privy Seal, 15th August, 1500, we find mention of a grant by King James IV. to Dunbar, of an annual pension of ten pounds 'for all the days of his life,' or until he be promoted by the king to a benefice of the yearly value of forty pounds, or upwards; and from this period the poet became an attendant upon the court of this gay and gallant monarch. It appears from the treasurer's accounts, that the payment due at Martinmas, 1501, was deferred on account of Dunbar's absence in England; a circumstance which shows that in all probability he accompanied the ambassadors who were sent to the English court to conclude the negotiations for the king's marriage in October, 1501, and that he remained to witness the ceremony of affiancing the Princess Margaret, which took place at St. Paul's Cross, with great solemnity and splendour, on the 25th of January, 1502. Under this supposition, there can be little doubt that Dunbar was the person then styled 'THE RHYMER OF SCOTLAND,' who received £6 13s. 4d. in reward from Henry VII., on the 31st of December, 1501, and a similar sum on the 7th of January following. ||| till July, 1503, and three months before her arrival in Scotland, on the 9th of May, Dunbar commemorated that auspicious event in his fine poem, 'The Thistle and the Rose,' which has been pronounced one of the most beautiful, and certainly the noblest, of all Prothalamia. It commences with the following exquisite stanzas:—

'When March was with varying winds past,
And April had, with her silver showers,
Tane leave of nature with an orient blast;
And Insty May, that mother is of flowers,
Had made the birdes to begin their hours,
Among the tender colours, red and white,
Whose harmony to hear it was delight.

'In bed ae morrow, sleeping as I lay,
Methocht Aurora, with her cristall ene,
In at the window lukit by the day,
And halsit me* with visage pale and grene,
Upon whose hand a lark sang fra the splene,
Awake, Invars, out of your slumbering,
See how the lusty morrow does up spring.

'Methocht fresh May before my bed np stood,
In weeds depaynt of mony divers hue,
Sober, benign, and full of mansactnde,
In brycht attire of flouris forgit new;
Hevinly of colour, white, red, brown, and blne,
Balmitt in dew and gilt with Phoebus' bemyss,† While all the house illumit of her lemys.‡

'Sngird, she said, awake anone for shame,
And in my honour something thou go write;
The lark has done the merry day proclame,
To raise np luvars with comfort and delyt;
Yet nocht incressis thy courag to indyte,
Whose hart sum tyme has glad and blissful bene,
Sangis to mak under the leaves grene.'

Somewhat ungraciously the poet excuses himself on account of the inclemency of the season, and May, soberly smiling, bids him rise and follow her, which he does into a garden redolent and resonant of all delight, for all flowers are there, and the birds are singing like the morning stars.

'The purple sun, with tender beams red
In orient brycht as angel did appear
Through golden skys putting np his head,
Whose gilt tresses shone so wonder clear,
That all the world tuke comfort, far and near,
To luke upon his fresh and blissful face
Doing all sable from the heaven's chase.

'And as the blisful sound of cherachys
The fowlis sang throw comfort of the licht;
The birds did with open voices cry,
O Invars foe, away thon dully nycht,
And welcome Day that comforts every wicht,
Hail May, hail Flora, hail Aurora|| schene,
Hail Princess Nature, hail Venus, luvis queen.'

Nature herself then appears to the poet, and for his sake bids Æolus calm the air, and Neptune the sea, and Jove the sky. No sooner said than done; and then she wills that all her worshippers, animate and inanimate, shall hail her advent, and do obseiance to her, 'their Maker.'

'She ordained eik that every bird and beist
Before her Hiennes suld annone compeir,
And every flower of verten, most and leist,
And every herb be field far and neir,
As they had wont in May, fro yeir to yeir.
To her their maker to mak obediens,
Full low inclynand with all due reverens.'

§ Like the holy sound of the angelic host.

|| Elegaut, beautiful.

She sends the roe to bring the beasts, the swallow to collect the birds, and the yarrow or snow-wort to summon the flowers. In the twinkling of an eye they are all in the May-garden.

'All present were in twinkling of an ee,
Baith beast, and bird, and flower, before the Queen,
And first the lion greatest of degree
Was called there, and he most fair to see,
With a full hardy countenance and keen,
Before Dame Nature came, and did incline
With visage bold, and courage leonine.

'This awful beast was terrible of cheir,
Piercing of look, and stout of countenance,
Right strong of corps, in fashion fair, but fer,
Lusty of shape, light of deliverance,
Red of his colour, as the ruby glances;
On field of gold he stood full mightily,
With flower de luces circled pleasantly.'

The reference in this noble description is to the Scottish royal arms,—a red lion rampant, upon a field of gold, encircled with a border of fleurs-de-luces. Nature lifts up his clear claws, and letting him lean upon her knee, crowns him with a diadem of radiant stones, enjoins him to 'exercise justice with conscience,' and on no account to let the smallest of his subjects 'suffer scaith or scorn from the great,' and concludes her charge to the monarch of the beasts with what Warton well calls 'a beautiful stroke, indicating the moral tenderness of the poet's heart.'

'The lady lifted np his claws clear,
And let him lightly lean upon her knee,
And crowned him with diadem full dear
Of radiant stones, most royal for to see,
Saying, The King of Beasts make I thee,
And the protector chief in woods and shaws,
Unto thy lieges go forth, and keep the laws.

'Justice exerce with mercy and conscience,
And let no small beast suffer scaith nor scorn
Of great beasts that bene of more puissance,
Do law alike to apes and unicorns,
And let no bowgile* with his baistrous horn
The meek plough ox oppress, for all his pride,
But in the yoke go peaceful him beside.'

As soon as Lady Nature ceases to speak, all beasts, great and small, fall down at the lion's feet, and cry, 'Laud! Vive le Roy!' She then crowns the Eagle king of Fowls—another image of the Scottish king—sharpening his pennons like steel darts, and enjoining him to be just to fowls of all degree.

'Syne crowned she the Eagle King of Fowls,
And as steel darts sharpit she his pens,
And bad him be as just to whaupis and owls
As unto peacocks, papingoes, or cranes,
And make ae! law for wycht fowls and for wrens,
And let no fowl of rapine do eferay,
Nor devonar birds but his own proper prey.

Nature then calls on all the flowers to hold up their heads and hear, and first of all she beholds the 'awful thistle,¶ and seeing him well guarded with a bush of spears, and able for the wars, she makes him her champion, to protect the softer plants from harm.

* Wild ox. † Carlews. ‡ Adright.

¶ Pinkerton has remarked that the first authentic appearance of the Thistle as a Scottish badge is in this poem, and in the account of Margaret's reception and wedding, where it is called a 'chardou.'

'Then called she all the flowers that grew on field,
Discerning all their fashions and effeirs,*
Upon the awful THIRSSIL she beheld,
And saw him keepit with a bush of spears;
Considering him so able for the weirs,†
A radiant crown of rubies she him gave,
And said 'in field go forth and fend the lave.‡

She proceeds to counsel him, since he is king, to act discreetly; to love only 'herbs of virtue and sweet odour;' to let no rude nettle be fellow to the goodly fleur-de-luce; no wild weed 'compare her to the Lily's nobleness;' but far beyond and above all other flowers to honour the Rose, 'the fresh Rose, of colour red and white,' the emblem of the English princess, in whom the Roses of York and Lancaster are blended.

'So full of virtne, pleasure, and delight,
So full of blissful angelic beauty,
Imperial birth, honour, and dignity.'

Nature then crowns the Rose queen of flowers, and eulogizes her peerless qualities in the following graceful strains,—

'Then to the Rose she turned her visage,
And said, O lovely daughter, most bening,
Above the Lily, illustrious of lynage,§
From the stock royal rising fresh and ying,||
But ony spot or macall doing spring,¶
Come, bloom of joy, with gems to be crown'd,
For o'er the lave thy beauty is renown'd.

A costly crown with clarified stones bright,
This comely queen did on her head enclose,
While all the land illumined was with light,
Wherefore methought the flowers did all rejoice.
Crying at once,—Hail be thon, richest Rose;
Hail herbs empress, hail freshest queen of flowers,
To thee be glory and honour at all hours.'

The birds, led by the mavis, the blackbird, the lark, and the nightingale, all at once hail their queen with a triumphant song of gratulation, so melodious and yet so loud, that the poet suddenly awoke, and with a start turned him about to see this brilliant court; but all had vanished into empty air.

Another allegorical poem, called 'The Golden Targe,' is of a more extended range, and displays more creative power, though as a whole, says Professor Wilson, it is much inferior to the 'Thistle and the Rose,' which is as perfect as anything in Spenser. The subject of the poem is the power of love; the insufficiency of the golden targe or the shield of reason to afford protection against the assaults of 'Love's mighty Queen,' and her train. The opening stanzas are remarkably picturesque, and breathe the truest and sweetest spirit of poetry.

'Bright as the star of day began to shine,
When gone to bed were Vesper and Lucyne,
I raise, and by a rose-tree did me rest;
Up sprung the golden candle matutine,
With clear deparit beams crystalline,
Gladding the merry fowls in their nest;
Or Phoebus was in purple cape reveat.
Up rose the lark, the heaven's minstrel fine,
In May, in till a morrow mirth fullest.

The poet falls asleep, lulled by the harmony of the birds and the rushing of the river, and sees a vision of a white sail approaching the shore, swift as a falcon pouncing on her prey. The ship anchors, and a hundred ladies leap from its deck, as fresh as flowers in May, clad in green kirtles, with golden tresses, and 'paps white and middles small as wands.' Amongst these the poet recognises Venus and Aurora and Flora and Juno, Clio, 'the help of Makars' (poets), Pallas, and prudent Minerva, all with crowns upon their heads. May, 'the queen of mirthful months,' is then seen advancing between her sisters April and June, all three walking up and down the garden, amid the music of birds. The poet then sees Nature present May with a gown,

'Rich to behold, and noble of renown,
Of every hne under the heaven.'

Nature is saluted by her subjects, 'the merry fowls.'

'And every bloom on branch, and eke on bank
Open'd and spread their balmy leaves dank (moist)

They then salute on the 'same wise' Dame Flora, and after her the mighty Queen of Love. To her throws a powder into the eyes of Reason, who is suddenly deprived of his sight, and reels like a drunken man. The poet having thus lost his protector, receives a deadly wound, and is taken prisoner by Beauty, who now appears more lovely as the clear eye of Reason grows dim. Diminulation then tries all her arts to deceive the prisoner. Fair Calling smiles on him, Cherishing feeds him with fair words, New Acquaintance embraces him awhile, but soon takes her leave, and is never seen again. At last Danger approaches the unhappy poet, and on her departure delivers him to the custody of Heaviness; Eolus then blows his bugle, the pageant dissolves into empty air,

'Leaving no more but birds and bank and brook.'

The enemy re-enbark in the twinkling of an eye, unfurl their sails, and swiftly proceed on their course, celebrating their victory with a discharge of artillery, re-echoed by the rocks, as if 'the rainbow brake.' The poet starts up in affright, and finds that it was but a dream.

The conception of the Golden Targe, it has been justly remarked by Professor Wilson, is wonderfully vivid; but the execution is imperfect; and Dunbar can scarcely be said to have succeeded in the main object of the allegory. The expectation excited by the splendid poetry of the introduction is disappointed by the huddled and hurried action which follows, and which, brief as it is, propor-tionably to the other parts of the poem, wearies
the reader by its excessive sameness.

This fine piece, which was much admired in the days of its author, concludes with an address to Chaucer, Gower, and Lydgate, whose chief excel-lences he is thought by some critics of no mean name to have equalled.

James IV. was an avowed patron of literature, and at this period, says Mr. Laing, "Dunbar appears to have lived on terms of great familiarity with the king, and to have participated freely in all the gaieties and amusements of the Scottish court; his sole occupation being that of writing ballads on any passing event which might serve to exercise his fancy or imagination, and thus contribute to the entertainment of his royal master." We learn from the treasurer's accounts, that besides his yearly pension of ten pounds, the poet received occasional grants of money from the royal purse. On the 17th of March, 1504-5, Dunbar for the first time said mass in the king's presence, and on that occasion he received a gratuity of seven French crowns, or £4 18s. in Scottish money—a larger sum than was usually given by his majesty on hearing 'a priest's first mass.' At Martinmas, 1507, his pension was 'newly eiked,' or augmented, the king having ordered it to be increased to the annual sum of £20, and three years afterwards it was raised to £30, to be paid as before at the stated terms of Martinmas and Whitsuntide, 'for all the days of his life, or until he be promoted to a benefice of £100, or above.' The poet's pension, however, seems to have been scarcely sufficient to supply his ordinary wants; for in his address to the 'lords of the king's exchequer,' he tells these grave personages that they need not 'tire their thumbs in reckoning up their rents and farms, or make their counters clink, or consume their ink and paper in the receiving of his sums.' The story is very short. He received a sum of money from the Lord Treasurer, which is all gone. Not a cross or copper is left, as his empty purse will testify. 'I cannot tell,' he adds, 'how the money has been spent; but well I wot it is all gone, and that methinks ane compt o'er sair' (too sore a reckoning). There can be no doubt that the poet was a favourite of his royal master, who was no niggard to his servants; but James, though kind-hearted and generous, was thoughtless and passionately fond of amusement, and often lavished his bounty on the most unworthy objects, to the neglect of the modest and deserving. In his 'Remonstrance to the King,' Dunbar has portrayed, in most graphic terms, the extravagance of the monarch, and the worthless character of the multifarious crowd of suitors, whom his indiscriminate patronage attracted to the Scottish court—astrologers, musicians, minstrels, jugglers, jesters, tale-bearers, flatterers, sharpers, Monsouris of France, importunate Irish beggars, and innumerable others who

—'ken none other craft nor curis (profession)
But to mak' thrang within the duris.'

all came in for a large share of the regal bounty. The poet speaks with just commendation of the king's liberality to men of science and talent; but when he witnesses his indiscriminate favour bestowed on the crowd of importunate, idle, and worthless characters who infest the court, while he is passed over, his very heart is ready to burst for despite.

'My heart near bursts then for tayne*
Whilk may not suffer nor sustene
So great abuses for to see Daylie in court before my ee.
My mind so fer† is set to flyte‡
That of nocht else I can indyte,
For either maun§ my heart to break,
Or with my pen I maun me wreik.
And since the tane must needs be,
Into melancholy to dee,
Or let the venom ische all out—
Beware anon, for it will spout,
Gif that the treacle come not tyt||
To swage the swalme¶ of my despite.'

In another Address to the King, the burden of the song still is, 'my painful purse still prickells me.' The thought of its utter emptiness of all but pain comes across him when he would blithely write ballads, or when he sets himself to dance or sing, and drives all pleasant pastime from his remembrance. And worse than that—

'When men that have purses in tone
Passis to drink or to disjone
Then maun I keep ane gravitie,
And say that "I will fast till noon;"
My painful purse so prickells me.

'My purse is made of sic ane skin,
There will na crosses†† bide it within;
Strait as fra the fiend they flee,
Wha ever tyme‡‡ wha ever win;
My painful purse so prickells me.

'I have inquired in mony a place
For help and comfort in this case,
And all men say, My lord, that ye
Can best remeid, for this mal-ease
That with sic pains prickells me.'

The grand object of Dunbar's ambition, however, as Mr. Laing observes, "was preferment in the church, which, independently of any other claims he might possess, he was entitled to expect from the terms of the grant of his yearly pension. It is somewhat amusing to observe with what ingenuity and address he varies his continuous and importunate petitions. In general he seems to found his chief claims for preferment upon former services which he had rendered, his youth having been spent in the king's employment; while he intimates that his wants would be easily satisfied. But whether in the form of a satirical or of a pathetic appeal to the king, or simply as a congratulation on the new year, or whether under some humorous personation he brought forward his request, still the burden of Dunbar's song was "a benefice." From the strain of his earlier poems, it appears that he had at one time entertained sanguine hopes of advancement, but as years passed on and left him still unbeneficed, and a mere dependent on the bounty of his royal master, his heart began to sink within him at the prospect of the future.

The influence of 'hope deferred which makes the heart sick' is painfully manifested in his later compositions. The long expected benefice, he says, might in shorter time have come from Calicut, or the new found Isle (America) over the great ocean-sea, or the deserts of India, 'whilk to consider is ane pain.' It has been so long in coming to him, that he dreads that it has gone entirely astray, or has turned backward again. Some men have seven benefices, he adds, while he has not one, though he will be contented with 'a kirk scant covered with heather.' In his lines 'To the King, when many Benefices vakit,' he opportunely asks :

'Sir! whether is it alms mair,
To give him drink that thirsts sair,
Or fill ane full man till he burst,
And let his fellow die for thirst, Whilk wine to drink as worthy were?

'It is no glad collation,
Where ane makes merry, another looks down,
Ane thirsts, another plays cup out;*
Let ane the cup go round about,
And win the covan's bennisoun.†

The gross abuse of church patronage in those days, is a frequent theme of indignant complaint on the part of Dunbar. In his 'Dream,' the poet gives a description of Sir John Kirkpakker, the pluralist, and draws a humorous contrast between himself, who had waited long and patiently for some preferment, and this 'mighty undertaker,' already possessed of seven, and trusting soon to have eleven churches :

'There came anon one called Sir John Kirkpakker,
Of many cures, a mighty undertakker;
Quoth he, I am possessed of churches seven,
And soon I think they grow shall to eleven,
Before he come to one, you groaning ballad-maker.'

And in one of his numerous addresses to the King, which contains 'the finest mixture of satire and sadness, pathos and fear, despondency of spirit and discursiveness of fancy,' he draws a graphic picture of the ignorant unprincipled parasites, who monopolised the church livings to the exclusion of him, the scholar and the poet, 'ane simple vicar who can nocht be' :

'Jock that was wont to keep the stirks,‡
Can now draw him ane cleik of kirks,
With ane false cairt§ into his sleif,||

feelingly, 'the pride of insulted genius, the bitter repentance that he had devoted himself to so thankless and ill-requited a service, and the biting satire against kings and favourites by which many of his productions are distinguished, all form a painful but instructive commentary on the history of a man of letters, who has relinquished the more humble walk in which, with a little labour, he might have provided for his own wants, and finds, when it is perhaps too late, that distinction is not synonymous with independence. It seems to have been in one of these moods that he indited his indignant complaint addressed to the king' :—

'Of wrangs and of great injuries,
That nobles in their days endures,
And men of virtue and cunning,*
Of wit and wisdom in guiding;
That nocht can in this court compass,
For lawte, love, or long service.'

From the wish which he expresses 'To the King that he were John Thomson's man,' it may be inferred that Queen Margaret was anxious to promote the poet's interest. The tenor of his prayer is that the king would lend a favourable ear to the requests of his consort, for then would the poet no longer remain unbeficed, and his hard fortune would speedily be ended.

'My advocate, baith fair and sweet,
The hale rejoicing of my spirit,
Wald speed with my errand than;
An ye were ane John Thomson's man.†

But the most singular and not the least affecting of the poet's supplications, is his address to the king in the character of the 'Grey Horse, auld Dunbar,' complaining that when idler steeds are tenderly cared for, and clothed in gorgeous trappings, he who had done his majesty good service is neglected in his old age.

'When I was young and into ply,‡

Attached to the petition is a reply in the form of a mandate, addressed to the Treasurer by his Majesty, which is supposed by Chalmers and Tytler to have been actually written by the King himself, though it may have been added in his name by the poet as an ingenious mode of enforcing his request:—

RESPONSIO REGIS.

'After our writings, Treasurer,
Take in this Grey Horse, auld Dunbar,
Who in my aucht,¶¶ with service true,
To lyart changed is his hue;
Gar house him now against this Yule,
And busk him like a bishop's mule;
For with my hand I have indost,
To pay whate'er his trappous cost.'

There can be little doubt that Mr. Laing is right in his conjecture, that the true cause of the King's neglect of the incessant importunities of the poet was his reluctance to be deprived of the society of a man whom he admired and loved. And it has been questioned whether Dunbar himself could, after all, have been very desirous to give up his £80 a year at court, where he must have been a great favourite, for £100 a year, with a cure of country souls. Yet as years moved on, and left him still unprovided for, he must have looked to the future not without those fears that make the heart sink in the midst of merriment, for who knows what a day may bring forth? 'With all his cheerfulness and elasticity of spirit,' says Mr. Laing, 'Dunbar had reached a period of life when he must have felt more keenly the misfortune of continuing so long a dependant on court favour.' The following simple stanzas, entitled 'On his Heidake,' and addressed to the King, give a very touching picture of the state of mind of 'auld Grey Dunbar' at this period:—

'My heid did yak yesternight,
This day to mak that I na might,
So sair the megrim does me menyie,*
Piercing my brow as ouy ganynie,†
That scant I look may on the light.

'And now, sir, lately after mass.
To dyt‡ though I begouthe evil to dress,
The sentence lay full evilt till find,
Unsleepit in my head behind,
Dullit in dullness and distress.

'Full oft at morrow I upryse,
When that my courage sleeping lies,
For mirth, for menstrallie and play,
For din, nor dancing, nor deray,||
It will nocht walkin me no wise.'

Another poem of a higher order of merit, entitled 'Meditation in Winter,' breathes the same mournful spirit, and 'presents a very interesting picture of Dunbar's melancholy under the pressure of age. The addresses of the several personifications to him are fine: that of Age pathetic and that of Death even sublime:¶¶—

'In to thir dark and drublie days,
When sable all the Heaven arrays,
With misty vapours, clouds, and skies,
Nature all curage me denies,
Of sangs, ballattis, and of plays.

'When that the night does lengthen hours,
With wind, with hail, and heavy showers,
My dull spreit does lurk forsoir;††
My heart for langour does forloir,‡‡
For lack of summer with his flowers.

'I walk, I turn, sleep can I nocht,
I vexit am with heavy thought;
This World all our I cast about,
And ever the mair I am in doubt,
The mair that I remeid have sought.

'I am assayit on every side,
Despair says ay, In tyme provide,
And get something whereon to live;
Or with great trouble aud mischief,
Thou shall into this Court abide.

'Then Patience says, Be nocht agast,
Hald Hope aud Truth within thee fast,
And let Fortune work furthe her rage,
When that no reason may assuage,
While that her glass be run and past.

'And Prudence in my ear says ay,
Why wald thou hald that will away?
Or crave that thou may have no space,
Though tending to another place,
A journey going every day.

'And then says Age, My friend come near,
And be nocht strange I thee require.
Come, Brother, by the hand me take,
Remember thou hast compt to make,
Of all the time thou spendit here.

'Yet when the night begins to short,
It does my sp'rit sum part comfort,

That I may live in some disport.'

But though the poet thus moralized on the brevity of existence, the shortness and uncertainty of all worldly enjoyments, and the wickedness and woes of mankind, he was by no means disposed habitually to take gloomy or desponding views of life. His morality, as Ellis remarks, was of a cheerful kind; and 'among the many moods of his mind—even the sad ones—there often broke in cheerful lights upon the shadows, making the chequered light on the whole, beautiful and happy, the image of a poet's dream.' What can be finer than the pious poem, entitled

NO TREASURE AVAILS WITHOUT GLADNESS.

'Be merry, man, and take nocht far in mynd,
The wavering of this wretched world of sorrow.
To God be humble and to thy friend be kynd,
And with thy neighbours gladly lend and borrow;
His chance to-night, it may be thine to-morrow;
Be blyth in heart for any adventure,
For oft with wise men it has been said aforrow,†
Without Gladness avails no Treasure.

'Make thee gude cheer of it that God thee sends,
For warld's wark but welfare nocht avails;
Na gude is thine save only that thou spends,
Remenant all thou brukis but with baills:
Seek to solace when sadness thee assails;
In dolour lang thy life may not indure,
Wherefore of comfort set up all thy saills;
Without Gladness avails no Treasure.

'Follow on pity, flee trouble and debate,
With famous folkis hald thy company;
Be charitable and humble in thyne estate,
For warldly honour lastes but a cry;
For trouble in earth take no mellancoly;
Be rich in patience, if thou in gudes be poor;
Who lives merrily, he lives mightily;
Without Gladness avails no Treasure.

'Thou sees thir wretchis sit with sorrow and care,
To gather gudes in all their lives space;
And when their bags are full their selves are bare,
And of their riches but the keeping has:
While others cum to spend it that has grace,
Which of thy wyning no labour had nor cure,
Take thou example, and spend with merriness;
Without Gladness avails no Treasure.

Though all the work that ever had living wicht,
Wer only thyne, no more thy part dois fall,
But meat, drink, claes, and of the lave a sicht,
Yet to the Judge thou shall give compt of all;
Ane reckning richt cumis of ane ragment § small:
Be just and joyous, and do to none injure,
And Truth shall make thee strang as ony wall;
Without Gladness avails no Treasure.'

Perhaps the most remarkable of all Dunbar's oems, as it is certainly the most vigorous and original, is the Dance of the Seven Deadly Sins. On the eve of Lent, a general day of confession, the poet, in a dream, has a vision of heaven and of hell. Mahoun, or the Devil, proclaims a dance of those accursed wretches, who in the other world had never made confession to the priest, and had consequently never received absolution. The 'Seven Deadly Sins' immediately appear, and present a mask or mummery with the newest gambols just imported from France. The poem, it has been justly remarked, is in ghastly keeping with the subject. Each 'Deadly Sin' is figured before the eye by a few fearless strokes, that at once invest him with his most hideous and hateful attributes. Pride, appropriately takes the precedence, dressed in the first fashion of that period, his hair loosely thrown back, his bonnet placed on one side of his head, and his gown flowing to his heels in ample folds. Anger, next makes his appearance, 'his hand ay upon his knife,' attended by a band of ruffians, who follow in pairs, all equipped for war in short coats of mail and steel head-pieces, their legs covered with chain armour; and as they move along they wound each other with swords and sharp knives. Envy, follows accompanied by a train of dissemblers, flatterers, and backbiters, with whisperers of false, injurious reports, from whom the poet expresses his regret that the courts of princes are never free. Next in the dance comes Covetousness, 'the root of all evil,' with a despicable retinue of catiff-wretches,—usurers, misers, and hoarders, who discharge at each other, out of their throats, torrents of molten gold. Sloth, after being twice called, joins reluctantly in the dance, attended by many a lazy, tun-bellied sloven, and many a sleepy, slothful drab, and as he draws them after him in a chain Baliol lashes their loins, and because they are 'slow of feet' quickeneth them with fire. They are followed by Lust, neighing like a stallion, who is led by Idleness, and accompanied by many foul associates that have died in their sins. The foul monster Gluttony next presents himself, followed by many a drunkard and thriftless prodigal. The terrific exhibition closes with a Highland pageant, and the shouting of the Coronach, which affords the poet an opportunity of expressing, with humorous malice, the scorn which he felt for his Celtic countrymen. Dunbar's 'Dance of the Seven Deadly Sins,' says Thomas Campbell, "though it would be absurd to compare it with the beauty and refinement of the celebrated Ode on the Passions, has yet an animated picturesqueness not unlike that of Collins. The effect of both pieces shows how much more potent allegorical figures become, by being made to fleet suddenly before the imagination, than by being detained in its view by prolonged description. Dunbar conjures up the personified sins, as Collins does the Passions, to rise, to strike, to disappear. They 'come like shadows, so depart.'"[•] will show that the high commendation bestowed upon it is well merited:—

'Of Februar the fifteenth night,

The Dance of the Seven Deadly Sins is followed by a Tournament—'The Justis betuix the Tailzour and Sowtar'—conducted according to the laws of chivalry, and written in a style of the broadest farce, and full of very coarse yet ludicrous images. Mr. Laing well remarks, that 'he who could, with the view of enlivening the sports of Holyrood, produce such a living picture as the Dance of the Seven Deadly Sins, and then pass without effort to conjure up in the infernal regions an exhibition of such broad and coarse humour as the mock tournament between a tailor and a sutor, might truly be regarded as a poet whose imagination was capable of any effort whatever: at one time revelling uncontrolled in the fields of allegory;—upon other occasions rising from some homely exhibition of the ordinary events of life, and reaching even 'the brightest heaven of invention.' Mr. Laing goes on to compare the genius of Dunbar with that of Burns. He considers the former pre-eminent in expressive personation and allegorical imagery; while in strength of satire, richness of humour, vivid description of external nature, and characteristic delineations of life and manners, it would be difficult, he thinks, to say which is entitled to the highest praise. It must be admitted, however, that Dunbar's coarseness is often most offensive, and that in his 'comic and familiar pieces there prevails such a grossness both of language and of sentiment as destroys the effect of their remarkable force of humour.' Much of this is no doubt to be attributed to the coarse manners of that early period, so that the grave faults referred to were rather those of the age, than of the individual. A similar apology has been pleaded in extenuation of Dunbar's 'Dirge to the King at

Stirling,' which has been justly termed by Sir Walter Scott a profane and daring parody of the services of the Roman Catholic Church, and in a moral point of view is the most objectionable of all the poet's compositions. "But at that period," says Mr. Laing, "the license given to such open violations of religious observances, as took place under the direction of lords of misrule or abbots of unreason, might have rendered such satirical effusions like this dirge less obnoxious." The character of James the Fourth, to whom this poem was addressed, was composed of strange inconsistencies or contradictions. "He was wont," says Sir Walter Scott, "during his fits of devotion, to assume the dress and conform to the rules of the Order of Franciscans, and when he had thus done penance for some sin in Stirling, to plunge again into the tide of pleasure; probably, too, with no unusual inconsistency, he sometimes laughed at the superstitious observances to which at other times he subjected himself." He was in the habit also of undertaking pilgrimages to the distant shrines of St. Ninian, at Whithorn, in Galloway, and St. Duthac, in Rosshire, which were no doubt held as atoning for his sensual indulgences, and his reckless pursuit of idle amusements. To relieve the King out of the state of penance and purgatory in which he is represented as living at the time, the service of the church of Rome is burlesqued by Dunbar; a humorous contrast is drawn between the opulence, the good living, and the amusements which Edinburgh afforded, and the meagre fare, the dull solitude, and 'the pyne and wo' of Stirling. "In the works of the Northern Makers of the fifteenth century," says Mr. Campbell, "there is a gay spirit and an indication of jovial manners which forms a contrast to the covenanting national character of subsequent times. The frequent coarseness of this poetical gaiety, it would be more easy than agreeable to prove by quotations; and if we could forget how very gross the humour of Chaucer sometimes is, we might, on a general comparison of the Scotch with the English poets, extol the comparative delicacy of English taste; for Skelton himself, though more burlesque than Sir David Lindsay in style, is less outrageously indecorous in matter. At a period when James IV. was breaking lances in the lists of chivalry, and when the court and court poets of Scotland might be supposed to have possessed ideas of decency, if not of refinement, Dunbar at that period addresses the Queen, on the occasion of having danced in her majesty's chamber, with jokes which a beggar wench of the present day would probably consider as an offence to her delicacy."

'The Flying' of Dunbar and Kennedy is an extraordinary example of coarse invective and scurrility, in which the rival poets load each other with the most opprobrious epithets and vulgar abuse. "It is difficult," says Mr. Tytler, "to determine whether the enmity and rivalry of two poets, who gave themselves up to this coarse sort of buffoonery, was real or pretended. The probability seems to be, that it was considered both by the authors and the audience as a mere pastime of the imagination—a license to indulge in every kind of poetical vituperation—a kind of literary maternalis or licentious badinage which, in its commencement, and in the received principles by which it was regulated, did not imply any real hostility of feeling, but was very likely to lead to it. Lord Hailes, who was the first to conjecture that this 'Flying,' or poetical contest, had not arisen from anything like personal animosity—has well remarked, that Luigi Pulci and Matteo Franco, although dear and intimate friends, for their own amusement and the gratification of their readers, have indulged in a similar species of abuse; and it seems impossible to believe that the affectionate regret with which Dunbar mentions Kennedy, in his 'Lament for the Death of the Makars,' could have proceeded from an enemy." The example of Dunbar and Kennedy found several imitators among the Scottish poets of the sixteenth century. About the year 1536, James V. 'fyted' with Sir David Lindsay, his Lion King-at-Arms; and a few years later a noted contest took place between Alexander Montgomery, author of 'The Cherrie and the Slae,' and Sir Patrick Hume, of Polwarth. Prefixed to the earliest edition of their 'Flying,' are some verses which expressly state that the altercation of these writers was not the result of any personal quarrel:

'No cankring envy, malice, nor despite,
Stirr'd up these men so eagerly to fyte,
But generous emulation.'

Among the poems ascribed to Dunbar on highly probable grounds, though not certainly his, is a tale entitled the 'Friars of Berwick.' Its object was to expose the licentious lives of some of the monkish orders at this period, and it exhibits great satirical powers, as well as a large fund of genuine humour. "This tale," says Dr. Irving, "to whatever author it may be referred, undoubtedly exhibits a most admirable specimen of the comic mode of writing. Without suffering by the comparison, it may be ranked with the best tales of Chaucer. The story is most skilfully conducted; and in its progress the poet displays an extensive and accurate acquaintance with the diversities of human character. His humour seems peculiar and undervalued. His descriptions are at once striking and appropriate. The different characters introduced are supported with the utmost propriety, and with a power of conception and of delineation which has not very frequently solicited our attention." Mr. Tytler remarks that there are few of Chaucer's tales which are equal, and certainly none of those which are superior to this excellent piece of satire. "I have dwelt upon it the rather," he adds, "because without the coarseness and licentiousness which affects the poetry of the age, it gives us a fine specimen of its strength and natural painting. The whole management of the story, its quiet comic humour, its variety and natural delineation of human character, the freshness and brilliancy of its colouring, the excellence and playfulness of its satire upon the hypocritical and dissolute lives of many of the monastic orders, and the vigorous versification into which it is thrown, are entitled to the highest praise."

But, although the satires, the tales, and the allegorical and descriptive poetry of Dunbar are all admirable, and full of fancy and originality, it is the opinion of Warton that the natural complexion of his genius is of the moral and didactic cast. His short moral pieces, according to Pinkerton, have a terseness, elegance, and force only inferior to those of Horace. "This darling of the Scottish Muses," observes Sir Walter Scott, "has been justly raised to a level with Chaucer, by every judge of poetry, to whom his obsolete language has not rendered him unintelligible. In brilliancy of fancy, in force of description, in the power of conveying moral precepts with terseness, and marking lessons of life with conciseness and energy, in quickness of satire, and in poignancy of humour, the Northern Makar may boldly aspire to rival the Bard of Woodstock."

The most solemn and impressive of the moral poems of Dunbar, is one in which he represents a merle, or thrush, and a nightingale, taking opposite sides on a debate on earthly and spiritual affections. Besides its great poetical merit, the poem bears on every stanza the stamp of sincerity and truth.

THE MERLE AND THE NIGHTINGALE.

' In May, as that Aurora did up spring,
With crystal een chasing the claddes sable,
I heard a Merle, with merry notes, sing
A sang of love, with voice right comfortable,
Again* the Orient beamis, aimable,
Upon a blissful branch of laurel green;
This was her sentence, sweet and delectable,
A lusty life in Lovis service been.

' Under this branch ran down a river bright,
Of balmy liquor, crystalline of hne,
Again' the heavenly azure skyis light,
Where did upon the tother side pursue
A Nightingale, with sugared notis new,
Whose angel feathers as the peacock shone;
This was her song, and of a sentence true,
All love is lost but upon GOD alone.

' With notis glad, and glorious harmony,
This joyful Merle, so salust she the day,
While rung the woodis of her melody,
Saying, Awake, ye lovers of this May;
Lo, fresh Flora has flourished every spray,
As Nature has her taught, the noble Queen,
The field been clothit in a new array;
A lusty life in Lovis service been.

' Ne'er sweeter noise was heard with living man,
Na made this merry gentle Nightingale;
Her sound went with the river as it ran,
Out through the fresh and flourished lusty vale;
O Merle! quoth she, O fool! stint of thy tale,
For in thy song good sentence is there none,
For both is tint, the time and the travail
Of every love but upon GOD alone.

' Cease, quoth the Merle, thy preaching, Nightingale;
Shall folk their youth spend into holiness?
Of young saints grows auld fiends, but fable;
Eye, hypocrite, in yeiris tenderness,

Again' the law of kind thou goes express,
That crookit age makes one with youth serene,
Whom nature of conditions made diverse:
A lusty life in Lovis service been.

' The Nightingale said, Fool, remember thee,
That both in youth and age, and every hour,
The love of GOD most dear to man suld be;
That him, of nought, wrought like his own figour,
And died himself, fro' dead him to succour;
O! whether was kyth* there true love or none?
He is most true and stedfast paramour,
And love is lost but upon him alone.

' The Merle said, Why put GOD so great beauty
In ladies, with sic womanly having,
But gif he would that they suld Invit be?
To love eke nature gave them inclining,
And He of nature that worker was and king,
Would nothing frustir put, nor let be seen,
Into his creature of his own making;
A lusty life in Lovis service been.

' The Nightingale said, Not to that behoof,
Pnt GOD sic beauty in a lady's face,
That she suld have the thank therefore or luv,
But He, the worker, that put in her sic grace;
Of beauty, bounty, riches, time or space,
And every gudness that been to come or gone,
The thank redounds to him in every place:
All love is lost but upon GOD alone.

' O Nightingale! it were a story nice,
That love suld not depend on charity;
And gif that virtue contrar be to vice,
Then love maun be a virtne, as thinks me,
For, aye, to love envy maun contrar' be:
God bade eke love thy neighbour fro' the spleen; †
And who than ladies sweeter neighbours be?
A lusty life in Lovis service been.

' The Nightingale said, Bird, why dost thou rave?
Man may take in his lady sic delight,
Him to forget that her sic virtue gave,
And for his heaven receive her colour white:
Her golden tressit hairis redomite, ‡
Like to Apollo's beamis tho' they shone,
Suld not him blind fro' love that is perfit;
All love is lost but upon GOD alone.

' The Merle said, Love is cause of honour aye,
Love makis cowards manhood to purchase,
Love makis knights hardy at essay,
Love makis wretches full of largeness,
Love makis sweirs folks full of business,
Love makis sluggards fresh and well be seen,
Love changes vice in virtuous nobleness;
A lusty life in Lovis service been.

' The Nightingale said, True is the contrary;
Sic frustis love it blindis men so far,
Into their minds it makis them to vary;
In false vain glory they so drunken are,
Their wit is went, of woe they are not waur,
While that all worship away be fro' them gone,
Fame, goods, and strength; wherefore well say I daur,
All love is lost but upon GOD alone.

' Then said the Merle, Mine error I confess:
This frustis love is all but vanity;
Blind ignorance me gave sic hardness,
To argue so again' the verity;
Wherefore I counsel every man that he
With love not in the fendis net be tone, ||
But love the love that did for his love die
All love is lost but upon GOD alone.

'Then sang they both with voices loud and clear—
The Merle sang, Man love God that has thee wrought;
The Nightingale sang, Man love the Lord most dear,
That thee and all this world made of nought;
The Merle said, Love him that thy love has sought,
Ere' heaven to earth, and here took flesh and bone;
The Nightingale sang, And with his dead the bought;
All love is lost but upon Him alone.

'Then flew thir birdis o'er the boughis sheen,
Singing of love among the leavis small,
Whose eidant plead yet my thoughts grein,*
Both sleeping, waking, in rest, and in travail.
Me to recomfort most it does avail,
Again for love, when love I can find none,
To think how sung this Merle and Nightingale,
All love is lost but upon GOD alone.'

After the untimely death of his royal patron at Flodden, the name of Dunbar disappears from the treasurer's accounts, and nothing whatever is known of the manner in which his declining years were spent. In his poem entitled a 'Lament for the Makars,' composed in all probability during his last sickness, he pathetically laments his having survived all his tuneful brethren, except Walter Kennedy, who lay at the point of death.

'Since he has all my brethren tane,
He will not let me live alane,
On force I maun his next prey be,
Timor mortis conturbat me.'

He is conjectured to have died about the year 1520, but the spot where the mortal remains of the greatest of all Scotland's early Makars were deposited, is entirely unknown.

Another celebrated poet who flourished at this period was GAVIN DOUGLAS, Bishop of Dunkeld. This learned and amiable prelate was the third son of Archibald, sixth Earl of Angus, the celebrated 'Bell-the-Cat,' and of Elizabeth, the daughter of Robert Lord Boyd, High Chamberlain of Scotland. He appears to have been born about the year 1474, and would no doubt receive an education suitable to his noble birth, and the profession for which he was destined. Having entered into holy orders, he was at an early age presented to the rectory of Hawick, in Roxburghshire, where, amid the beautiful pastoral scenery of Teviotdale, his life glided on serenely in the discharge of his professional duties, and in happy literary employments. Dr. Irving thinks it highly probable that he had completed his education on the Continent, and had thus given his studies a more elegant and classical direction than was common among the Scottish ecclesiastics of that period. The intimacy of his acquaintance with ancient literature was in that age rarely paralleled. His favourites amongst the ancient poets were apparently Virgil and Ovid, and among the Christian fathers St. Augustin, whom he denominates the Chief of Clerks. His knowledge of the Latin language was undoubtedly extensive; and as he has informed us that Lord Sinclair requested him to translate Homer, we may conclude that he possessed also an acquaintance with Greek: an accomplishment rarely to be met with at that time in Scotland. We learn also from his ancient biographer, Mylne, that he was profoundly read in theology and in the canon law.*

Some time before the year 1500, Douglas was appointed by the King provost of the Collegiate Church of St. Giles, in Edinburgh: a situation of no small dignity and emolument, which he appears to have held along with his other benefice. In 1513 his two elder brothers, George, Master of Angus and Sir William Douglas, of Glenbeira, fell with their sovereign in the fatal battle of Flodden, and the aged earl, their father, overwhelmed with grief on account of the calamities of his house and his country, retired to St. Maina, in Gallway, where he soon after died. His title and estates devolved upon his grandson, Archibald, whose personal attractions gained the affections of the widowed Queen, and their nuptials were solemnized with indecent haste only a few months after the death of the King. By this unfortunate union the fortunes of Douglas became intermingled with those of the Queen and her youthful husband, and, unhappily for himself, he became implicated in the fierce struggles for promotion which now took place among the higher clergy. Among the churchmen who fell in the battle of Flodden, was the King's natural son, Alexander Stuart, Archbishop of St. Andrews and Abbot of Aberbrothock. The primacy was offered to the celebrated Bishop Elphinston, of Aberdeen, but he died before his translation, and the Queen then nominated Gavin Douglas to the vacant See. He accordingly took possession of the archiepiscopal palace, but his claims were fiercely opposed by John Hepburn, Prince of St. Andrews, who had been elected by the canons, and by Andrew Forman, Bishop of Moray, and commendator of Dryburgh and Pittenweem, a wealthy and grasping prelate, who had found means to obtain from the Pope a grant of the benefices lately held by Alexander Stewart Hepburn, at the head of a strong force, laid siege to the castle, expelled the servants of Douglas, and kept possession of the fortress in spite of an attempt to retake it on the part of the Earl of Angus at the head of two hundred horsemen; whilst Forman having obtained the assistance of the chamberlain, Lord Home, at this time one of the most powerful noblemen in Scotland, at the head of ten thousand men, proclaimed the Papal Bull at the market cross of Edinburgh, and then marched to St. Andrews to expel his rival and take possession of his new dignity. Douglas, whose conduct throughout was characterized by great moderation, withdrew in disgust from the unending contest, which ultimately terminated in Forman's obtaining possession of the primacy.

In the following year the See of Dunkeld, considered at that time the third in the kingdom in point of emolument, became vacant by the death of Bishop Brown, and the Queen again nominated Douglas, and by the influence of her brother, Henry VIII., obtained a Papal Bull in his favour. In the meantime, however, the Earl of Athole had induced the chapter to elect his brother, Andrew Stewart,

* Irving's Lives of the Scottish Poets, vol. ii. p. 27

Prebendary of Craig, and the postulate bishop, at the head of a strong body of his clansmen, seized the palace and the cathedral, and declared his resolution to retain possession by force of arms. To add to his misfortunes, Douglas was accused of having violated the laws of the realm, by procuring bulls from Rome, and having been found guilty, he was committed to the custody of his former rival, Hepburn, and successively imprisoned for more than a year in the castles of St. Andrews, Edinburgh, and Dunbar. A compromise at length took place between the two parties: Douglas was restored to liberty, and was consecrated at Glasgow by Archbishop Beaton. "Having first visited on his journey the metropolitan city of St. Andrews, he proceeded from thence to Dunkeld, where all ranks exhibited the utmost delight at his arrival, extolling to the clouds his learning and virtues, and uttering their thanks to heaven for the gift of so noble and eminent a prelate." The Papal Bull was then read with the usual solemnities at the high altar, and the newly-consecrated prelate retired to the house of the dean, by whom he was hospitably entertained. The episcopal palace and cathedral were still held by the retainers of Stewart, who had even garrisoned the steeple, so that the bishop was constrained to perform divine service in the deanery, where he also administered the oaths to his canons in the afternoon, while engaged in holding a consultation with the nobles and gentry by whom he was accompanied. Their deliberations were interrupted by the discharge of cannon from the palace and the cathedral, while at the same time intelligence was received that Stewart was on his march at the head of a body of troops to support his retainers. Lord Ogilvie, the Master of Crawford Campbell, of Glenorchy, and other feudal friends, who surrounded Douglas, prepared to repel force by force, and messengers having been immediately sent off to Fife and Angus, so powerful a reinforcement arrived next morning, that Stewart durst not hazard an attack, and retired to the neighbouring woods. His supporters being summoned to capitulate, on pain of excommunication, after some delay at last thought it prudent to comply, so that Douglas obtained possession of his See without the effusion of blood, 'a circumstance,' says Sage, 'very acceptable to the good bishop, who, in all the actions of his life, discovered a gentle and merciful disposition, regulating the warlike and heroic spirit that was natural to his family by the excellent laws of the Christian religion.* Stewart ultimately agreed to relinquish his pretensions to the See of Dunkeld, on condition that he should retain the revenues which he had already collected, and be confirmed in the possession of the churches of Alyth and Casgill, two of the best benefices in the diocese.

Having thus at length been left in undisturbed possession of his rights, Douglas proceeded to discharge the duties of his office in the most exemplary manner. Though the various contests in which he had been involved had encumbered him with debt, he performed many acts of charity and munificence. But his discharge of his episcopal functions was speedily interrupted by the distractions of these 'troubulous times,' and his near relationship to the powerful Earl of Angus, involved him in the vicissitudes of fortune which befel that ambitious and turbulent noble. An account has already been given of the attempt, so worthy of his Christian character, to mediate between the rival factions of the Hamiltons and Douglasses in the skirmish of 'Clean-the-Causey,' and of the manner in which he rescued Archbishop Beaton from the fury of his victorious antagonists. Shortly after this occurrence the party of Angus was overthrown, and that nobleman, with his uncle, Bishop Douglas, was compelled to take refuge at the court of Henry VIII., where he not only found an asylum, but had a liberal pension allotted to him for his support. The palace of the English monarch was at this time according to Erasmus, the favoured seat of learning, and of the best studies; and here the exiled prelate enjoyed the society and literary converse of various eminent scholars. One of these was the well known Polydore Virgil, who was then engaged in composing a history of England. For his information, Douglas prepared a brief commentary on the early history of his country—the only pure composition which he appears to have written. "The publication of Main's History of Scotland," says Dr. Irving, "in which that author ventured to expose the Egyptian fables of his predecessor, had excited the indignation of such of his countrymen as delighted to trace their origin to the daughter of Pharaoh. Douglas was studious to warn his new friend against adopting the opinions of the writer, and presented him with a brief commentary, in which he pursued the fabulous line of an ancestry from Athens to Scotland. This tractate, which was probably written in Latin, seems to have shared the common fate of the writings entrusted to Polydore, who, to secure the faults of his work from the danger of detection, is said to have destroyed many invaluable monuments of antiquity."†

Meanwhile, the party of Albany and the enemies of the Douglasses had obtained complete predominance in Scotland, and on the 21st of February, 1522, the bishop was denounced as a traitor, sentence of proscription was passed against him in his absence, the revenues of his cathedral were sequestered, and all persons were interdicted, under the penalties of treason from holding communication with him, or affording him any pecuniary assistance. Letters were at the same time addressed to the Pope by the governor and the Three Estates, beseeching his holiness to beware of nominating the traitor, Gavin Douglas, to the Archbishopric of St. Andrews and the Abbaey of Dunfermline. Beaton, who was determined at all hazards to secure the primacy which had now become vacant by the death of Forman, evidently dreaded that Douglas would be a formidable rival, and sought to blast his reputation by addressing a letter as chancellor of the realm to the King of Denmark, requesting that monarch to represent Douglas to the sovereign pontiff as a person altogether unworthy of his favour or protection. These artifices and intrigues were, however, superfluous. Douglas had been cited to appear at Rome, and, according to his own declaration, he intended to obey the summons. But he was suddenly seized with the plague, and died at London in the year 1522, in the forty-eighth year of his age, and was interred in the Savoy Church beside Thomas Halsay, the Irish Bishop of Leighlin. The character of Douglas is thus drawn by the classical pen of Buchanan. 'He died at London, having proceeded so far on his journey to Rome, to the great regret of all those good men who admired his virtues. To splendour of birth, and a handsome and dignified person, he united a mind richly stored with the learning of the age, such as it then existed. His temperance and moderation were very remarkable; and living in turbulent times, and surrounded by factions at bitter enmity with each other, such was the general opinion of his honesty and uprightness of mind that he possessed a high influence with all parties. He left behind him various monuments of his genius and learning of no common merit, written in his native tongue.'

The earliest work of Douglas of any extent was an allegorical poem entitled 'King Hart,' intended to represent the progress of human life. Of this ingenious, but intricate and somewhat heavy allegory, the author himself has given a condensed and striking analysis. 'The heart of man,' he says, beand his maist noble part, and the fountain of his life, is here put for man in general, and holds the chief place in the poem under the title of 'King Hart.' This mystical king is first represented in the bloom of youth, with his lusty attendants, the attributes or qualities of youth. Next is pictured forth the palace of Pleasure, near by the castle of King Hart, with its lovely inhabitants. Queen Pleasance, with the help of her ladies, assails King Hart's castle, and takes him and most of his servitors prisoners. Pity at last releases them, and they assail the Queen Pleasance, and vanquish her and her ladies in their turn. King Hart then weds Queen Pleasance, and solaces himself long in her delicious castle. So far is man's dealing with pleasure; but now when King Hart is past middle comes another scene. For Age arriving at the castle of Queen Pleasance, with whom King Hart dwelt ever since his marriage with her, insists for admittance, which he gains. So King Hart takes leave of Youthheid with much sorrow. Age is no sooner admitted than Conscience comes also to the castle and forces entrance, beginning to chide the king, whilst Wit and Reason take part in the conference. After this and other adventures Queen Pleasance suddenly leaves the king, and Reason and Wisdom persuade King Hart to return to his own palace; that is, when pleasure and the passions leave man, reason and wisdom render him his own master. After some other matters, Decrepitude attacks and mortally wounds the King, who dies after making his testament.

* Buchanan's History, book xiv. chap. xiii.

It must be admitted that the poem as a whole is tedious and uninteresting, but it contains many vivid descriptions and stirring incidents. The opening canto presents us with a spirited view of the allegorical monarch in all the fervour of youth, surrounded by his subjects and vassals.

'King Hart into his comely castel strong,
Closed about with craft and meikle art,
So seemly was he set his folk among,
That he no doubt had of misadventure,
So proudly was he polished plain and pure,
With Youthheid and his lusty levis green,
So fair, so fresh, so likely to endure,
And also blyth as bird in summer schene.

'For was he never yet with showris schot,
Nor yet o'errun with rouk; or ony raine,
In all his lusty lecam; not ane spot,
Nor never had experience into paine,
But alway into lykyng mocht to layne,
Only to love and very gentleness,
He was inclinid cleanlie to remain,
And woun ¶ under the wing of Wantonness.'

Thus slightly modernized by Mr. Tytler—

'King Hart sat in his comely castle strong,
All closed about with craft and cunning cove,
So proudly was he placed his folks among,
That he no doubt had of misadventure,
His state did promise it should long endure,
His youth was fresh, his lusty leavis were green,
His cheek show'd mantling blood as ruby pure,
His voice was blyth as bird in summer schene.

'Like goodly tree whom tempest ne'er had torn,
Or fresh blown rose, whose beauty ne'er could wane,
King Hart stood firm, his curling locks unshorn,
Play'd round his brows, he never dreamt of pain,
But always thought in liking soft to layne
Love's servant, nurst in lap of gentlemen,
He fondly dreamt that he should aye remain,
And won beneath the wing of Wantonness.'

The poet proceeds to tell us that this 'worthy night king' did not enjoy entire freedom, for Nature had commissioned various 'inward scivitours,' such as Strength, Rage, Jealousy, Envy, Wickedness, Freedom, Pity, and other personages of the same character to guide and govern him. Five of his vassals—the senses—are placed at the outer works of his castle, to defend him against treason, but they are sometimes guilty of betraying their master. Honour arrives at the gate, but is denied admittance by these warders. He forces his way, however, by means of an engine, and hastily ascends the great tower.

'Honour perservit to the King's yet,††
Thir folk said all that wald not let him be,
Because that said the laird to feast was set,
With all his lusty servants more and mair,‡‡
But he ane port had entered with a gear,
And up he came in haist to the great tower,
And said he suld it perall; all with fear,
And fresh delight with many a richest tower.'

At a small distance from the castle of King Hart stands the delightful palace of Pleasance or Pleasure,

'The quhilk was paralld all about with pride,' and from this fair dwelling the beauteous queen, attended by a train of lovely nymphs, issues on a day to take her sport in the forest.

'Happend this worthy queen upon a day,
With her fresh court arrayet weill at rycht,
Hunting to ride her to disport and play,
With mony a lustre ladie fair and brycht,
Hir banner schene displayit, and on hycht
Was seen above ther heedis where they raid;
The green ground was illuminyt of the lycht;
Fresch Beauty had the vanguard and was guide.'

The queen and her troop of attendant ladies happening to approach the castle of King Hart, the warders, alarmed at the unusual appearance, hasten to inform their master, and recommend that he should send out a messenger to reconnoitre and ascertain their intentions. Youthheid and Delight instantly offer their services, and sally forth to 'see what may this muster mean,' but are dazzled and disarmed by Beauty, and captured by Fair Calling, who leads them in triumph to the castle of Pleasure, and binds them with the bands of Venus. The description of their adventure is highly poetical.

'Youthheid forth far'd—he rode on Innocence,
A milk-white steed that ambled as the wind,
Whilst Fresh Delight bestrode Benevolence,
A palfrey fair that would not bide behind.
The glorions beams had almost made them blind,
That forth from Beauty burst beneath the cloud,
With which the goddess had herself enshrined,
Sitting like Eastern queen in her pavilion prond.

'Bnt these young wights abased at the sight,
Full soon were staid in their courageous mood,
Instant within them died all power and might,
And gazing, rooted to the earth they stood;
At which Fair Calling, seeing them snbnded,
Seized on their slackened rein with rosy hands,
Then to her castle swift away she guid,*
And fastened soon the twain in Venus' silken bands.'

Love, Wantonness, and other messengers are then despatched on the same enterprise, but they, too, are seized and detained. King Hart, beholding from the battlements the discomfiture of his second party, calls to arms, and, at the head of his host, issues forth to attack his assailants. The conflict terminates in his total defeat and capture. He is delivered to Beauty in order to have the wound dressed which he had received in battle from the hand of Queen Pleasure, and is closely confined within a grated chamber near the 'donjon' tower. The prisoners, however, by the assistance of Pity, one of the attendants of Pleasure, succeed in effecting their escape, and having made themselves masters of the fortress, the queen in her turn becomes a captive. She requests an interview with King Hart, who is deeply smitten with her charms, and espouses the fair enchanter. Twenty years pass away in ease and delight, but at length the enjoyments of the royal pair are interrupted by the arrival of an unwelcome visitor.

* Went.

'Wha is at ease when baith are now in bliss,
But fresche King Hart that cleirlie is above,
And wantis nocht in world that he culd wis,*
And trusts nocht that e'er he sall remove,
Score years and more, Sir Liking and Sir Love,
Of him they have the cure and governance;
While at the last befell and sa behove,
Ane changinge new that grievit Dame Pleasance.

'Ane morning tide, when that the sun so schene
Out-raschet had his beams from the sky,
Ane auld gude man before the yett† was seen,
Upon ane steed that raid full easilie,
He rappit at the yett—but curtasilie;
Yet at the stroke the great dungeon gan din;
Then at the last he shouted felonny,
And bade them rise, and said he maun‡ come in.'

A sad change now takes place in the life of poor King Hart, and his gay and merry subjects speedily desert him. Youthheid falls on his knees before him, and craves to be dismissed with his merited reward. Disport and Fresh Delight rush out at a postern gate, without taking formal leave of their former master; whilst Conscience appears before the walls, and demands how long he is to be kept in a state of exile. He is instantly admitted by Age, and meeting Sin in the court, or inclosure, he lays a 'felloun rout on his rig-bone,' but hurts his own breast by the violence of the blow. Folly and Vice, terrified at these proceedings, skulk away and conceal themselves in a corner. Wisdom and Reason now began to knock loudly at the gate, and to demand immediate admittance. The door is at once opened by Conscience, who asks the keys, and assumes the office of porter. Disgusted with the loss of her pleasantest servants, and the intrusion of these disagreeable guests, the queen collects her train and deserts the castle whilst her royal consort is asleep. The unhappy monarch thus abandoned in his hour of need, and attacked by Jealousy and Disease, is counselled by Wisdom to leave the desolate palace of Queen Pleasure, and return home. He complies with the advice, but on reaching his own castle he meets with a cold welcome, for Languor receives him at the gate, and Strength, who had still remained with him, now 'cowers upon his houghs,' and creeps out at the postern:—

'Though Strength was now much faded in his flowers, Still with the aged king he did abide;
But at the last upon his houghs he cowers,
And privily out at the yett did slide:
Then stole away and went on ways wide.
Full soon he Youthheid and his fellows found (Nor missed the road, albeit he had no guide)
Behind a hill, they lay npon a grassy mound.'

On the departure of Strength, Decrepitude, accompanied by a hideous host, is descried coming over the 'muir,' as Wisdom and the king sit conversing together.

'Right as they two in talk the hours beguill'd,
A hideous host they saw come o'er the muir:
Decrepitude (his banner torn and soil'd)
Was near at hand with many a chieftain stur;§
A bony steed, full thin, that caiffif bore,
And crooked were his loathly limbs with eld;
No smole e'er grac'd his countenance demure;
No fere|| dar'd joke with him—with rigour all he quell'd.'

This formidable leader, assisted by Palsy, Cough, Headache, and other warriors, lays siege to the fortress, and after a fierce contest, batters the barmekin to pieces, casts down the great tower, and having gained possession of the citadel, inflicts a mortal wound on King Hart, who immediately prepares for death. The curious and fanciful testament of the dying monarch concludes the poem, which, though deformed by tedious and intricate personifications, and by not a few inaccuracies of thought and language, yet contains many beautiful descriptions, and displays poetical talents of a high order.

The next great work of Douglas, and the longest of his original compositions, is 'The Palace of Honour;' a complex allegory, displaying much learning and versatility of fancy, and containing many charming passages, often marred, however, by incongruous figures and tedious and confused descriptions. 'The poet's excellent design,' says Bishop Sage in his Life of Douglas, 'is to represent, under the similitude of a vision, the vanity and inconstancy of all worldly pomp and glory; and to show that a constant inflexible course of virtue and goodness is the only true way to honour and felicity, which he allegorically describes as a magnificent palace, situated on a very high mountain, of most difficult access. He illustrates the whole with a variety of examples, not only of those noble and heroic souls whose eminent virtues procured them admittance into that blessed place, but also of those wretched creatures whose vicious lives have fatally excluded them from it for ever, notwithstanding all their worldly state and grandeur. The work is addressed to James IV., on purpose to inspire that brave prince with just sentiments of true honour and greatness, and incite him to tread in the paths of virtue, which alone could conduct him to it. To make it more agreeable and entertaining, the poet has adorned it with several incident adventures, discovering throughout the whole a vast and comprehensive genius, an exuberant fancy, and extraordinary learning for the time he lived in. He seems to have taken the plan of it from the 'Palace of Happiness' described in the picture of Cebes; and it is not improbable that his countryman Florentius Volusenus had it in view, and improved his design in his admirable but too little known book, 'De Tranquillitate Animi.' " "This praise," Mr. Tytler remarks, "is somewhat too encomiastic and indiscriminate; for the 'Palace of Honour' cannot lay claim either to a high moral tendency or to much unity of composition and effect. It is, on the contrary, confused in its arrangement, often obscure in its transitions, and crowded with persons and scenery of all ages and countries, heaped together 'in most admired disorder;'—palaces and princes, landscapes and ladies, groups of Pagan ages and Christian heroes, populous cities and silent solitudes, succeed so rapidly, that we lose ourselves in the profusion of its actors, and the unconnected but brilliant variety of its scenery. Yet it is justly characterised as exhibiting in many places an exuberant fancy, and an extraordinary extent of learning for the age in which it was written. The learning, indeed, is rather ambitiously intruded, in many parts, communicating a coldness and tedium to the narrative, and betraying an anxiety in the author to display at once the whole extent of his stores; whilst making every allowance for the obscurities which are occasioned by a pure Scottish dialect, it is impossible not to feel that the poetry is inferior in genius to Dunbar. There is not that masterly clearness of outline and brilliancy of colouring in his grand groups—that power of keeping under all minor details—the perspective of descriptive poetry, which is necessary for the production of a strong and uniform effect. All is too much of equal size crowded into the foreground; and the author loses his purpose in the indiscriminate prominence of his details."*

One lovely morning in the month of May, the poet rises before dawn, and entering a delightful garden, is regaled by the delicious fragrance of the flowers and the melodious songs of the birds.

'The fragrant flowers, blooming in their seats,
Ourspread the leaves of Nature's tapestries;
Aboon the quhilk with heavenly harmonies,
The birdes sat on twistes and on greis,
Melodiously making their kindly gles.
Wha's shrill notis foredoon'd all the skyes;
Of reperussit air the echo cryd,
Among the branches of the bloom'd trees,
And on the laurels silver droppis lyt.

The poet falls into an ecstasy or swoon, and is presented with a remarkable vision. He seems to roam through a huge forest, close by the margin of a hideous sea, full of grisly fishes, y-illing like elves. No herbs or grass are visible, and the trees are all withered and leafless. Finding himself in this doleful region,§§ he begins to complain of the injustice of Fortune; but his attention is soon attracted by the arrival of a magnificent cavalcade 'of ladies fair and guidlie men,' who pass before him in procession. After they have gone by, two catiffs approach, one mounted on an ass, the other on a hideous horse, who are discovered to be the arch-traitors, Sinon and Achitophel. From the former the poet learns that the brilliant company which he had just beheld is Minerva, the Queen of Wisdom, with her court, who are journeying through this wilderness to the palace of Honour. He inquires how such villains were permitted to attend upon the goddess; and receives for answer, that they appear there in the same manner as thunder and earthquakes sometimes mar the beauty of the lovely and placid month of May. The poet now betakes himself for shelter to a thick covert, where he hears the merry horns of the hunters; and an unhappy stag, who proves to be Actæon, is seen pursued by his own dogs, who are cheered on by Diana, mounted upon an elephant, and surrounded by her buskined nymphs. To this stirring scene succeeds the most melodious music, like the songs of angels, and the court of Venus approaches, composed of every hero and heroine of scriptural, classical, and romantic story. The Queen of Love is seated on a gorgeous car, attended by her son Cupid, and accompanied by a band of musicians, whose skill surpasses even that of Pan and of Amphion, whose lyre raised the walls of Thebes, and of King David, though the sounds of his harp exorcised the evil spirit that tormented Saul. Mars follows behind, mounted on a barded courser, 'stout and bald' (bold). The description of the God of War is exceedingly graphic.

'Everie invasabil* weapon on him he bear,
His look was grim, his bodie large and square,
His limbs weel entailyeit† to be strang,
His neck was grit,‡ a span-breadth weil or mair,
His visage bald, with crisp brown curling hair;
Of stature not our grit nor yet our lang,
Beholding Venus, Oh, ye my love! he sang;
And she again with dalliance sa fair
Her knight him cleips§ where sa he rade or gang.'

The poet, on witnessing all this brave array, laments his own hard fate and misfortunes, and begins to denounce Venus and all her retinue. The lovely queen is seen to bite her lip, and her court rein in their horses, and make search for the poet who has dared to offer such an affront to their mistress. The luckless complainant is quickly dragged from his retreat, and arraigned at the august tribunal of the goddess. Mars and Cupid act as assessors; the accusation is read by 'a clerk cleipit Varius,' and the trial proceeds in due form. The prisoner objects to the competency of the court,—pleads that ladies cannot legally sit as judges, and moreover, that he is a spiritual man, and ought to be remitted to his judge ordinary. But Venus expresses great indignation at this appeal, and commands the clerk to write his sentence of condemnation. The unhappy culprit is in great consternation, when fortunately the court of the Muses makes its appearance, and relieves him from his perilous situation. This new court is composed of 'wise eloquent fathers and pleasant ladies of fresh beauty.' Homer, Virgil, Horace, Ovid, Juvenal, and other Latin poets, Petrarch and Boccaccio, the peerless Chaucer, 'moral John Gower,' Lydgate the monk, and 'great Kennedy and Dunbar, yet undeid' (alive), appear in this cortège, who are all directing their course to the Palace of Honour, and cheering the tedium of the journey by rehearsing Greek and Latin histories, and chanting to their lyres Sapphic and Elegiac odes.

The train of the Muses having reached the spot where Venus is engaged in trying the luckless poet, Calliope intercedes in his behalf; and the offended goddess at length agrees to pardon his crime, on condition that the culprit shall compose a poem in her honour, in reparation of his offence. He immediately pours forth an unpremeditated lay, and Venus declares that she is satisfied. She then takes her departure with all her train, and leaves the poet with the Muses, who commence a most marvellous journey, and after roaming through many regions, at last reach the Castalian fount:—

'Beside that christall well, sweet and digist,*

In obedience to the injunctions of his guide, the poet enters the pavilion, and there sees the Muses sitting two and two on 'deissis,' or elevated seats of distinction, served by 'familiaris with ippocras and mead,' and partaking of delicate meats and varied dainties. After the feast, Calliope commands

Ovid, her 'Clerk Register,' to declare 'wha were maist worthy of their hands;' and this favoured poet proceeds to chaunt the deeds of the heroes of ancient days, and is followed by Virgil and other eminent bards. At length the trumpet sounds to horse, and the Muses, with their attendants and followers, mount their steeds, and gallop on 'o'er many a goodly plain, o'er waters wan, and through woods green,' till they reach a pleasant valley, wherein stands a huge rock, which forms the termination of their journey. In this part of the poem there is a most incongruous and profane mixture of the Pagan mythology with the doctrines of the Christian faith. We learn that the palace built upon the rock is intended to shadow forth the bliss of heaven, and that by Honour we are to understand that heavenly honour and distinction to which the Christian aspires. From the summit of the enchanted rock the poet beholds a multitude of people tossed in a stormy sea, and many of them perishing in the waves. A goodly bark is seen labouring against the fury of the storm, and at length bulging against a sand-bank. A portion of the crew are swallowed up by the billows, while others reach the shore and begin to ascend the rock. The attendant nymph informs him, that the multitude who are seen struggling with the waves are the faithless, who know not God, and follow their own pleasure, and who shall all perish at last; that the ship is called the 'Carvel of the State of Grace,' into which men are admitted by baptism. But if they fall again into sin, the ship is broken, and they shall all be east away, except by faith they find the plank, which shall bring them safe to land. The bad taste of all this is unquestionable, and it cannot fail to give offence to every pious reader.

The poet is now presented with a view of the palace of Honour, the magnificence of which surpasses description. After witnessing many stately tournaments and jovial sports within the gate, the nymph conveys him to a garden, where he beholds Venus seated on a splendid throne, having before her a magic mirror, which possesses the power of reflecting 'all things gone like as they were present.' The most remarkable events recorded in history float over the surface of this mirror before the poet's view, and among other ancient worthies he sees 'great Gowmacmorne and Fyn Mae Cowl,—the mighty Fingal, and Gaul, the son of Morni, the renowned heroes of Ossian. In this magic mirror he also beholds the tricks of legerdmain performed by the famous Roger Bacon, and other necromancers, who are seen amusing themselves by changing a nutmeg into a monk, a penny pie into a church, and 'other subtill points of jugglery.' The poet is next conducted to an eminence, from which he observes the attempts of the multitude to obtain admission into the palace, and the manner in which many of them are baffled in their efforts. Equity stands as warder on the battlements, denouncing vengeance against Covetousness, Envy, and Falsehood. Patience, who officiates as porter, admits the poet and his guide into the palace, which is described in very glowing terms. He is so overcome by the splendour of the scene and the severe look of the potent monarch, that he falls into a swoon, and is conveyed to the open air by his attendant nymph. On his recovery, she offers to conduct him to a delightful garden, where the Muses are employed in gathering the choicest flowers of poesy, and where the trees bear precious stones instead of fruit. The only access to this garden lies beyond a moat, across which a tree is thrown. Over this precarious bridge the nymph passes with ease, but the poet in attempting to follow her becomes giddy, slips a foot, and is immersed in the stream. The agitation occasioned by this misadventure awakens him from the trance into which he had fallen. He then composes a lay in praise of Honour, and concludes the poem by dedicating it to his Sovereign, James IV.

In his interview with Venus in the garden, connected with the Palace of Honour, the poet informs us that the goddess presented him with a copy of Virgil's Æneid, commanding him to translate it into his native language,—'a task,' says Dr. Irving,* 'which he has performed with remarkable felicity. It is to be regretted,' continues this learned critic, 'that he did not devote a much longer period to this undertaking: he might thus have been enabled to render his versification more terse and finished, but the work in its present state is a singular monument of his genius and industry.† . . It is certainly the production of a bold and energetic writer, whose knowledge of the language of his original, and command of a rich and variegated phraseology, peculiarly qualified him for the performance of so arduous a task. Indeed, whether we consider the state of British literature at that era, or the rapidity with which he completed his work, (it was the labour of but sixteen months,) he will be found entitled to a high degree of admiration. In either of the sister languages few translations of sacred authors had been attempted, and the rules of the art were consequently little understood. Even in English, no metrical version of a classic had yet appeared, except of Boethius, who scarcely merits that appellation. On the destruction of Troy, Caxton had published a species of prose romance, which he professes to have translated from the French, and the English reader was taught to consider this motley and ludicrous composition as a version of the Æneid. Douglas, however, bestows severe castigation on Caxton for his presumptuous deviation from classical story, and affirms that his work no more resembles Virgil than the Devil resembles St. Austin. He has, however, fallen into one error which he exposes in his predecessor—proper names being often so disfigured in his translation as only to be recognised with the greatest difficulty. In many instances, too, he has been guilty of the bad taste of modernizing the notions of his original; converting the Sibyl into a nun, and admonishing Æneas, the Trojan baron, to be fearful of any neglect in counting his beads. Of the general principle of translation, however, he appears to have formed no inaccurate notion. His version is neither rashly licentious, nor too tamely literal. In affirming that he has invariably rendered one verse by another, Dempster and Lesly betray their ignorance of the work of which they speak; and Douglas well knew that such a project would have been wild and nugatory. The verses of Virgil and his translator most commonly differ in length by at least three syllables, and they may even differ by no fewer than seven.

The original poems styled 'prologues,' which the translator affixes to each book, are esteemed amongst his happiest pieces. The following beautiful description of a morning in May, forms part of the prologue to the twelfth book:—

'As fresh Aurora, to mighty Tithon sponse,

Perhaps a still finer specimen of Douglas's poetical genius is furnished by the description of winter in the prologue to the seventh book, which has been justly pronounced equal to anything of the kind to be found in the whole range of ancient Scottish poetry. The poet tells us that 'the sun had just entered the cloudy sign of Capricorn,' and approached so near his winter stage, that his heat perceptibly declined. Everything is melancholy and dreary; the trees leafless and bare: the rivers running red in spate.§ The burns, or smaller streams, so sweet and quiet in summer tide, tearing down their banks; the surges dashing on the shore with a noise louder than the roar of a chafed lion; the heavens dark and lowering, or, if the sky clears for a moment, only opening to show the wintry constellations, rainy Orion, and the chill, pestilential Saturn, 'shedding infection from his tresses hoar.' The earth, says the poet, pursuing his fine winter picture, is now barren, hard, and unlovely; the meadows have put on their brown and withered coats; Hebe, the beautiful daughter of Juno, hath not even a single flower with which she may adorn herself; and through a cold and leaden atmosphere the mountain-tops are seen capped with snow. As these melancholy images present themselves, shadowy dreams of age and death steal into the mind.

'Gousty schadowis of eild and grisly dede.'

All living creatures seem to sympathise with the decay of the year. The deer are seen retreating from their high summer pastures into the more sheltered valley; the small birds, congregating in flocks, change their pleasant songs into a melancholy chirm, or low complaining murmur; the wind, either carrying all before it, tears the forest in its strength, or sinks into a subdued or ominous moaning. The poor husbandmen and labourers, with their shoes covered with clay, and their garments drenched with rain, are seen toiling about the doors; the little herd-boy, with his silly sheep, creeps under the lee of some sheltered hill-side, whilst the oxen, horses, and 'greater bestial,' the tuskit boars and fat swine comfortably stabled and housed, have the well-stored provender of the harvest thrown down before them. As the night approaches, the sky clears up; the air, becoming more pure and penetrating, at length settles into an intense frost; and the poet, after having bekited, or warmed himself at the fire, and armed his body against the piercing air by 'claithis thrynfald,' threefold trappings, retires to rest. For some time he is unable to sleep; he watches the moon shedding her rays through his casement; he hears the owl hooting in her midnight cave, and when she ceases a strange sound breaks the stillness of the night,—he listens, and recognises the measured creaking strokes proceeding from the wings of a flock of wild geese, as they glide high in air over the city—an inimitable picture, true to nature, and eminently poetical. He is at last surprised by sleep, nor does he waken till the cock—Phœbus' crowned bird, the clock of the night—had thrice clapped his wings, and proclaimed the approach of day. The same truth and excellence which mark the preceding part of the picture, distinguish this portion: the jackdaws are heard chattering on the roof, the moon is declining near the horizon; the glee or kite, taking her station on the high leafless tree beside the poet's window, whistles with that singular and characteristic note which proclaims the dawning of a winter-day; and having had his fire stirred and his candle lighted, he rises, dresses himself, and for a moment opens the casement to look out upon the scene: but it is only for a moment; the hailstones hopping on the leads, and the gust of cold and rimy air which sweeps in, admonish him that this is no time for such observation, and quickly closing the lattice, he hurries, shivering with cold, to the fireside. As he warms himself, the faggots crackle on the hearth, the cheerful blaze lights up his chamber, and glancing from the precious and richly-gilded volumes which are ranged in their oaken presses, his eye lights upon 'Virgil' lying open on a reading-desk. He is thus reminded of how much of his task yet remains, and addresses himself diligently to his translation. It is difficult to conceive a more pleasing or picturesque description than what is here given. It is distinguished by a minute observation of nature, a power of selection and grouping, rich colouring, and clearness of outline, which we invariably trace in the works of a true poet.

These extracts will serve to show that Douglas possessed an exuberant imagination and great descriptive powers. 'The beauties of external nature he seems to have surveyed with the eyes of a poet, the various aspects of human life with those of a philosopher. There is in his works a perpetual occurrence of those picturesque and characteristic touches, which can only be produced by a man capable of accurate observation and original thought.' But he wants the vigorous sense, the graphic force, and close nervous style of Dunbar. His descriptions are often prolix, and his imagery is redundant and tediously profuse. The manner of Douglas is essentially that of a scholar, and his style is deformed by false ornament and alliteration, and a fondness for words formed from the Latin; and many of his epithets are so inappropriately applied as to show that they are used merely in accordance with literary fashion, and without any definite meaning being attached to them. It has been frequently remarked, that the phraseology of Douglas is more obscure than that of James I., or Dunbar, or Henryson; and that whilst the works of the latter may be understood by a merely English reader with comparative facility, there are not a few passages in the 'Palace of Honour,' and still more in the 'Translation of the Æneid,' of which no Englishman could make out the meaning without guessing at every other word. It is evident from this fact, that though the living language of the Scottish people was radically identical with that which was spoken in the south, it had yet by this time assumed decisively the character of a separate dialect. It retained much more of the antique than the English did; because it had not received nearly so thorough a development in literature, and wanted especially the cultivation which would have been given by a free use of literary prose. It had also contracted, through the provincial isolation of the country, many peculiarities, which were neither old Saxon nor modern English; and these were now receiving continual accessions.* The distinction which had thus gradually arisen between the English and the Scottish dialect is expressly referred to by the translator of Virgil, who tells us in his prologue to the first book, that he 'keipit na Soudron (Southern) ut our awin langage.' We give the passage in its original spelling.

'And yet, forsoith, I set my bissy pane,
As that I couth+ to mak it brade and plane,
Kepand no Soudron, but our awin langage,
And speke as I lerned quhen I was ane page;
Na; yet sa clene all Soudron I refuse;
Bot some worder I pronounce as nychebouris dois;

Quhairé scant was Scottis; I had nane uther chois:
Not that our toung is in the selvin skant,
Bot for that I the fouth of langage want.'

It appears from the following curious passage, noted in 'Hailes' Life of John Hamilton,' that in the time of James V., those Scotchmen who spoke the English dialect were regarded as traitors to their country. 'James the Fyft hearing ane of his subjectis knap Suddrone declarit him anc trateur.' It was not so late as the reign of James VI., Winzet speaks of his being 'nocht acqnyntit with your itheroun,' and knowing only to speak his 'pro-langeage conforme to our auld brade (broad) sttis.††

Douglas informs us that the translation of the Æneid was undertaken by him at the request of Henry Lord Sinclair, his cousin, and a liberal and learned patron of literature; that it occupied only sixteen months, and was completed on the 22nd of July, 1513, about twelve years after he had composed his 'Palace of Honour.' In less than two months from this date, the fatal battle of Flodden was fought, in which the two elder brothers of Douglas fell, along with two hundred gentlemen of their name. The poet, deeply affected by this event, so disastrous to his family, as well as to the king and country, bade farewell to his poetical studies; and in the conclusion of his translation of the Æneid, intimates in striking and characteristic terms his resolution of devoting the remainder of his life to the glory of God and the good of the commonwealth; intimating at the same time his confident expectation that his fame would be perpetual.

SIR DAVID LINDSAY, the most popular, though not the greatest of the ancient Scottish poets, was descended from Sir David Lindsay, a younger branch of the family of Lord Lindsay of the Byres, originally resident at Garmynton, in East Lothian. The exact period and place of his birth are unknown, but it was probably at the Mount, the family seat near Cupar, Fife, in or about the year 1490. He was sent to the University of St. Andrews in 1505, the year of Knox's birth, and left it in 1509, at the age of nineteen. There is reason to believe that he travelled in Italy during the following year; but he must have returned to Scotland before the 12th of October, 1511, when we learn from the records of the Lord Treasurer he was presented with a play-coat for the play performed in the king and queen's presence in the Abbey of Holyrood.' It is probable that he held some office in the household of James IV., and he was appointed gentleman-usher to the eldest son of that monarch, afterwards James V., on the 12th of April, 1512, the day of the prince's birth. In the succeeding year he was an eye-witness of the extraordinary attempt made to deter James from his intended invasion of England by the pretended apparition of the Apostle John, at Linlithgow, and furnished both Pitscottie and Buchanan with a description of the striking scene.* After the death of the infatuated monarch in the battle of Flodden, Lindsay continued his attendance on his infant successor, and discharged the duties of his office with the greatest fidelity and affection. In his poem, called the 'Dream,' he reminds the king how, when he was young and had not begun to walk, he bore him tenderly in his arms, and warmly wrapped him in his little bed, and sweetly sang with lute in hand to give him pleasure, or danced riotously, or played farces before him on the floor. And in his 'Complaint,' he recalls to his sovereign's recollection how 'he lay nightly by his cheek,' and carried him on his back as a pedlar does his pack.† Lindsay continued his attendance on the youthful prince till 1524, when he was removed from his office along with the rest of the royal household by the unprincipled intrigues of the queen-mother. Bellenden, the learned translator of Livy and Boece, who was dismissed at the same time, in the proem to his 'Cosmographie,' thus speaks of this unfortunate revolution:—

'And first occurrit to my remembering,
How that I was in service with the king;
Put to his grace in years tenderest,
Clerk of his comptis,—tho' I was inding;
With heart and hand and every other thing,
That might him please in any manner best,
Till his envy me from his service best,
By them that had the court in governing,
As bird but plumes herryit out of the nest.'

But although Lindsay was ejected from his office, his services were not altogether overlooked or forgotten, for his pension continued to be regularly paid, in consequence, it appears, of the interference of the youthful monarch himself. In narrating this part of his history he says—

'But I slace! or ever I wist,
Was trampit down into the dust,
With heavy charge, withoutin moir;
But I wist never yet, wherefore;
And hastily before my face
Another slippit in my place,
Who lichtelee gat his reward,
And stylit was the ancient laird;
That time, I might make na defence,
Hut took perforce in patience:
Praying to send them aie mischance
That had the court in governance;
The quhilk against me did maling,¶ Contrair the pleasure of the king;
For well I knew his graces mind
Was ever to me true and kind,
And contrair their intention,
Gart pay me weil my pension;
Though I aie quhille wantit presence,
He let me have na indigence.'

During the next four years the youthful monarch continued to be used as a puppet in the hands of a grasping and imperious faction; but at last, in 1528, when every other effort to overthrow the domination of the Douglasses had failed, James, by his own vigour and address, succeeded in escaping from their odious thraldom.* An important change immediately took place in the administration of public affairs, and the former 'Keeper of the King's Grace,' as he is styled in the Treasurer's accounts, lost no time in availing himself of the favourable opportunity to improve his own fortunes. Aware of the youthful monarch's love of literature, and especial predilection for poetry, he produced, about the end of the year 1528, his poem entitled 'The Dream,' which has been characterized by Warton and Ellis as the most poetical of his compositions. It has been justly remarked, however, by Mr. Tytler, that 'the subject is too similar to various poems of Dunbar: 'There is, indeed, an unpleasant and somewhat monotonous sameness in the subjects of the ancient Scottish poets; nor can we exclude from the same censure their great contemporaries of the English school. It is their fashion to be too constantly composing dreams or visions; some of their finest pieces, although they do not assume the title resolve into the same thing, and we almost invariably find the poet dropping asleep. It is better, indeed, that these soporific propensities should be exhibited by the poet than his readers but their perpetual recurrence is tedious. Chaucer Gower, James I., Henryson, Dunbar, Douglas, and Sir David Lindsay, may all be arraigned as guilty of this fault; and it is to be found running through the works of many of their contemporaries whose names are unknown. It seems almost to have grown by frequent use into an established and accredited mode of getting rid of one of the greatest difficulties with which a writer has to struggle—the natural and easy introduction of his main subject. 'The King's Quhair,' 'The Thistle and the Rose,' 'The Golden Terge,' 'The Palace of Honour,' 'The General Satire,' 'The Praise of the Vision of Dame Vertue,' 'all in greater or less degree commence after the same monotonous manner; the poet either walks into a delicious garden, where he falls asleep, and, of course, is visited by a dream, or he awakes from sleep, rises from his couch, walks into a garden and reclining in some flowery arbour, again falls asleep, and sees a vision.† In the present case the poet, after having spent a long winter night without sleep, rises from his bed and bends his course towards the sea-shore. His description of the faded winter landscape is beautifully expressed—

'I met dame Flora in dule‡ weed disguisit,
Which into May was dulce and delectable,
With stalwart§ storms her sweetness was surprisit,

'The small fowls in flocks saw I flee

They lightit down beside me on ane tree,
Of their complaint I had compassion.
And with ane piteous exclamation,
They said, Blessed be summer, with his flowers !

With misty vapours to be obscured, allace ?

'Where art thou, May, with June thy sister schene, ¶
Weill bordourit with daisies of delight ?
And gentle July with thy mantle green,
Enamilit with roses red and white ?'

The poet ascends the cliffs on the sea-shore, and entering a cavern, sits down 'to register in rhyme some merry matter of antiquity.' But feeling an indisposition to labour, he wraps himself in his cloak, and is lulled asleep by the whistling of the wind among the rocks, and the beating of the tide. In his sleep he is favoured with 'ane marvellous vision,' and fancies himself accosted by a lady of great beauty and benignity of aspect, who informs him that she comes to bear him company and to soothe his melancholy. Accompanied by his fair guide, he is instantaneously carried into the centre of the earth, and enters the lowest hell, where he sees popes, emperors, kings, cardinals, and archbishops in their pontifical attire, 'proud and perverse prelates out of number,' and ecclesiastics of every degree, who have been condemned to this noisome pit as a punishment for their covetousness, lust, and ambition. He next beholds 'a den full dolorous,' where princes, and lords temporal of every rank, are tortured for their 'cruel oppression, frangous conquest,' and other crimes. 'Common people of every state' are seen 'flichtering in the fyre,'—mansworn (perjured) merchants, hoarders of gold, and common usurers, false men of law, right cunning in quirks, thieves, robbers, and public oppressors, dishonest labourers and craftsmen out of number.

Having surveyed this dreary region, the poet next obtains a view of purgatory, of the region to which unbaptized infants are consigned, and of theimbus of the souls of men who died before Christ. He then re-ascends with his guide through the bowels of the earth. In passing, they survey the mines of gold, silver, and precious stones, and mount through the ocean which is supposed to environ the earth, through the air, and next through the fire. They then enter the sphere of the moon, who is styled

'Queen of the sea and beauty of the night ;'

and after visiting in succession Mercurius and Venus, they pass

'————— to the sphere of Phœbus bright,
That lusty lamp and lantern of the heaven,
And gladder* of the stars with his light :
And principal of all the planetis seven,
And set in midst of them all full even,
As king royal rolling in his sphere,
Full pleasantly into his golden chair.'

And the poet describes with great force

'————— his diadem royal
Bordourit with precious stones shining bright,
His golden car or throne imperial,
The four steeds, that drawith it full right.'

They now pass through the 'chrySTALLINE' heaven, and are admitted to the 'Empyrean,' or heaven of heavens, the glorious inhabitants of which are described at great length. Remembrance and the poet leaving the celestial regions, survey the earth, which is represented as divided into three parts, no mention being made of America, although that quarter of the globe had been recently discovered. The poet then inquires concerning the terrestrial paradise, and is presented with a view of that 'glorious garth or garden of every flower,' which is described as situated in the middle region of the air, in a climate of perpetual serenity, and enclosed with walls of fire, and guarded by an angel.

The poet is next gratified with a distant view of his native land; and after dilating with great complacency on its seas teeming with fish, its fruitful mountains and vales, its pleasant rivers and lochs, its forests full of doe and roe, and hart and hind, and its fresh fountains, whose wholesome crystal streams water the green meads, he expresses his surprise that a country possessed of such natural advantages, and inhabited by a race of great ingenuity and strength, 'great deeds to endure,' should yet be sunk in a state of poverty and wretchedness. Remembrance informs him that wealth can never increase where 'policy,' or good government, does not exist, and that justice can only reside with peace. A nation must of necessity be unprosperous when those who ought to administer justice are guilty of slumbering on the tribunal. The miseries of Scotland are therefore all to be traced to the faults of its rulers—the want of justice, policy, and peace. While the poet and his conductress are thus discoursing, their attention is attracted by the sudden apparition of a remarkable figure,—

'And as we were speaking to and fro,
We saw ane bustoons beirne† come o'er the bent,
But horse on fute‡ as fast as he might go,
Whose raiment was all raggit, riven and rent,
With visage lean as he had fastit Lent :
And forward on his ways he did advance,
With ane richt melancholious countenance—

'With scrip on hip and pyke-staff in his hand,

‡ Without horse and on foot.

Quoth he, " My son, of that I think great shame ;
But sen* thou wald of my name have ane feil,† Forsooth they call me JOHN THE COMMONWEILL."

Sir Commonweill then enters into a lengthened description of the miserable state of the country. His friends, he says, are all put to flight. Policy is returned to France. His sister Justice has almost lost her sight, and is no longer able to hold the balance. Plain-wrong is now appointed captain of the ordinance, so that Equity and Reason are completely excluded. Over all the south of Scotland, from Berwickshire to Lochmaben in Annandale, he could not distinguish an honest man from a thief. In the Highland and Isles he could find no place of rest, and he was ignominiously driven from the Lowlands, where he attempted to find refuge. He had sought to 'make his moan' to the spiritual estate, but they had refused to listen to his complaint.

'Fryde has chased far from them humilitie :
Devotion is fled unto the friars,
Sensual pleasure has banished chastitie.'

And the prelates go like seculars, taking more pleasure in counting their money than in performing the duties of their office. Liberty, Loyalty, and Knightly Valour are all fled,

'And Cowardice with lords is laureate.'

He declares that he has therefore formed the resolution of abandoning a country where he has experienced nothing but neglect or insult from people of every description; and that no Scotchman shall again find favour with him until the kingdom be governed by 'ane auld prudent king,' who shall delight in executing justice, and in bringing strong traitors to condign punishment.

'As yet I say to thee ane other thing,
I see right weill that proverb is right true,
Woe to the realm that hath ane ow'r young king :
With that he turned his back and said Adieu.'

Remembrance then conducts the poet back to the cave on the sea shore, and he is speedily awakened by a discharge of artillery from a ship which at this juncture appears under sail. The poem concludes with 'Ane Exhortation to the King's Grace,' in which the poet, with great freedom and boldness, warns his sovereign against the faults which had proved fatal to his predecessors, and exhorts him, in strong terms, to attend carefully to the interests of the 'commonweill,' to drive flatterers from his presence, to deal evenhanded justice to great and small, to be an example to his people in all virtuous and honourable deeds, to shun avarice and sensuality, to use the counsel of his prudent barons, and not to follow the bent of his own individual will, and, finally, to remember that life is short and uncertain, and that none high or low can escape the stroke of the great leveller, death; and that as he must sooner or later put off this mortal frame, he should seek grace from Him who bled and died to confirm our peace.

† Information.

In the epistle to James V. prefixed to 'The Dream,' Lindsay speaks in affectionate terms of the services which he rendered to the king when a child,* and expresses his hope that he will receive 'anegudely recompence.' In 'The Complaint,' written in the following year (1529), he recurs to the subject, and after a graphic description of his own services, remonstrates with great freedom against the neglect with which he had been treated. His friends, he says, all blame his negligence in not seeking some recompence; and when he is asked why he has not got a piece of land as well as others, he is so ashamed that he can make no reply. He is assured, however, that his majesty will certainly reward him before he die, although he does not clamour 'like ane bard.' The blame of so long overlooking his services does not rest with the king. Had I solicited like the rest, he says,

'My reward had nocht bene to crave :
But now I may weill understand
Ane dumb man yet wan never land,
And in the court men get na thing
Withouten opportune asking.'

While the greedy courtiers were eagerly bent on promoting their own interest, he had no other care but to give pleasure to his youthful charge, who requited him with the fondest affection.

'I wat thou loved me better than Nor now some wyfe does her gudeman ;
Then men till other did record,
Said Lyndesday wald be made ane lord :
Thou has made lords, sir, by Sanet Geill !
Of some that has nocht servit so weill !'

The poet then proceeds to describe the manner in which his hopes were blasted by the revolution which took place in the government in 1524,† and portrays in striking colours the manner in which the tender age of the prince was corrupted by the designing profligacy of his attendants. His censure of their base and selfish conduct is given in remarkably bold and spirited terms. They took the young prince from the schools, he says, where he was learning virtue and science,

'And hastily put in his hand
The government of all Scotland :
As who when roars the stormy blast,
And mariners are all aghast,
Through dangers of the ocean's rage,
Would take a child of tender age,
That never had been on the sea,
And to his bidding all obey,
Putting the rudder in his hand,
For dread of rocks and the foreland.'

'I may not call their counsel treason,' he continues, 'but I must pronounce it folly and madness. I pray God that I may never again see in this realm so young a king.' The passage has already been given in which the poet denounces with honest indignation the conduct of those wicked counsellors by whom the youthful monarch was artfully exposed to the most alluring temptations, and studiously initiated in vicious pleasures.‡ He describes, with much spirit and humour, the interested and avaricious motives by which the courtiers and governors of the prince were actuated, and the manner in which they contrived to engross and divide among themselves the richest offices.

'Roukand* and whispering to each other,
Tak thou my part, quoth he, my brother;
Be there between us stedfast bands,
When aught shall vaik† into our hands,
That each man stand to help his fellow;
I hold thereto man by all hallow,‡
And if the Treasurer§ be our friend,
Then shall we get bath tack and teind,||
Tak he our part then who dare wrong us,
But we shall part¶ the pelf amang us.

So hastily they made a band,
Some gather'd gold, some conquest land:
Sir, some would say by St. Denis,
Give me some lusty benefice,
And ye shall all the profit have;
Give me the name, take thou the lave; **
But e'er the bulls were weil come hame,
His conscience told him twas a shame;
An action sinful and prodigious,
To make such paction with the lieges—
So to avoid the sin and scandal,
'Twas right bath name and rent to handle.††

While this sad scene of selfishness and misgovernment was going on, the poet, deprived of his office, and afraid to appear openly at court, could only hide himself in a corner, from which he watched the unprincipled proceedings of those who had seized the government and person of the young king:—

'When I durst neither peep nor look,
I yet could hide me in a nook;
To see these wondrous governors,
And how like any busy bees
They occupied their golden hours,
With help of their new governours.'

The poet then proceeds to describe in vigorous strains the torn and distracted state of the country, in consequence of the struggles for power among the hostile factions; the rapid revolutions which took place in the government; the expulsion of the Douglasses by Archbishop Beaton and the Regent Albany—

'And others took the governing,
Weill worse than they in ilka thing'

The return of Angus to power; the tumult, misery, and bloodshed by which it was accompanied, while on every side there was bloodshed; and the court was thronged with 'tyrants, traitors, public oppressors, murderers, and common thieves;' and finally, the unexpected escape of the king, with the precipitate flight of those who had kept him in irksome and ignominious thralldom—

'When of their lives they had sic dreed,
That they were fain to trot o'er Tweed.'

With this miserable state of things Lindsay dexterously contrasts the prosperous condition of the country after James had taken the reins of government into his own hands. Justice had been executed on the highland katerans and on Johnnie Armstrong, and other noted border freebooters; Oppression and his accomplices had been hanged; Poverty had fled to the Hebrides; idle rogues were condemned to the galleys, and the husbandman rejoiced in his security, now that 'the rash-bush kept the cow.' In describing the effect of the famous expedition which James undertook against the border thieves, and the other vigorous measures adopted by him for the repression of disorder and crime, soon after his assumption of the supreme power, the poet employs the following striking and picturesque personifications:—

'Now Justice holds her sword on high
With her balance of Equity;
And in this realm has made sic ordour,
Baith thro' the Hieland, and the Bordour,
That Oppression and all his fellows
Are hanged high upon the gallows;
Dame Prudence has thee by the head,
And Temperance doth thy bridle lead,
I see dame Force mak assistance,
Bearing thy targe of assurance;
And lusty Lady Chastity
Has banished Sensualitie:
Dame Riches takes on thee sic cure,
I pray God that she lang endure,
That Poverty dare not be seen
Into thy house for bath her een,
But fra thy grace fled many miles,
Among the hunters in the Isles:
Dissimulance dare not show her face,
Quhilk wont was to beguile thy grace,
Folly is fled out of the town,
Quhilk aye was contrair to reason;
Policy and Peace begin to plant,
That virtuous men can nothing want;
And masterful and idle lowis;
Shall banished be in the Galzeowns;‡
John Upland ben full blyth I trow,
Because the rash-bush keeps the cow.¶

'Everything in the realm,' he continues, 'is now brought into good order except the spiritual estate,' and he exhorts the king to compel his clergy to attend to the duties of their office; to preach with sincerity; to administer the sacraments according to the institution of Christ; and not to deceive the flock with vain traditions, such as superstitious pilgrimages, and prayers to graven images, contrary to the express command of God. He alludes to the punishment which overtook Jeroboam and other princes of Israel, who countenanced idolatry, and were therefore justly rooted out of their kingdoms, and encourages the king to incline his heart

'To keep the blessed law divine,'

by the example of the patriarchs and of many faithful kings of Israel, who overthrew idolatry, and would suffer no images to stand in the temple, because they were forbidden by Divine command. The picce, which, to use the words of Warton, is written throughout with vigour, and occasionally with much tenderness and elegance, concludes with a hint that, since his majesty is the richest monarch that ever reigned in Scotland, it will be for his credit not to overlook the merits of his old servant; and if,—he quaintly adds, his grace will lend him

' Shall canse me stand content
With quiet life and sober rent,
And take me in my latter age,
Unto my simple hermitage,
To spend the gear my elders won,
As did Diogenes in his tun.'†

The 'Complaint' of the poet was not made in vain, for in the following year he was appointed Lion King-at-arms; an office of great dignity and importance, as the Lion was not only the chief judge within the realm of all matters connected with heraldry, but was also the official ambassador from his sovereign to foreign countries. The earliest notice of this official is at the coronation of Robert II. in 1371, though it is probable that the office itself is of as high antiquity as the bearing of coats armorial. In a manuscript account of the coronation of the Scottish kings, it is stated, that when Robert was inaugurated, the Lion King-at-arms was called in by the Lord Marshal, attended by the heralds, who came in their coats or tabards. The Lion then sat down at the king's feet, and the heralds went to the stage prepared for them; after which the Marshal, by the mouth of the Bishop of St. Andrews, did swear the Lion, who being sworn, put on his crown ordained him to wear for the solemnity.‡ The Lion King himself, when he was appointed to his office, was inaugurated with great state and solemnity. The ancient crown of Scotland was placed on his head by the king himself, and it was his privilege on the day of his coronation to dine at the royal table, wearing the crown during the continuance of the feast.§

Shortly after his promotion, Lindsay appears to have written the 'Complaint of the King's Papingo,' a satirical poem, which, as Mr. Tytler remarks, may be regarded as his first open declaration of war against the abuses of the Romanist religion in Scotland. 'The fiction,' he continues, 'of throwing his observations into the mouth of this feathered satirist, so well known for its petulance, garrulity, and licentiousness of remark, was ingenious and prudent; ingenious, because it enabled him to be severe under the disguise of being natural; and prudent, as in the case of any threatened ecclesiastical persecution, it permitted him to substitute the papingo for the poet.*

In the introductory stanzas the poet enumerates the 'poets auld,' Dunbar, Kennedy, Douglas, and other illustrious brethren of the lyre, who have written 'in style heroical of every matter, tragedy, and story,' and whose genius far transcends the 'dull intelligence of poets now.' And even though he had 'ingyne,' he complains that he knows not what to write, for every rich and resplendent flower in the garden of poetry has been already plucked by these master spirits; he must therefore be contented with 'The Complaint of a Wounded Papingo, or Parrot.' The poet's description of his feathered heroine is exceedingly graceful and pleasing:—

'Ane papingo, right pleasant and perfyte,† Presentit was till our most noble King,
Of whom his Grace ane lang time had delyte—
Mair fair of form I wot flew ne'er on wing:
This proper‡ bird he gave in governing
To me, who was his simple servitoure,
On whom I did my diligence and cure.

'To learn her language artificial,
To play "plafute," and whistle "futebefore,"§
But of her inclination natural,
She counterfeit all fowls less or more,
Of her courage.|| She wald without my lore,
Sing like the merle, and craw like to the cock,
Pew like the gled,¶ and chaunt like the laverock.

Climbe on a cord, syne lauch and play the fule,
She might have been ane minstrel against Yule:
This blissit bird was to me so pleasad,
Where'er I went I bore her on my hand.'

Accompanied as usual by this amusing companion, the poet, one pleasant morning, strolled into his garden to repose among the 'flowers, fresh, fragrant and beautiful,'

'Walking alane, none but my bird and I.'

He wishes to repeat his morning prayers, and in the interval places his talkative friend on a branch beside him. But she, delighted with her liberty, began to climb from twig to twig, till she reached so great a height as to alarm the poet for her safety.

'Sweet bird, said I, beware! monnt not our high,
Return in time, perchance thy feet may fallzie;
Thon art richt fat, and nocht weill used to flie,
The greedie gled I dread she thee assailzie.

'With sorry heart, pierced with compassion,
And salt tears distilling from mine e'ne,
To hear that bird's lamentation
I did approach under ane hawthorn green,
Where I might hear, and see, and be unseen;
And when this bird had swooned twice or thrice,
She gan to speak, saying upon this wise.'

In this sad condition the dying papingo first of all laments the feckleness of fortune, and her own contempt of prudent counsel; and then proceeds to address an epistle, first to her sovereign lord the king, next to her brother at court; and lastly she enters into a 'communing' with her holy executors, a magpie, a raven, and a hawk, who personate the characters of a canon regular, a black monk, and a holy friar. 'In this manner, somewhat inartificial, if we consider that the poem is long, and the papingo in the agonies of death, Lindsay contrives to introduce his advice to the king, his counsel to the courtiers and nobles, and his satire upon the corruptions of the clergy. Much in each of these divisions is excellent, the observations are shrewd, the political advice sound and honest, the poetry always elegant, often brilliant, and the wit of that light and graceful kind which, unlike some of his other pieces, is not deformed by coarseness or vulgarity.'¶ In the epistle to the king, after alluding to his fine natural genius and accomplishments, he reminds him that he is only the vassal of the King of kings, who will bestow upon him an inestimable reward, if he prove a faithful and diligent ruler, and will assuredly inflict upon him condign punishment if he prove slothful or negligent. He therefore exhorts his majesty to apply his vigorous intellect to the study of the duties of his office—to show himself an example to his subjects in honour and virtue—to choose wise counsellors, and to follow their advice—to gain the hearts of his nobles, and to mix mercy with justice in the correction of their faults—to shun the errors which had ruined many of his predecessors, and to entreat the blessed Saviour to keep him from evil deeds,

'That na poet report of thee but gude.'¶

The epistle to his brother at court describes in terse and spirited terms the feckleness and mutability of courts—the 'painful pleasure' of the dependents on the favour of the Sovereign, living 'sometime in hope, sometime in discomfort,'—the feigning fools and flatterers who often obtain great rewards for small service—the pickthanks, pretenders, and tell-tales, who

'Sometime in court have mair authority
Nor devout doctors in divinitie.'

He anathematizes in strong language the conduct of the sons of Belial who infest the royal palace, and by their wicked counsel entice their sovereign to gambling and licentiousness, and declares that if he had the power, such knaves should be punished more severely even than traitors. He then goes on to tell

'What travers,* trouble, and calamity,
Hath been in court within thy hundred years;
What mortal changes and what misery,
What noble men bene brought upon their biers.'

and to show that neither prince nor page is exempt from these calamities, he refers to the miserable fate of the various sovereigns of the Stuart family. The assassination of the unfortunate Duke of Rothsay, the broken heart of his royal father, Robert III., the execution of Murdoch, Duke of Albany, and the ruin of his family, the long captivity and cruel murder of James I., 'the pattern of prudence, gem of ingyne, and pearl of policy,' the sudden death of his successor, the rebellion of the nobles and of his own son against James III., the hanging of Cochran and his 'captive company' over Lauder Bridge, are rapidly sketched with great discrimination, and in vigorous and condensed language. The character of the gallant and chivalrous James IV., and the description of his gay and brilliant court, and energetic and popular government, are given with remarkable power and brevity.

'Allace! where bene that right redoubted Roy,
That potent prince, gentle King James the Feird,

Triumphant tournays, justings, kniebly game,
With all pastime according for a king:
He was the glorie of princely governing:
Quhilk through the ardent love he had to France,
Against England did move his ordinance.'

The poet then proceeds to describe, in feeling terms, the 'great misrule and strange adversities' which befell the country, the 'robbery, murder, and mischance' which prevailed everywhere,

'When our young prince could neither speak nor gang.'

‘Sometimes the queen exercised supreme authority, sometimes the Duke of Albany; sometimes the realm was ruled by regents, sometimes by lieutenants, leaders of the law. Lawlessness was so common, that few or none stood in awe of each other. Oppression blew his bugle so loudly, that no man durst travel unless in full armour, and Jock Upland (John the countryman) lost his mare.’

After depicting the successive changes which took place in the government of the realm during that troubled period; the high authority and speedy overthrow of Queen Margaret; the rise and fall of Archbishop Beaton, who from being chancellor and primate was reduced to such misery that he was compelled to skulk through the country in the disguise of a freebooter; the domination, and subsequent banishment, of the ‘doughty earls of Douglas;’ and exhorting his ‘brother dear’ not to trust in vain prosperity, but to put his confidence in God alone, and to serve his prince with a single and honest heart; the poet directs the mind of his youthful sovereign, with great solemnity, to the only unchanging court of which Christ is king, where sorrow and mutability are unknown, and into which ‘disimulation, flattery, and false report’ shall never enter. Resuming the character of the papingo, which he had for a time forgotten, the epistle of the dying favourite to his brother at court concludes with a highly poetical address to Edinburgh, Stirling, Lathgow, and Falkland, in whose palaces and gardens he had spent so many happy hours.

* *Adieu, Edinburgh! thou high triumphant town, Within whose bounds right blithful have I been,
Of true merchandis the rufe* of this region,
Most ready to receive court, king, and queen;
Thy polley and justice may be seen,

And credence unt they might be found in thee.*

* *Adieu, fair Snowdown! with thy towers hie,
Thy chapel-royal, park, and table round,
May, June, and July would I dwell in thee,
Were I a man to hear the birdis sound,
Which doth against the royal rock redound.
Adieu, Lathgow! whose palace of plesance
Meets not its peer in Portingale or France.*

* *Fairwall, Falkland! the forteress of Fife,
Thy velvet park under the Lomond law;
Sometime in thee I led a lusty life,
The fallow deer to see them raik on raw, †
Court men to come to thee they have great awe Slaying thy burgh bene to all burrows baill, ‡
Because in thee they never got good ale.*

In the ‘Communing between the Papingo and her holy executors,’ the jay, the hawk, and the raven, there is a vigorous and biting exposure of the abuses of the spiritual estate, exhibiting much learning combined with playful wit. But the expostulation, besides being out of keeping with the situation of the bird, fluttering and bleeding among the flowers, is much too long, and is occasionally tedious and rambling. The papingo is entreated by her executors that as she has acquired experience by travel, is acquainted with the qualities of all countries, and knows the judgment of ‘the vulgar people,’ she should tell them in what estimation they are held.

‘The veritie declare withouten lees,*
What thou hast heard by land or by seas,
Of us kirkmen baith gude and evil report,
And how they judge, show us we thee exhort.’

Thus objured, the papingo informs her clerical friends that the sanctity of their peerless predecessors, apostles, martyrs, confessors, was celebrated over all the world, and they were held in the highest honour for their labours, sufferings, and holy lives. In these primitive and purer ages of Christianity the church was wedded to Poverty, whose children were Chastity and Devotion. The Emperor Constantine unfortunately took upon him to divorce this holy couple, and without asking or obtaining a dispensation, espoused the church to Property. The marriage was ratified by Pope Silvester, upon which Devotion retired to a hermitage. In due time Dame Property produced two daughters, named Riches and Sensuality, whose beauty attracted universal admiration. They speedily obtained the complete control of all spiritual matters; through their influence the priests forgot to study, pray, and preach, and thought it a tiresome task to instruct the poor;—marriage was prohibited, and Dame Chastity stole away for shame, and through the influence of Sensuality was exiled from Italy and France. She attempted, but in vain, to find protection in England. She then sought refuge in the court of Scotland, but was driven away with oaths and threats, and ordered to tell her story to the priests. The bishops, alarmed at her appearance, protested that they would harbour no rebel to the See of Rome, and sent her to the nuns, who welcomed her with processions and other honours; but Riches and Sensuality having received immediate information of her friendly reception among the nuns, the hapless wanderer was again turned adrift. She next applied to the mendicant friars, who declared that they could not take charge of ladies. At last she found refuge in the nunnery of the Borough-moor, near Edinburgh, † where she met with her mother Poverty, and her Sister Devotion, and where the pious sisterhood are so strongly fortified and defended by six great pieces of artillery, Perseverance, Constancy, Conscience, Austerity, Labour, and Abstinence, that they are able to set at defiance all the assaults of their enemy.

The poet then proceeds to denounce in vehement language the flagrant vices of the prelates, whose trafficking in benefices, ignorance, licentiousness, and insatiable greed of filthy lucre, have almost driven religion out of the country. The abuse of patronage on the part of princes, who dispose of their benefices to reward their courtiers—men often of the most abandoned character—is one cause of these great enormities. 'Were I a man worthy to wear a crown,' he adds, 'when a benefice became vacant, I would call a meeting of the principal prelates, the most cunning (knowing or skilful) clerks of the universities, and the most celebrated fathers of the church, and make the appointment by their advice. I should dispose of all pastoral offices to doctors of divinity or law: I should compel the barons to send their sons to the schools to learn science, and then promote those who were the wisest and most worthy.' What a contrast this would present to the present state of matters!

'Great pleasure it were to hear ane bishop preach,
Ane dean, or doctor in divinity,
Ane abbot, who could weill his convent teach;
Ane parson, flowing in philosophy:
I tyme* my time to wish what will not be;
Were nocht the preaching of the begging friars,
T'yt were the faith among the seculars.'

And not only do the clergy neglect preaching and every other spiritual duty, but they have become so fond of rich dresses, that

'They have renounced russet and raploch+ white:

Their ance low hearts exalted are so high,
To see their papal pomp it is ane pyne;††
More rich array is now with fringes fine,
Upon the trappings of a bishop's mule,
Nor e'er had Paul or Peter against Yule.'

The poor papingo having thus unburdened her conscience, makes her confession, and is shriven by the gled, or hawk, who pretends to be a friar. The scene which follows is described with great felicity and humour. After giving her absolution, the hawk, holding up her head, whilst the raven stands on one side and the magpie on the other, inquires tenderly to which of the three she chooses to leave her fortune and goods:—

'Choose you, she said, which of us brethren here,
Shall have of all your natural geir;‡ the curis,

Since at this time friendship I find none other.
We shall be to you true as to our mother,
Quoth they, and swore to fulfil her intent;
Of that, said she, I take ane instrument.'

The magpie is appointed 'overman,' or umpire, and the papingo proceeds to make her last will and testament. She leaves her green mantle to the solitary and unobtrusive owl, her golden and brilliant eyes to the bat, her sharp and burnished beak to the gentle pelican—

'To help to pierce her tender heart in twain,' her angelical voice to the cuckoo, 'who has nae sang but ane,' her eloquence and 'tongue rhetorical' to the goose, her bones, which she directs to be enclosed in a case of ivory, to the Arabian phoenix, her heart to the king her master, and her intestines, liver, and lungs to her three executors. Having thus disposed of her effects, the papingo falls into 'her mortal passion,' and after a severe struggle at last breathes out her life. Her executors immediately proceed to divide her body in the most summary manner:—

'The Raven began rudely to rug and ryve,
Full gourmandlike his empty throat he fed;
Eat softly, brother, said the greedy Gled.'

In a twinkling there is nothing left of the luckless bird, except the heart, which the magpie, feeling some twinges of conscience, vindicates as belonging to the king. But the portion is too tempting to his confederates. 'May I be hanged,' says the raven, 'if this piece shall be given either to king or duke.' The magpie threatens to complain to the Pope; a tussle ensues, the greedy hawk seizing the heart in his talons, soars away, whilst the others pursue him with loud cries, and disappear in the air. Thus ends the 'little tragedy' of the papingo; the poet, according to the custom of the age, dismissing his book with an acknowledgment of its rudeness and imperfection—'a very unnecessary apology,' says Mr. Tytler, 'for it is, in point of elegance, learning, variety of description, and easy playful humour, worthy to hold its place with any poem of the period, either English or Scottish.'

Soon after writing this poem, in April, 1531, Lindsay was despatched to Brussels along with David Panter, secretary to the king, and Sir James Campbell, of Lundie, for the purpose of negotiating the renewal of the commercial treaty, concluded by James the First, between Scotland and the Netherlands. The Scottish ambassadors were received with great state and solemnity by the Queen of Hungary, who had recently succeeded to the prefecture of the Netherlands, and by her brother, the Emperor Charles V., and were completely successful in every point of their mission. Sir David seems to have been greatly delighted with the splendid entertainments which he witnessed at the imperial court. In a curious epistle from Antwerp to the Scottish secretary of state, he thus expresses himself:—'It were too langsome to write to your lordship the triumphs that I have seen since my camin to the court imperial, that is to say, the triumphs and joustings, the terrible tournaments, the fighting on foot in barras, the names of lords and knights that were hurt that day of the great tournament, whose circumstances I have written at length in articles to show the King's Grace at my home coming.'* These 'articles' containing the remarks of so shrewd an observer as Lindsay must have been exceedingly interesting, and it is to be regretted that no trace of them can be discovered. On his return from his mission, about the close of the year 1531, Lindsay married a lady of the name of Janet

* Chalmers' Life, p. 14.

Douglas. There is reason to suspect that the marriage of the poet was unhappy. He had no children, and from the terms in which he usually talks of the female sex, it has been plausibly conjectured that his wife was not possessed of a very amiable disposition.*

About the close of the year 1535, Lindsay wrote his celebrated 'Satire of the Three Estates,' one of the most interesting and valuable of his poetical productions. In Scotland, as in the other European kingdoms, the earliest dramatic exhibitions were the miracle-plays, or mysteries, which were usually founded on the narratives of the Bible, or on the legends of the saints, and were acted in churches and other sacred edifices.† These rude dramas were succeeded by the more complicated representations known by the name of Moralities, in which such allegorical characters as Charity, Hope, Faith, Sin, and Death, were introduced, for the purpose of satirizing prevailing vices; and from thence the transition must have been natural and easy to such dramatic pieces as the Satire of the Three Estates. At an early period, ridiculous and profane parodies of the rites and ceremonials of the church, under the superintendence of a personage called the Abbot of Unreason, were very common and highly popular in Scotland;‡ and the representation of Robin Hood seems to have been as favourite a pastime among the Scottish people as among the merry men of Yorkshire. The first Scottish drama of which we have any notice, was a 'Mystery,' called the 'Haliblude,' which was acted on the Windmill-hill at Aberdeen, in 1445; but jugglers, minstrels, buffoons, and masqued characters, appear at the Scottish court at a much earlier period. Drummond of Hawthornden mentions, that during the reign of James I. masques were not only licensed, but studied and admired. In 1503, at the celebration of the nuptials of James IV. with the Princess Margaret of England, a company of English comedians, who had accompanied the young queen from Windsor, entertained the court with a dramatic representation. 'After dinner,' says John Young, Somerset Herald, 'a morality was played by the said Master Inglisho and his companions, in the presence of the kyng and quene; and then daunces were daunced.' In 1515, when John Duke of Albany arrived from France, to assume the regency, we learn from Lesley that when he entered the capital he 'was received by many lords and barons, who met him, and that sundrie farces and gude plays were made by the burgesses of the town to his honour and praise.*

Lindsay appears to have been frequently entrusted with the management of the plays and public pageants, which were exhibited during the reign of James V.; and in 1535 he produced the morality entitled 'The Satire of the Three Estates,' in commendation of virtue and vituperation of vice, which is the earliest specimen of the genuine Scottish drama that has come down to our day. 'Whether,' says Chalmers, 'the matter or the manner of this drama be considered, it must be allowed to be a very singular performance, and to have carried away the palm of dramatic composition from the contemporary moralities of England, till the epoch of the first tragedy in Gorboduc, and of the first comedy in Gammer Gurton's Needle.' This singular production, in which the follies and vices of the king and his courtiers, and the abuses of the church, are attacked with equal boldness and freedom, contains many noble and even pious sentiments, mingled with passages so coarse and licentious that they cannot be read without disgust and astonishment. 'The spirit of Aristophanes, in all its good and evil,' says Sir Walter Scott, 'seems to have actuated the Scottish King-at-arms.' The fact that such a composition was acted before an audience composed not only of the king and his nobles, but of the queen and the ladies of the court, together with the leading ecclesiastics, certainly gives us a low picture of the morality and delicacy of the age. 'The boldness of the author, and the liberality or folly of the audience, are equally conspicuous. The representation took place before the king, with his favourite ministers and advisers; yet it lashes his youthful excesses, and their profligate and selfish devices, with unsparing severity. It was performed in presence of the bishops and clergy, and before an immense multitude of the people, the burgesses, the yeomen, the poor labourers, and tacksmen; and yet it exposes with a poignancy of satire and a breadth of humour, which must have made the deepest impression, the abuses of the Catholic religion, the evils of pluralities and non-residence, the ignorance of the priests, the grievance of tithes, the profligacy of the prelates, and the happy effects which would result from a thorough and speedy reformation. Hitherto what had been written against these excesses had never reached the people; it was generally shut up in a learned language which they did not understand; if composed in English, there were few printing-presses to multiply books, or if printed, the great body of the people could not read them. But Lindsay, when he wrote a play in the language of the people, and procured permission to have it acted before them, at once acquired a moral influence over the times, and gave a strength and edge to his satire, which probably neither the king, the clergy, nor the author himself contemplated. Had it been otherwise, it is difficult to believe that the prince or prelates would have or any author have dared the trial of such an experiment.*

The 'Satire of the Three Estates' was first enacted at Cupar, in the year 1535. The performance, like that of the ancient drama, took place in the open air, on a large green mound, of much natural beauty, called the Moot Hill. In 1539, it was performed in the open fields at Linlithgow, by the express desire of the king, who, with the ladies of the court, attended the representation. It was subsequently acted in the amphitheatre of St. Johnston, or Perth, and in 1554 it was performed at Edinburgh, in the valley of Greenside, which skirts the northern base of the Calton Hill, in presence of the queen regent, and an immense concourse of the nobility and common people.

The extraordinary length of this curious drama shows that its representation must have occupied nearly the entire day. We are informed, indeed, by Charteris, the bookseller, who was himself present, that its exhibition, in 1554, before the queen regent, lasted 'fra nine hours afore noon till six hours at even.†' It appears, however, from one of the stage-directions, that a short pause took place in the representation of the play, during which the spectators had an opportunity of taking some refreshment.

The 'Satire of the Three Estates' is divided into three parts, which are connected by an extremely simple plot. Among the 'Dramatis Personæ' are such allegorical personages as King Humanity, Diligence, Good Counsel, Homeliness, Verity, Chastity, Correction, together with such disreputable interlocutors as Flattery, Falsehood, Sensuality, and Theft. Intermingled with these figures are characters representing directly the various classes of the community. Among them are the Bishop, Abbot, Parson, Prioress, and Pardoner—the Shoemaker and Tailor, with their wives—the Friar, who is Flattery in disguise, and the Doctor, who delivers a sermon on the text, 'If thou wilt enter into life keep the commandments.' The proceedings open with an address by Diligence, who announces himself as a messenger from 'a right noble and redoubted King Humanity, who has been long absent, but is now about to appear, in order to punish all evil-doers.' He then makes proclamation that the Three Estates of the Realm are to appear and pay their homage to their sovereign, and beseeches the audience to be patient till they 'have heard our short narration,' as he curiously terms this lengthened exhibition, and to remember that no satire is intended against any person in particular, that all is general, spoken in pastime, and to be heard in silence. 'Therefore,' he says, 'let every man keep his one tongue without permitting it to wag against us, and every woman her two.'

* Prudent people, I pray you all,
Take na man greif in special,

For we shall speak in general,
For pastime and for play;
Therefore till all our rhymes be rung,
And our mistuned songs be sung,
Let every man keep well ane tongue,
And every woman twae.'

King Humanity is then brought upon the stage, followed by Placebo, Solace, Flattery, and Falsehood, by whose evil counsel he is seduced into wicked courses—a satirical stroke directed against the base and vicious courtiers by whom James the Fifth was misled in his youth. Good Counsel attempts to obtain an audience of the monarch, but is dragged out by Flattery and Deceit; Verity enters and exhorts all judges to execute justice with impartiality, and rulers to set a good example to their subjects. But at the sight of the New Testament 'in English tongue, and printit in England,' which she carries in her hand, Flattery cries out 'Heresy! heresy! fire! fire!' and with the assistance of Deceit puts Verity in the stocks—a piece of good service which Spirituality rewards with a guerdon of ten crowns. Chastity, repulsed in succession by the Prioress, the lords of Spirituality, the Abbot, the Parson, and Temporality, takes refuge with the Tailor and the Shoemaker, but is chased away by their wives, and ultimately placed in the stocks beside Verity. At last Divine Correction appears, and after releasing Good Counsel, Chastity, and Verity, rebukes King Humanity for his offences, and succeeds in reclaiming him from his evil habits. The penitent monarch then expresses his willingness to follow the counsel of his monitor, and to punish all crimes and to redress all grievances. Correction advises him immediately to proclaim a parliament, and Diligence is ordered to summon the Three Estates of the Realm to assist their sovereign with their counsel, which he forthwith proceeds to do in the following terms:—

'At the command of King Humanitie,
I warn and charge all members of Parliament,
Baith spiritual estate and temporalitie,
That till his Grace they be obedient,
And speed them to the court incontinent,
In gude order, arrayit royallie,
Wha beis absent or inobedient,
The king's displeasure they shall underlie.
Also I make you exhortatioun,
Since ye have heard the first part of our play,
Go tak ane drink, and mak collatioun,
Ilk man till his marrow • I you pray.'

The second part opens with a conversation between a poor mendicant and Diligence, in which a severe attack is made upon the avarice of the clergy, and the extreme severity with which they exacted their ecclesiastical dues. The pauper asks charity for himself and his six motherless bairns, and informs Diligence that he belongs to the neighbourhood of Tranent, and is on his road to St. Andrews to 'seek law,' for he has been reduced to beggary by the extortions of these clerical enormants. He thus tells his story, which there is every reason to believe does not exaggerate the manner in which the poor were at that time served by their clerical superiors :—

And was of age fourscore of years and more;
And Maud, my mother, was fourscore and fyftene;
And with my labour I did them haith sustene.

And every year she brought us hame ane foal.

Till at the last she deit for very sorrow:
And when the vicar heard tell my wife was dead,

The vicar gart¶ his clerk bear them away.
When all was gane I might make na debate,
But with my bairns past for till beg my meat.
Now have I told you the hlack verity,
How I am brocht into this misery.'

To add to the misfortunes of this luckless wight,
the parson had excommunicated him for his tithes, and refused him the Sacrament at Easter. He has nothing left except an English groat, which he purposes to give to 'ane man of law.' Diligence tells him,

' Thou art the daftest fool that ever I saw;
Trows thou, man, by the law to get remeid
Of men of kirk? Na nocht till thou be dead.'

A Pardoner, or retailer of the Papal indulgences, now enters, denouncing in vehement terms 'the wicked New Testament' and its translators, and imprecating vengeance on those who brought it to this country, and wishing

Pardoners were well-known characters at the epoch of the Reformation, and by their knavish and licentious conduct brought great discredit upon the church which sanctioned their nefarious traffic.
Chaucer, in his Canterbury Tales, introduces a character of this description, with his wallet 'brimful

During the dialogue which takes place between the Pardoner and the Pauper, the Three Estates of the Realm issue from the 'palzoun,' or tent, in procession, but to the astonishment of the audience they approach the king's presence, not in the usual fashion with their faces turned toward the sovereign, but going backward. Correction inquires the cause of this strange procedure,—

' My tender friends, I pray you with my heart,
Declare to me the thing that I wald speir,
What is the cause that gang ye all backward?

The sovereign now announces his determination to redress all abuses, but is reproved for his hasty resolution by Spirituality, who advises him to postpone the sitting of parliament to a future time; upon which Correction declaring his disapprobation of such criminal counsel, orders Diligence to make public proclamation, that every man who feels himself aggrieved should give in his bill of complaint. No sooner is this announcement made, than John the Commonweill comes forward in great haste to tell his story. Honest John is very poorly clad, and in answer to the inquiries of the king, he accounts for his forlorn condition by presenting a long catalogue of grievances under which he has long laboured. The reverend fathers of the church are led by Covetousness and Sensuality. Temporality has for a long time been under Public Oppression, and the merchants and craftsmen are misled by Falsehood and Deceit.

'What marvel though the Three Estates backward gang,
When sic an evil company dwells them amang,
Whilk has ruled this rout mony deir days,
Whilk gars John the Commonweill want his warm claes.'

Flattery, Falsehood, and Deceit are then put in the stocks, and Covetousness and Sensuality take to their heels. Good Counsel, as one who knows both the canon and the civil laws, is called in to assist the parliament in their deliberations, and John the Commonweill proceeds with the detail of his complaints, which furnish a most interesting sketch of national manners, and of the condition of the people at this period. St. Paul, he says, has declared, that he who does not work shall not eat, and therefore he invokes the penalties of the law upon all sturdy beggars, jugglers, jesters, gamblers, tale-bearers, and vagabond bards—and upon all 'great fat friars,' Augustines, Carmelites, and Cordeliers, and all other cowl-wearers who labour not, and yet are well fed. He next denounces the partial and unequal administration of justice, alleging that while a petty thief who steals a single ewe is consigned to the gallows, the robber who carries off a fold of cattle escapes with a fine; and that while picking and piddling thieves are hanged,

'Ane cruel tyrant, ane strang transgressor, Ane common public place oppressor,'

by means of bribes obtains the favour of the public officials, and is let off on easy terms. Temporality, on this, expresses contrition, and promises amendment, but Spirituality alleges that it is not good to act too hastily in such matters, which require careful consideration. John is then asked if he has any other complaints to make against the spiritual lords; but he desires to be excused from saying more on this subject, as it is no jest to find fault with the clergy. Being encouraged however by Correction, he goes on to complain of the extortions of the vicar, in his merciless exaction of the corpse-present from poor widows and orphans, and of the covetousness and inefficiency of the parson, who cares about nothing but the receiving and spending of his tithes, and will not want a single sheaf of barley to which he has a claim, though his parishioners may be left without preaching for seventeen years. These charges are indignantly denied by the parson, who significantly reminds his accuser of the fiery doom in store for heretics and calumniators of the clergy:—

'To speak of priests be sure it is na bourdie,
They will burn men now for reckless words,
And all these words are heresie in deid.'

The merchants recommend, that to prevent the rise of rents and the expulsion of the husbandmen from their farms, all the estates of the temporal barons should be let on feu or freehold, to 'men that labour with their hands,' and not to 'gearking (vain, showy) gentill men,' so that the king may have soldiers equipped with harness, bow, and spear, ready for war. This advice is approved of by Good Counsel, and passed into a law. With regard to the clerical exactions complained of, he states that nothing can be done without the consent of the prelates and clergy, which is at once peremptorily refused. Spirituality declares,

'We will want nothing that we have in use,
Kirkle nor cow, tiend lamb, tiend gryse, nor guse.'

The misdeeds of the bishops and dignified clergy are then brought under review. They are accused of obtaining presentations to their benefices by means of large bribes to the Romish court; of grasping a plurality of livings; and of habitual neglect of the duty of preaching. Correction, declares that shoemakers and tailors are far more expert 'in their poor craft and in their handie art' than prelates are in their vocation, a statement which tends to corroborate an exceedingly characteristic anecdote of the poet, related by his first editor. The king, it is said, being one day surrounded by a numerous train of nobles and prelates, Lindsay approached him in a reverential manner, and presented an humble petition that his majesty would instal him in an office which had lately become vacant. 'I have,' said he, 'servit your grace lang, and look to be rewardit as others are, and now your master tailor, at the pleasure of God, is departit: wherefore I wald desire of your grace to bestow this little benefite upon me.' The king replied that he was amazed at such an application from a person who could neither shape nor sew. 'Sire,' rejoined the poet, 'that makes nae matter; for you have given bishoprics and benefices to mony standing here about you, and yet they can nouthier teach nor preach; and why may not I as well be your tailor, though I can nouthier shape nor sew, seeing teaching and preaching are nae less requisite to their vocation than shaping and sewing to ane tailor.'

Diligence is ordered to make search through all the towns and cities and universities for doctors of divinity, licentiates of law and theology, 'with the maist cunning clerks in all the land,' who can 'preach prudently,' or 'stir up the people to good works,' in order that they may be advanced to the places of those who can do nothing but 'flatter and feich.* Diligence soon returns with a doctor of divinity and two licentiates, 'men of gravity.'

'Three famous clerks of great intelligence,
For to the common people they can preach,
And in the schools in Latin tongue can teach.'

Correction then orders strict inquiry to be made in the manner in which the various ranks of the community discharge their respective duties, in order that those who are careless and negligent may be expelled from office, and good men and true be installed in their room. Spirituality is first called on to tell how he has attended to the duties of his situation. After noticing the unprecedented nature of the inquiry, he declares that he has 'used his office well,' he makes up his accounts twice a year with unfailing regularity; he takes care that all his tithes shall be paid, together with his offerings and dues of every kind, 'wanting nocht of his tiend and boll of bear' (barley); he bestows rich portions upon his sons, and marries his daughters to lairds; he rides upon an ambling mule, and makes better cheer than any temporal lord in the land; and finally, he pays a yearly pension to certain powerful barons,

'To that intent that they with all their heart
In right and wrong shall plainlie tak my part.'

As for preaching, which some people foolishly imagine to be the principal duty of a bishop, he keeps a friar, who acts as his substitute, and what more would any reasonable man ask? The Abbot is next required to state 'how he has used his abbey.' He tells his examiners plainly that he and his monks live a right easy life, enjoying good cheer and drinking wholesome ale. With respect to his monastic vows, he frankly admits that he kept them only until he received the bulls from Rome confirming him in his office; after that he lived 'as did his predecessors.' The Parson states that, though he cannot preach, he can play at the 'catch,' that he excels in the game of football,

'And for the cards, the tables, and the dice,
Above all parsons I may bear the prize.'

In the end, the king, after consulting with the temporal estate, deprives the ecclesiasties of their offices, which he immediately bestows on the 'three cunning clerks sapient.' The Bishop, Abbot, Parson, and Prioress are then ignominiously stripped of their clerical robes, and dismissed, lamenting their hard fate.

Among the evils which the poet exposes with such unsparring severity, conspicuous notice is taken of the gross abuses of the Consistory Court, which the Pauper affirms to have more need of reformation than the court of Pluto. And it is curious to learn, that the complaints made in our own day respecting the delays and the ruinous expense of lawsuits, are merely a re-echo of the grumbings of our ancestors upwards of three hundred years ago, when a man might expend 'half a fold of cattle in prosecuting a suit for a single cow.' The Pauper's description of the law's delay is exceedingly graphic. He had brought an action for the recovery of damages against a neighbour, to whom he had lent his good grey mare:—

'I lent my gossip my mare to fetch hame coals,
And he her drownit in the quarry holes:
And I ran to the Consistore to pleinzie,*
And there I happt among ane greedy meinzie;†
They gave me first ane thing the call citandum,
Within aucht‡ days I gat but debellandum,
Within ane month I gat ad opponendum,
In half an yeir I got inter loquendum,
And syne, how call ye it? ad replicandum;
But I could ne'er ane word yet understand him;
And then they gart§ me cast on mony plakkis,||
And gart me pay for four-and-twentie actis;
But or they cam half gate¶ to concludendum,
The fiend ane plack was left for to defend him.
Thus they postpō'd me twa yeir with their traine,
Syne hodie ad octo bade me come again.
And then thir rukis they rowpit wonder fast,
For sentence silver they cry'd at the last;
Of pronunciandum they made wonder fain,
But I gat never my gude grey mare again.'

Well might Temporality say on hearing this
'our true tale,'

'My lords we maun reforme thir consistory laws,
Wha's great defame above the heavens blaws.'††

After the expulsion of the worthless drones from the church, John the Commonweill is clothed in gorgeous apparel, and seated among the Estates in the parliament. Correction then declares,—

'All virtuouse people now may be rejoysit,
Since Commonweill has gotten ane gay garment,
And ignorants out of the kirk deposit;
Devout doctors and clerks of renown
Now in the kirk shall have dominion,
And Good Counsel, with lady Veritie,
Are ministers to our king's majestie.
Blest is that realm that has ane prudent king,
Whilk does delight to hear the veritie,
Punishing them that plainly do maling
Contraire the commonweill and equitie.'

The Acts of the Parliament are then proclaimed by Diligence, with the sound of a trumpet. It is declared that the Church of Christ and his religion should be defended; that all the temporal lands should be let in feu, after 'the form of France,' to diligent labourers; that those barons who protected freebooters and thieves should be punished; that justice-courts should be erected in Elgin or Inverness, that justice might be properly dispensed in the northern districts; that a College of Justice should be instituted in Edinburgh, the expense of which should be defrayed out of the revenues of the nunneries; that the Consistory Courts should henceforth take cognizance only of spiritual matters; that benefices should be conferred only on men of learning, 'mighty in the Scriptures,' of unblemished reputation, and qualified either to preach to the common people, or to teach in famous schools; that the prelates should not, under the penalty of treason, purchase from prince or pope an injunction against the ordinance abolishing the corpse present; and that all mortuary gifts, either to the laird or priest, should be abolished; that every bishop should reside in his diocese, and every parson in his parish, 'teaching their folk from vices to refrain;' that no money should be sent to Rome to purchase any benefice, except the great archbishoprics; that the law of celibacy should be abrogated; and finally, that the temporal barons should not marry their children to the illegitimate offspring of the clergy, under the penalty of degradation from their rank, until, by the payment of a fine, they should obtain the restoration of their privileges.

An underplot of a less serious description is carried on throughout this curious composition, by the introduction of Common Theft, as a border freebooter, come to Fife to steal the Earl of Rothes' best hackney, and Lord Lindsay's brown jennet; the marauder is taken, and in violation of Horace's precept, executed on the stage, after uttering a ludicrously pathetic lament on his hard fate, and a farewell to his 'brother reivers of the border dales.' A similar doom is inflicted on Deceit and Falsehood after they have severally addressed the people, and made some curious revelations respecting the knavish tricks practised by the merchants and tradesmen of that day. Flattery and Folly obtain a reprieve, and the piece concludes with an epilogue by Diligence, entreating the audience to take 'this lytill sport' in patience, and promising in the name of the poet and performers,—

'— if we live another year,
Where we have failed we shall do diligence,
With mair pleasure to make you recompence:
Because we have been some part tedious,
With matter rude, denude of eloquence,
Likewise, perchance, to some men odious.'

An interesting account of the effect which the representation of the play at Linlithgow had upon the mind of the king, is given in a letter from Sir William Eure (envoy from Henry VIII.) to the Lord Privy Seal of England, dated 26th January, 1540. It appears that Sir William had been commissioned by his sovereign to sound the Scottish monarch as to his disposition to follow his uncle's example in the reformation of the church. 'I had divers communings,' says Eure, 'with Sir Thomas Bellenden, one of the said councillors for Scotland, a man by estimation appearing to be the age of fifty years or above, and of gentle and sage conversation touching the state of the spirituality in Scotland. And gathering him to be a man inclined to the sort used in our sovereign's realm of England, I did so largely break with him in those behaves as to move to know of him what mind the king and council of Scotland was inclined to concerning the Bishop of Rome, and for the reformation of the misusing of the spiritualitie in Scotland. Whereunto he gently and lovingly answered, showing himself well contented of that communing, and did say that the King of Scotland himself, with all his temporal council, was greatly given to the reformation of bishops, religious persons, and priests within the realm; and so much that by the king's pleasure, he being privy thereunto, they have had an interlude played in the feast of the Epiphany of our Lorde last paste, before the king and queen at Lithgow, and the whole council spiritual and temporal. The whole matter thereof concluded upon the declaration of the naughtiness in religion, the presumption of bishops, the collusion of the spiritual courts, called the Consistory courts, in Scotland, and misusing of priests. I have obtained a note from a Scotsman of our state being present at the playing of said interludes, of the effect thereof, which I send unto your lordship by this bearer. My Lord, the said Mr. Bellenden showed me that after the said interlude finished the King of Scots did call upon the Bishop of Glasgow, being chancellor, and divers other bishops, exhorting them to reform their factions and manner of living, saying, that unless they so did, he would send six of the proudest of them unto his uncle of Englonde; and as those were ordered, so he would order all the rest who would not amend.* Row, who mentions that Sir David Lindsay's Satire was acted at Perth 'before King James V. and a great part of the nobility and gentry fra morn to even,' adds that it 'made the people sensible of the darkness wherein they lay; of the wickedness of their kirkmen, and did let them see how God's Kirk should have been otherwise guided than it was; all whilk did much good for that time.†

It was part of the duties of the Lion King-at-Arms to officiate as the representative of his sovereign in foreign countries; and in 1536, Sir David Lindsay was despatched, along with Sir John Campbell of Lundie, to the court of France, to demand in marriage for James V. a daughter of the house of Vendôme; but the king going over in person espoused Magdalen, daughter of Francis, who died within two months after her arrival in Scotland, amid the universal lamentation of the people. On this occasion Sir David composed a 'Deploration of the Death of Queene Magdalen,' a pathetic tribute to the memory of her whom he calls—

'The flower of France and comfort of Scotland.'

It appears that a pageant of remarkable brilliancy, invented by Lindsay, was produced for exhibition on the coronation of the youthful queen; and he avails himself of the opportunity afforded by his lamentation for her untimely death, to describe the superb ceremonies which were intended to grace the royal procession through the streets of the capital to the old abbey of Holyrood;—the scaffolding painted with gold, and azure fountains spouting wine; troops of actors disguised like divine creatures; rows of lusty fresh gallants in splendid apparel; yeomen and craftsmen with their bent bows in their hands, gallantly arrayed in green, and burgesses clothed in scarlet; the provost and magistrates and senators clad in silk; the great lords of parliament, barons and bannerets; the venerable dignitaries of the church, surrounded by the inferior clergy; the din of trumpets and of clarions; the heralds in their 'awful vestments,' and the macers preserving order with their silver wands; the lovely princess herself walking under a canopy of gold, borne by burgesses in robes of silk, marshalled by the great master of the household, and followed by the king's train; a troop of beautiful virgins, crying 'Vive la Reine;' the 'ornate' harangues of the clergy and councillors; and the banquetings and tournaments with which the splendid spectacle was to have concluded. The whole description gives a most interesting view of the manners and customs of the age, and of the nature of those state pageants of which our ancestors were so fond.

* Appendix to Pinkerton's Hist. vol. ii. p. 494, where the 'note' of the play transmitted along with this letter is given at length, and clearly proves that the interlude acted at Linlithgow, in 1540, must have differed considerably from the play, as published by Lindsay.

Which should have been ane sight celestial;

'Thou should have heard the ornate oratouris,
Making her highness salutation,
Both of the clergy, town, and councillors,
With many a notable narration;
Thou should have seen her coronation,
In the fair Abbey of Holyrood,
In presence of a mirthful multitude.

Sic chapel royal, with sic instruments,
And crafty music, singing from the splene,§

But all this great solemnitie and game,

The poem concludes with a patriotic wish very gracefully expressed.

'Tho' death has slain the heavenly flower of France,
Which wedded was unto the thistle keen,
Wherein all Scotland saw their whole plesance,
And made the lion joyful from the splene;
Tho' root be pulled and shed its leaves so green,
The fragrance ne'er shall die—despite of thee,
'Twill keep these sister realms in peace and amitie.'

On the subsequent marriage of James with Mary of Guise, Sir David's ingenuity was put into requisition to provide masques, shows, and pageants, to welcome the princess on her arrival in Scotland. The king was then resident at St. Andrews, and as soon as he heard that she had landed at Balcomie, in Fife, 'he rode forth,' says Pitscottie, 'with his hail lords, both spiritual and temporal, and met the queen, and received her with great joy and merriness of farces and plays made for her. And first she was received at the New Abbey yett (gate). At the east side thereof there was made to be ane triumphant arch by Sir David Lindsay of the Mount, Lyon King-of-Arms, who caused a great cloud to come out of the heavens above the gate, out of the whilk cloud came down ane fair lady, most like an angel, having the keys of Scotland in her hand, and delivered them to the queen, in sign and token that all the hearts of Scotland were open to receive her grace, with certain orations made by the said Sir David to the queen, desiring her to fear God and to serve him, and to reverence and obey her husband. This being done the queen was received into her lodging, whilk was called the New Inns, and there she lodged for that night, till on the morn at ten hours she passed to the Abbey Kirk, where she saw many lusty lords and barons, well arrayed in their habiliments against her coming, also the bishops, abbots, priors, monks, and canons regular made great solemnity in the abbey, with mass songs, and playing on the organs. Thereafter the king received the queen in the palace to her dinner, when there was great mirth of shawms, trumpets, and divers other instruments all that day. The king and queen remained forty days at St. Andrews with great merriness, such as justing, running at the lists, archery, hunting, hawking, with singing and dancing in masquery, and playing, and all other princely games, according to a king and queen.* It was during these festivities that the Lion King composed his satirical poem, entitled 'The Justing between James Watson and John Barbour,' the one a 'Mediciner,' the other a 'Leech' of the royal household, in which his object was to ridicule the justs and tournaments of chivalry. It is a heavy, dull, and laboured production, and has been justly pronounced the least happy of all his compositions. It was probably about this period that he also wrote the 'Supplication directit to the King's Grace in contemptioun of Side Tails'—the long trains then worn by the ladies. Camden informs us that this obnoxious article of female attire owes its origin to Anne, the queen of Richard II., and we learn from Hemingford that a zealous ecclesiastic of that age was so provoked by this fashion that he wrote a treatise 'Contra Caudas Dominarum.' Chaucer makes his parson cry out against the 'costlie claithing'† both of men and women, especially reprobating the superfluity in the length of the ladies' gowns.‡ The Scottish parliament repeatedly directed its thunders against this extravagance of female ornament, but apparently without effect; and now Lindsay's zeal, as a reformer of manners, induced him to try the effect of the more potent weapon of ridicule. 'Your majesty,' says he, 'has now reduced both the Highlands and the Borders to quietness and order, but there is yet ane smallault which requires reformation.'

'Sir, tho' your Grace has put great order,
Baith in the Highland and the Border,
Yet make I supplicatioun,
To have some reformation,
Of ane small fault which is not treason
Tho' it be contrair unto reason;
Because the matter is so vile,
It may not have an ornate stile;
Therefore, I pray your Excellence,
To hear me with great patience.
Sovereign, I mean of their syde-tails,

Howbeit they use such dignity,
Conforming to their majesty.

In their claithing maist triumphant Above all other Christian land;
Yet when they travel through the towns,
Men see their feet beneath their gowns,
Four inch abone§ their proper heels,
Circular about, as round as wheels.'

All classes were infected, he says, by this evil custom. Poor draggel-tail sluts that have scarcely two marks for their fees, will wear two ells of cloth beneath their knees. Kitty that was hatched last night will mimic the state of the queen; and Muirland Meg, that milks the ewes, will neither abide in barn nor byre without a long train to her kirtle. Above all, the censor is indignant to see 'men of religion,' the dignitaries of the church, followed by train-bearers bearing their tails through the street, and contrasts the luxury of these self-styled successors of the apostles with the poverty and self-denial of 'Peter, Paul, and Saint Andrew.'

The Lion King is as much scandalized at the veiled faces of the ladies as at their long trains. The Scottish females of that period had, it seems, adopted the evil custom of covering up their faces, so that nothing is seen but their eyes.

'Another fault, Sir, may be seen,
They hide their face all but their een;
When gentlemen bids them gude day,
Without reverence they slide away:
Unless their naked face I see,
They get no more gude days fra me.'

This fashion had excited the displeasure of the parliament, as well as the wrath of the Lion King, for a sumptuary statute, enacted during the reign of James II., ordains 'that na woman come to the kirk, or market, with her face mussaled, that she may not be kend, under the pain of the escheat of the church.' Lindsay purposes to deal with the nuisance in a summary manner—

'Wald your Grace my counsell tak,
Ane proclamation ye should mak,
Baith through the land and burrowstouns,‡
To shaw their face and cut their gowns.'

On the 14th of December, 1542, the untimely death of James V. closed the connection between him and his Lion King, which had continued for the long period of thirty-one years, during which the love and respect of the accomplished but unfortunate monarch towards his faithful and devoted 'servitor,' had never varied. Lindsay was one of the little company who attended the dying prince at Falkland, and closed his eyes; and as Lion King he must have directed the mournful ceremony of the funeral rites, when James was laid by the side of his first wife, Queen Magdalen, in the chapel of Holyrood-house.* In the parliament which met at Edinburgh, on the 13th of March following, Sir David represented the burgh of Cupar, situated within a mile of his seat; and in the struggle for the regency, which took place between the Earl of Arran and Cardinal Beaton, he supported the pretensions of the former, and he is mentioned by Knox as having 'travelled with other men of counsel, such as Kirkaldy of Grange, Henry Balmaves, and Thomas Ballenden, to promote the governor, and to give him faithful counsel.' The keen invectives of Lindsay against the abuses of the church had already excited the enmity of the ecclesiastical party, his writings were read by all classes of the Scottish people, and the popish party regarded him as an adversary not less dangerous than Buchanan and Knox.† Hence when the feeble and vacillating regent was gained over by the cardinal, Lindsay and other 'honest and godly men' were compelled to retire from the court. His services, however, were again called into requisition in March, 1543-4, when he was sent as ambassador by the regent to the Emperor Charles V., for the purpose of re-delivering the order of the Golden Fleece, which had been conferred by that monarch on the Scottish King, James V. On his return to Scotland he sat as representative for Cupar in the parliaments which met at Edinburgh in November, 1544; at Linlithgow, in October, 1545; and at Edinburgh, in August, 1546.

On the 29th of May, 1546, Beaton, the able, but unscrupulous primate, was murdered at St. Andrews by a band of conspirators, who appear to have been influenced partly by private animosity, partly by public zeal, and the instigation of Henry VIII., who scrupled at no means, however base, to accomplish his purposes. Lindsay, and many of the reformers, appear to have thought that

'Though the deed was foully done,
The loon‡ was weill away;'

and in his 'Tragedy of the Cardinal,' he gives expression to the feelings which he and his friends entertained towards the most formidable enemy of the Reformation. As he was sitting in his oratory after the hour of prime,§ perusing Boccaccio's work, 'On the Downfall of Illustrious Men,' a spectre appears suddenly before him, with a pale visage, and the blood flowing over his gorgeous ecclesiastical robes of velvet and of crimson satin. His visitor, who announces himself as

'— my friend, go read, and read again,
Gif thou find by true narration,
Of ony pain like to my passion:
Right sure I am were John Boccace alive,
My tragedie at length he wald describe.'

The ghostly visitant then entreats the poet to commit his story to writing as he shall relate it; and having received his assent to this proposal, he proceeds to describe the principal events of his own life, and to make full confession of his ambition, extravagance, and oppression. From his own sad fate he takes occasion to admonish his brethren, the prelates, to repent and amend their wicked lives, and to warn all earthly princes against bestowing ecclesiastical benefices upon ignorant and unworthy pastors,

'That in the kirk can neither sing nor say.'

He tells them that, if when they want a baker, or brewer, or master cook, 'ane trim tailor, or cunning cordinar' (cordwainer), they search over all the land for the fittest persons to fill these offices,

'Ane browster, † whilk can brew maist wholesome ale, much more should they act on a similar principle in filling up vacant benefices—

'Gar search and seik baith into burgh and land,

Ane parson whilk his parochoun can teach,
Gar vicars make due ministracion;
And als, I mak yon supplication,
Mak your abbots of right religious men,
Whilk Christ's law can to their convent ken.'¶

The advice thus put into the mouth of the once proud and powerful cardinal is unimpeachably sound; but the 'Tragedy' must be pronounced exceedingly dull and prosaic throughout. It must be admitted that the subject was unhappily chosen, and it is not relieved by any felicity in the execution, or elegance in the diction.

The last embassy of Sir David Lindsay was to the court of Denmark, in 1548, in order to negotiate for a free trade with Scotland, and to solicit ships to protect the Scottish coast against the English. After his return from this embassy, about the year 1550, he wrote the History of Squire Meldrum, which has justly been pronounced the liveliest of his works, and is peculiarly interesting and valuable on account of the light which it casts upon the private life and manners of the times. The 'History' was founded on the adventures of a contemporary and friend of the poet, 'William Meldrum, unquihyle (lately) Laird of Cleish and Binns,' a gallant feudal squire, whose exploits had gained him great renown, both in Scotland and France. It appears to have been composed as a token of the admiration and regard which Lindsay entertained for the hero, and for the amusement of the family of Lord Lindsay of the Byres, under whose roof 'tho noble and valiant squiro' was long domiciled. 'In this tale,' says Mr. Campbell, 'we lose sight of the reformer. It is a little romance, very amusing as a draught of Scottish chivalrous manners, apparently drawn from the life, and blending a sportive and familiar with an heroic and amatory interest. Nor is its broad careless fiction, perhaps, an unfavourable relief to the romantic spirit of the adventures which it portrays.'

The poet draws a very pleasing picture of his youthful hero. He was of noble birth, he tells us, and of unsullied honour, 'stalwart and stout in every strife.'

'He was but twenty years of age
When he began his vassalage;
Proportionate weil, of mid stature,
Feirie and wicht, † and nicht endure;
O'erset with travel both nicht and day,
Right hardie baith in earnest and play;
Blythe in countenance, richt fair of face,
And stude weil ay in his ladie's grace:
Because he was sa courageous,
Ladies of him were amorous.
He was a lover for a dame,
Meek in chalmer like a lamb;
But in the field ane champion,
Rampan'd like ane wild lyon;
Weill practikit with spear and sheild,
And with the foremost in the field;
No chieftain was amangst them all,
In exposures mair liberal.
In everilk play he wan the prize:
With that he was virtuous and wise;
And sa because he was weil proved,
With every man he was weil loved.'

His first exploit was at the sack of Carriekfergus by the Earl of Arran, in 1513, † where he distinguished himself by his praiseworthy exertions to save women, priests, and friars, from the fury of the brutal soldiery. One young lady, of great beauty and high rank, had fallen into the hands of two men of war, right cruel and keen, who had tripped her of her rich garments, and wore treating her with great cruelty. On Meldrum's interposing for her protection, and remonstrating with the ruffians on account of their brutality and meanness, they instantly turned upon him with great fury; but the struggle ended in his slaying them both, and saving the lady from the dreadful fate with which she had been threatened. Overcome with gratitude for her unexpected deliverance, and admiration of the valour and manly beauty of her protector, she informs him that she is the heiress of a noble and wealthy baron, and in very unequivocal terms offers the squire her heart and her hand. But honour forbade him to desert the banner of his lord; and he tells her that he must pass on to take his fortune in France. The lady then offers to dress herself as a page, and follow him but for love. 'Nay,' said the squire, 'thou art too young to sail the sea, especially with men of war; but when this expedition is brought to an end, and peace is made, I will be right glad to marry you.' The trumpet now sounded, summoning the soldiers on board, and Meldrum hastens to embark, after having received a love-token from the lady—a rich ruby set in a ring.

The Scottish fleet then sets sail, and on reaching the shores of Brittany the troops are disembarked, and Meldrum is entrusted with the command of five hundred men. The English army, under their sovereign Henry VIII., were at that time lying at Calais, while the French king, with his soldiers, lay encamped at no great distance in Picardy, and daily skirmishing took place between the hosts. Squire Meldrum, on learning the position of the hostile armies, immediately selected a hundred spears, the best men in his company, and repaired to the French camp, where he was courteously welcomed by the king. It happened that at this juncture an English warrior, named Talbart or Talbot, 'a stout man and a strang, who used to wear in his bonnet 'silver tokens of war,' had challenged any of the French knights to break a spear with him for his lady's sake. But his defiance having remained unanswered, he next addressed the Scottish band who had newly arrived. Meldrum, without a moment's hesitation, took up the gage, and offered to fight the redoubted champion either on horseback or on foot. Talbot, with great kindness, endeavoured to dissuade the youthful adventurer from a contest in which he represents him as certain to lose his life.

'— my gude child,
It were maist like 'hat thou wer wild:
Thou are too young, and has no might,
To fight with me that is so wight:
To speak to me thou should have fear,
For I have sic practik in veir^e
That I would not esseiritt^e be
To mak debate against sic three;
For I have stood in mony a stour,^e
And ay defendit my honour:
Therefore, my bairn, I counsel thee
Sic interprises to let be.'

Meldrum, however, perseveres in his resolution to meet him in single combat, and expresses his confidence, that as David overcame Goliath, God will give him the victory.

'I trust that God shall be my guide,
And give me grace to stanche thy pride;
Tho' thou wert great as Gow Mak Morne,
Trust weil I shall you meet the morn.'

Talbot now returns to his comrades in the camp, and informs them of the engagement which a young Scot had made to fight him on the morrow beside Montreuil. He speaks slightly of his antagonist's prowess, and has no doubt, he says, that he will send him back beaten and stripped of his armour.

'Quoth they, "The morn that shall we ken,
The Scots are haldin' harly men."'

When it was reported to Monsieur D'Aubigny † that Squire Meldrum had undertaken to fight with the renowned English champion, he greatly commended his courage, and immediately sent for him to his tent, in order that he might receive from his own lips an account of the affair. The squire, on being interrogated, modestly acknowledged that he had, for the honour of Scotland, taken on hand to fight with Talbot, adding that, if he were only well horsed, he had little doubt of the victory. Upon this, D'Aubigny immediately sent out, and collecting a hundred horse, bade the squire select the best. He did so accordingly, and lightly leaping on his back, pushed him to his speed, and then checking him in his course, expressed himself delighted with his new acquisition, for no horse ever ran more pleasantly. Next morning he was early on foot, and ready for the encounter. The appearance of the youthful warrior, clad in complete panoply all except the head, his spear, shield, and helm borne before him by his squires, is depicted in the most picturesque manner.

'He took his leave, and went to rest,
Then early in the morn him drest
Wantonly in his warlike weed,
All well enarmit save the head.
He lap upon his courser wicht,
And stretched him in his stirrups richt.
His spear, and shield, and helm, was borne
By squyers that rode him before;
A velvet cap on head he bare,
A coif of gold to hald's his hair:
The squire bore into his shield
An otter in a silver field;
His horse was barded full richlie,
Covered with satin cramosie.
Then forward rode this champion,
With sound of trumpet and clarioun,
And speedilie spurrit o'er the bent,
Like Mars, the god armipotent.'

Talbot, in the meantime, is greatly disturbed by a dream, in which he sees a great black otter rise from the sea, and fiercely assail him, pulling him down from his horse. He relates this vision to his comrade, who ridicules his fears, and exhorts him to 'behave himself valiantly;' and, dismissing his apprehensions, he arms himself at all points, and, lightly leaping upon his horse, 'barded full bravely and covered with broidered work and velvet green,' with St. George's cross on all his equipments, he proceeds to the lists.

'Then clarions and trumpets blew,
And warriors mony hither drew;
On every side come mony a man,
To behald wha the battel wan. ||
The field was in a meadow green,
Where every man might well be seen.
The heralds put them sa in order,
That no man past within the bordour,
Nor pressit to come within the green,
But heralds and the champions keen.

And ran to other with sic force,

After a fierce and protracted contest, Talbot was vanquished, and man and horse were thrown to the ground with such violence, that his companions believed him dead. The squire leaped hastily from his charger, and raising his wounded adversary in his arms, courteously supported and comforted him; but when Talbot looked up and saw his shield with the device of an otter upon a silver field, 'Now,' said he, 'my dream has proved true: yon is the otter that hath caused me to bleed; but here I vow, that I shall never just again: according to our agreement, I surrender to thee my horse and harness.'

'Then said the squire courteously,
Brother, I thank you heartily;
Of you, forsuith, nothing I crave,
For I have gotten that I wald have.'

His valour and generous courtesy drew forth the warm encomiums of the English host, and the captain, taking Meldrum by the hand, led him into the pavilion, where he was served with a collation. Meanwhile Talbot's wounds were dressed, and the courteous squire, before taking his leave, embraced him, and bade him be of good cheer, for this was but the chance of arms. He then mounted his horse, and was convoyed back to his own camp by a large body of the English knights.

On the termination of the war, Meldrum resolved to leave France, and though asked in marriage by a lady of great possessions, youth made him so haughty, that he would not accept of her hand; and having fitted out 'a gay vessel' for himself and his soldiers, well furnished with artillery, hackbut, bow, and spear, besides abundance of provisions and the best wine he could select, he set sail from Dieppe to Scotland. On the voyage, he was attacked by an English man-of-war, of greatly superior size and strength, but disdainful to flee, he boldly grappled with the enemy, and boarding the hostile 'galzeoun' at the head of his men, after a desperate hand-to-hand conflict, captured the vessel.

On his arrival in Scotland, where the fame of his gallant exploits had preceded him, he was welcomed with great delight, and sumptuously feasted by all his friends. Shortly after, he met with an adventure in Strathern, which terminated in his gaining the heart of a beautiful and wealthy young widow, Lady Gleneagles, the daughter of Lawson of Humbie, provost of Edinburgh. It turns out however, that as he was near of kin to her late husband, a dispensation must be procured from Rome before the marriage can be legally performed and while waiting for its arrival, as they have plighted their troth to each other, the squire continues to reside in the castle of his betrothed lady

The account which the poet gives of the amusements in which he spent his time shows what were the peaceful and domestic occupations of the feudal barons at this period.

'And sa he lived pleasantlie,
Ane certain time with his ladie;
Sometime with hawking and hunting,
Sometime with wanton horse running;
And sometime like ane man of weir,*
I'll galzeardlie wald rin ane speir.

Their happiness, however, was interrupted by an occurrence which strikingly marks the unsettled and lawless character of the age. A messenger arrived at their residence to inform Lady Gleneagles that a Highland baron, named Macfarlane, had seized one of her castles in the Lennox, and had plundered and laid waste the surrounding country, leaving her 'nouthor cow nor horse.' The squire, in great wrath at this outrage, swore that if he found Macfarlane in that hold, it should be a dear purchase to him; and having assembled his men, and armed himself, with his lady's right-hand glove in his helmet, he rode day and night till he reached the castle. After an obstinate defence, he carried the fortress by escalade, exhibiting great clemency towards the garrison, whom he pardoned and set at liberty. A sad reverse, however, was at hand, for, as the poet remarks,

'Of warldlie joy, it is weil kend,†
That sorrow bene the fatal end,
For jealousy and false envy
Did him pursue richt cruellie.
I marvel not tho' it be so,
For they were ever lovers' foe.'

Stirling of Keir, 'a cruel knight,' who resided near this lady's castle, in Strathern, had long entertained a bitter grudge at the squire, in consequence of his having defeated a plan which he had formed, to espouse the lady to Luke Stirling, a relation of his own; and had laid a cowardly plot for his destruction. Accordingly one day, in August, 1517, when Meldrum and his lady were on their journey from Edinburgh to Fife, with only eight servants in their company, they were waylaid by Keir at the head of sixty men. In spite of the fearful odds, the indomitable squire disdained to fly, and after performing prodigies of valour, he was left for dead on the field, pierced by innumerable wounds. Intelligence of this cowardly and brutal outrage was immediately carried to Sir Anthony de la Bastie, who, as deputy of the Duke of Albany, administered the affairs of the kingdom at this time; and so vigorously did he pursue the assassins, that in the course of a few hours he succeeded in apprehending Stirling, and lodging him in prison.† On the 17th of September, however, De la Bastie was himself foully murdered by Home of Wedderburn. Keir was soon after set at liberty, and was ultimately successful in compelling Lady Gleneagles to marry his kinsman in spite of the strongest resistance on her side. Meanwhile Meldrum's case excited the utmost sympathy, and the wisest physicians in the country, repaired unsought to his residence, for the purpose of endeavouring to save his life. In the end he recovered from his wounds; and so much did he profit by their instructions, and the experiments which they had made on his body, that he himself became a skilful 'medieinar' and 'chirurgian,' and wrought many cures, especially among the poor, to whom he prescribed gratuitously. The remainder of his eventful life the squire passed under the roof of 'ano aged lord,' Patrick, the fifth Lord Lindsay of the Byres, who courted his society, and prevailed upon him to become his chief marshal and auditor of his accounts. He was also made sheriff-depute of Fife, and proved himself both an impartial judgo and a protector of the poor. For the love he bore to his betrothed mistress he remained single through life; and as a token of his fidelity to his vow, the poet tells us—

'That each year for his lady's sake,
A banquet royal he wald make,
With wild fowl, venison, and wine,
With tart and flam,* and frutage fine;
Of bran and geill† there was na scant,
And Ippocras he wald not want.
I have seen sitting at his tabill
Lords and lairds honorabill,
With knights and mony a gay squyar,
Which were too long for to declair:
With mirth, music and minstrelsy.
All this he did for his lady:
And for her sake during his life,
Wald never be weddit to ane wife.
And when he did decline to age,
He failit never of his courage.
Of ancient stories for to tell,
Above all other he did precell;‡
So that everilk creature
To hear him speak, took great pleasure.'

At length, after spending a number of years in these benevolent and delightful pursuits, Squire Meldrum was seized with a mortal illness, and expired at the Struther, in Fife, the seat of his noble friend and patron Lord Lindsay; and the 'Testament' of the dying warrior, written during his sickness, concludes this remarkable 'historie,' which there is every reason to regard both as in all essential particulars an accurate narrative of the squire's adventures, and a truthful picture of the manners and principles of the age. This interesting document, it has been justly said, 'breathes from beginning to end the soul of chivalry.' It begins with an acknowledgment on the part of the writer, of the brevity of human existence, and his consciousness of his own approaching end. He then proceeds to nominate three noble lords, all of the name of Lindsay, to be his executors,—David Earl of Crawford 'wise and wicht,' John Lord Lindsay his 'master special,' and Sir Walter Lindsay, Lord of St. John, 'a noble travelled knight.' 'The surname of Lindsay,' he says, 'never failed to the crown, and will never fail to me. After resigning his immortal spirit to God, he requests his executors to dispose of his wealth to his next of kin as they may think fit. 'It is well known,' he adds, 'that I was never addicted to hoarding, or heaping up riches or rent. I cared no more for gold than for glass.' He then entreats all his friends and kinsmen without fail to attend his funeral feast, knowing as they do how strenuously he has defended to his latest breath that fame which is dear to them all. As to the disposal of his body, he directs first that it should be disembowelled and well washed with wine, and then anointed with delicious balm, cinnamon, and precious spices, and enclosed in a costly carved shrine of cedar or cypress—

'In cases twa, of gold and precious stanes,

Wherein my kist, and banes ye shall inclose,
Within that sacred temple to repose.'

Squire Meldrum and his biographer were not free from the belief in astrology so widely prevalent in these times; and the dying warrior, after giving directions respecting his interment, proceeds to bequeath his body to Mars, his tongue rhetorical to Mercury, and his heart to Venus, 'because,' he says, 'the constellations of Mars, Venus, and Mercurius, all three presided over my nativity, and gave me my natural inclinations;—expressions which, intermingled as they are with the really pious sentiments uttered by the testator, present a strange and profane mixture of Christian doctrine and pagan mythology; though it is evident that they were regarded by the poet and his contemporaries as entirely unobjectionable.

Next follow minute and exceedingly curious directions respecting the funeral procession, which is to be superintended by the Lion King-at-Arms—

My friend, Sir David Lindsay of the Mount,
Shall put in order my procession.
I will that there pass foremost in the front,
To bear my pennon,† a stout champion,
With him a band of Mars religion—
That is to say, instead of monks and friars,
In gods order are thousand hagbutlers.

'Next them a thousand footmen in a rout,
With spear and shield, with buckler, bow, and brand,
In one livery, young stalwart men and stout;
Thirdly in order there shall come a band
Of noble men, still to wark their harmes;‡
Their captain, with my standard in his hand,
On hardy steeds, a hundred men-at-arms.'

He next directs that his banner, with the three sable otters in a silver field, is to occupy a conspicuous place in the procession, accompanied by tabret, trumpet, clarion, and horn, and followed by his helmet, sword, gloves of plate, and shield, and a strong champion, clothed in complete panoply, and mounted on a Spanish jennet, carrying his coat-armour on a spear. Then come his bier, with the 'corpse-present,' his barbed horse, and his spear, borne by some honourable man of his own kindred. 'Let there be no monks or friars,' he adds, 'or anything in a black livery about my bier;—

'Duil weeds* I think hypocrisie and scorne,
With hoods heklit‡ down athwart their ene;‡
By men-at-arms my body shall be borne;
Into that band see that no black be seen,
But let the liveries be red, blue, and green.'

Around his bier there shall ride a multitude of earls, lords, and knights, clothed in his livery, and bearing each a laurel branch in their hands, as an ensign of victory, because the warrior whom they are carrying to the grave never fled from any field, or yielded himself a prisoner to an enemy. The minstrels who accompany the procession are to sing and play only mirthful airs, whose pleasant notes shall resound throughout the sky; and a solemn soul-mass is to be performed—

'With organ, timpane, trumpet, and clarion,
To show their music duly them address;
I will that day be heard na heaviness;
I will na service of the requiem,
But alleluia with melodie and game.'

Having arrived at the cathedral, after the gospel and the offertory, the squire directs an orator to ascend the pulpit, where 'solemnlie, with ornate eloquence and at great leasure,' he is to read the book of 'the legend of his life from end to end. 'Then,' says he, 'enclose my body in its sepulture, there to repose till the great judgement; but

'Let not be rung for me that day soul knells,
But great cannons gar them crack for bells.'

His shield, spear, coat-armour, basnet, and banner, are then to be hung up above his sepulchre and his epitaph inscribed in golden letters, telling the name of the invincible warrior who lies below.

After these minute directions respecting his funeral rites, he bids an affectionate adieu to the noble lords and ladies of his acquaintance, Lord Lindsay, his heir Maister Patriek,§ young Norman his brother, and their sisters; to the fair ladies of France and of London, and the flaming lamps of loveliness which illuminate the north, and will for his loss, be shrouded in the darkness of grief; but above them all, he bids ten thousand times adieu to the 'Brethren in arms, adieu! in general,

For me I wist your hearts will be full sore.
All true companions into special,
I say to you, adieu! for evermore,
Till that we meet again with God in gloir.'

He then requests the priest to give him the chrism with the holy sacrament, and concludes the remarkable 'Testament,' by devoutly and humbly resigning his soul into the hands of his Saviour:

After his return from his embassy to the court of Denmark, in 1488, Lindsay appears to have taken no further part in public affairs, and to have spent the latter years of his life in virtuous retirement. In 1553, he completed his last, and in various respects, greatest work, 'The Monarchie,' which, from its extent and elaborate character, must have occupied his attention for several years. It embraces the history of the most famous monarchies that have existed in the world, commencing with the creation and extending onward to the general judgment. It would be unfair, however, to regard the work as a mere compendium of universal history. 'The poet's principal object,' says Dr. Irving, 'is not to narrate events, but by means of the great occurrences recorded in sacred or profane history to illustrate general positions. The work is replete with various learning, and may be regarded as comprising the accumulated maxims of a long life of alternate action and contemplation. It presents us with contributions to the history of manners, with specimens of the learning which was then cultivated, and with prospects of the deplorable state of a tottering church.'

Disturbed by his musings on the wretchedness and instability of human affairs, the poet rises early from his couch, and walks forth on a May morning into a delightful park,

' Where he might hear the free birds sweetly sing,
 And smell the wholesome herbs medicinal.'

He is greatly comforted and refreshed by the beautiful scene which he beheld. The drops of balmy dew hung like orient pearls upon the branches, and the tender fragrant flowers emitted their aromatic odours. The lord of day swiftly springing up into the east, ascended his imperial throne, in his glorious robes brighter than gold or precious stones; whilst Cynthia, the horned queen of night, waxed paler, and cast a misty veil over her visage. The birds, rejoicing at the rising of their monarch, sang their morning welcome to the day, and made the sky resound with their melodious notes.

' The pleasant pawme,* pruning his feathers fair,
 The mirthful mavis made great melody,
 The blithesome lark ascending in the air,
 Numerand her natural notes craftily ;
 The gay gold spink, the merle † right merrily,
 The warbling of the noble nightingales,
 Redoundit through the mountain meads and vales.'

For a brief space the charming scene inspires cheerfulness in the pensive bosom of the aged bard, but he soon returns to his mournful theme—the miseries and calamities of human life. Such sorrowful thoughts, he says, should be expressed in melancholy strains. 'Wherefore I will make no vain invocations to Minerva or Melpomene, or any other fabled muses, for I never slept on Parnassus, as did the ornate Ennius and other poets of ancient times; nor did I ever, with Hesiod of Greece, the perfect poet sovereign, drink of the mellifluous famous fresh fountain Helicon, the source of eloquence.' 'Were I,' he continues, 'to invoke any muse, it would be reverend Khamnasia, the goddess of despute; but I scorn all such vain superstitions, and only implore the great God, who created heaven and earth, who gave wisdom to Solomon, grace to David, and strength to the mighty Samson, to inspire me with his Heavenly Spirit, so that I may write nothing opposed to his holy will. Let me repair, then, not to Mount Parnassus, but to Mount Calvary, that I may be refreshed, not by the fabled Heliconian rill, but by the blessed fountain which flowed from the pierced side of my Redeemer.' After offering up an earnest prayer to his Saviour for assistance and direction, he proceeds to describe an interview which he had in the park with an aged man, whom he found sitting under a holly, his beard descending down his breast, his white locks scattered over his shoulders, and whose grave deportment and placid courtesy inspired him with mingled reverence and affection.

' Into that park I saw appear
 An aged man, that drew me near,
 Whose beard was full three quarter lang.
 His hair down o'er his shoulders hang.
 The whilk as ony snaw was white,
 Whom to behold I thought delight.
 His habyte, angelyke of hue,
 Of colour like the asphire blue.
 Under a holly he reposit,
 Of whose presence I was rejoysit.
 I did salute him reverentlie,
 Sa did he me right courteouslie ;
 To sit down he requested me,
 Under the shadow of that tree,
 To save me from the sun's heat,
 Among the flowers, soft and sweet,
 For I was weary for walking ;
 Then we began to fall in talking.
 I speirit his name with reverence,
 I am, said he, EXPERIENCE !'

The poet immediately avails himself of this opportunity to ask counsel of a sage so venerable and renowned. In answer to an inquiry which Experience makes respecting his calling, he thus describes his past career, and the feelings with which he now regarded the turmoil of life and the struggles of human ambition—

' I have, quoth I, bene to this hour,
 Since I could ride, ane courtoeur ;
 But now, father, I think it best,
 With your counsel to live in rest :
 And from henceforth to take mine ease,
 And quietly my God to please :
 And renunce curiositie ;
 Leaving the court, and learn to die.
 Oft have I sailed o'er the strande,
 And travellit through divers lands,
 Baith south and north, east and west.
 Yet can I never find where rest

 Without your supportation ;

Experience tells him that it is foolish and vain to expect perfect happiness here below, for mutability and suffering, 'trouble, travail, and debait,' are found in every condition of life. 'The cause of all this wretchedness and sorrow,' he adds, 'is sin, from which hunger and famine, plague, pestilence, and cruel war, all proceed; and this sin and misery entered our world in consequence of the disobedience of Adam our progenitor. The venerable sage then goes on to describe the redemption procured by our Lord Jesus Christ, and to explain the nature of faith and charity, without which no man can be saved.'

At this stage of the narrative the poet interrupts the dialogue between Experience and the Courtier, and speaking in his own person, introduces an 'Exclamation to the reader, touching the writing of his poem in the vulgar and maternal language.' He vindicates the course he had adopted by the unanswerable argument that he wrote for Jock and Tom, colliers, and carters, and cooks, and therefore made use of their own language, which they could alone understand. Moses, he says, wrote the law on tables of stone, in the common Hebrew tongue, that all the children of Israel might understand its meaning. Aristotle and Plato did not communicate their philosophy in Dutch, or Danish, or Italian,

* But in their most ornate tongue maternal,
Whose fame and name does ring perpetual.'

Virgil and Cicero wrote not in Chaldee or Sarcenic, but in the Roman tongue, which was their proper language. St. Jerome, it is true, translated the Bible into Latin; but if the holy man had been born in Argyleshire he would have translated it into Gaelic. St. Paul too declares, that there is more edification in speaking five words which the hearers can understand, than in uttering ten thousand in an unknown tongue. 'Sic patterer he considers not worth two peas.' Therefore he thinks it a complete mockery; he says,

'To hear the nuns and sisters night and day,
Singing and saying psalms and orisonn;
Not understanding what they sing or say:
Not like a starling or a poppingay;
Whilk learnit are to speak by lang usage;
Them I compare to birds in ane cage.'

Not that he despises or undervalues an acquaintance with the learned languages; on the contrary, he thinks it a great pleasure for young students to labour diligently to acquire a knowledge of 'Latin, Greek, and auld Hebrew,' and sorely repents that he does not belong to this number. But with regard to all books needful for our faith, he would have them written in the vulgar tongue. He therefore regards with contempt women and children mumbling their matins, paternosters, aves, and creeds in Latin, and speaks with great severity of the conduct of the priests, who conduct their sacred services in a language which the common people cannot understand—

'Unlearned people on the holy day,
Solemnitly they hear the evangel sung;
Not knowing what the priest does sing or say;
But as ane bell when that they hear it rung;
Yet wald the priests into their mother tongue,
Pass to the pulpit, and that doctrine declare,
Till lawid* people it were mair necessare.'

He earnestly wishes, he says, that the prelates and doctors of the law would allow the laity to read in their own tongue, the life and death of our Saviour, and that some wise prince would cause the laws of the country to be translated into the vulgar language. If this were done he feels assured that there would be fewer disputes, and less need to pay fees to lawyers.

'To do our neighbour wrang we wald bewar,
If we did fear the law's punishment;
There would be nocht sic brawling at the bar,
Nor man of law loup to sic royal rent;+
To keip the law if all men were content,
And ilk man do as he wald be done to,
The judges wald get little thing to do.'

In fine he concludes, - let doctors discuss their curious questions and sophistical arguments, their logic, and their dark and dubious notions respecting astronomy, medicine, and philosophy, in Greek or in Latin, as they please. But let us have all the books necessary for the commonweill, and for the salvation of our souls, correctly translated into the vulgar tongue.

Returning from this digression, the poet resumes his narrative, or rather dialogue, in which Experience is made to describe in succession the Creation of Adam and Eve, the Fall of man, the Deluge, the building of Babel, the progress of the Assyrian, Persian, Grecian, and Roman empires, the destruction of Jerusalem, the Spiritual and Papal Monarchy, Antichrist, Death, the General Judgment, and 'certain pleasures of the Glorified Bodies.' This historical summary displays great shrewdness and learning, and not unfrequently considerable eloquence and poetic fervour; and is relieved by several little episodes, in which the poet, speaking in his own person, treats of such subjects as the sin of idolatry, the miserable end of certain tyrant princes, the gross abuses of the papal system, and the nature of the happiness of the saints in heaven.

In the second book of the 'Monarchie,' the poet introduces a discussion respecting 'images usit among Christian men,' and draws a vigorous parallel between the idolatries of the heathen and the image-worship of the Romish church. His catalogue of the various saints adored by the Scottish people at this period, is exceedingly graphic.

Experience tells him in reply, that he ought to distinguish between the use and the abuse of an object; that images, if properly employed, may be useful helps to devotion, and may be instrumental in instructing and strengthening the faith of the unlearned—expressions which show that Lindsay had not at this time adopted the sentiments of Knox, and the more thorough-going reformers, respecting the use of images,

'But we by counsel of clergy,
Have licence to make imagerie;

For when lawit people on them looks,

But, continues the sage, when men kneel and pray to images, then they become sinful and unscriptural; and there is no difference between such conduct and the idolatry of the Gentiles. The ancient Greeks paid their devotion to Mars, Jupiter, Venus, and Juno, and precisely in the same manner do the common people now undertake superstitious pilgrimages, and offer their orisons to the images of the saints.

He does not, he says, blame the common people so much for these idolatrous practices, for they act thus in ignorance and with a good intention; but he pronounces a malediction upon the priests and prelates, who are entrusted with the oversight of their souls, and yet neglect to teach them the truth.

The poet then introduces an 'Exclamation against Idolatry,' in which he enumerates the various instances recorded in Scripture of the manifestation of the Divine displeasure against the worshippers of idols; and pours out the most vehement and sarcastic invectives against those who bow down to images of gold and silver, wood and stone, which have 'eyes but see not, ears but hear

Whilk has been usit mony a year bygone,
With priests and friers into procession,
Sic like as Bell was borne through Babylon.'

The 'auld stock image,' thus ridiculed by Lindsay, was the image of St. Giles, the patron saint of Edinburgh. It was annually, on the 1st of September, carried through the city with great pomp by the priests and friars. The last procession was in the year 1558, when a riot took place, and the image was destroyed by the populace. To use the words of Knox, 'one took the idol by the heels, and dadding his head to the street, left Dagon without head or hands. The grey friars gaped, the black friars blew, the priests panted and fled, and happy was he that first gat the house.'

The remainder of this episode is occupied with denunciations of the unholy lives of the secular clergy and friars, their cruel persecutions of Christ's flock, the sloth and avarice of the bishops, and the injurious effects of pilgrimages upon the morals both of the priests and people. Indignantly remonstrating against the abominable practices thus countenanced or connived at by those who ought to have repressed them, he says—

'Ye priness of the people that should preach,
Why suffer ye sa great abusoun?
Why do ye nocht the simple people teach,
How and to whom to dress¶ their orisoun?
Why thole ye them to rin from town to town,
In pilgrimage till ony imageris:
Hoping to get thers some salratoun,
Praying to them devoutly on their knees?'

And after significantly referring to the destruction of the prophets of Baal by Elijah, to the abolition of the red friars, and the overthrow of the papal hierarchy in England, Holland, Denmark, and Norway, he continues,

'I trust to see gude reformatioun,
From tyme we get ane faithful prudent king,

In the chapter on the 'Spiritual and Papal Monarchie,' Lindsay resumes this favourite theme, and in vigorous, though sometimes homely language, describes at length the rise and progress of the papal power, the impiety and arrogance of the popes, the indolence, licentiousness, and avarice of the priests, the evils of enforced celibacy, the gross abuse of purgatory, the disastrous consequences which spring from the ignorance of the people, and the happy results to be anticipated from the publication of the Scriptures and missals in the vernacular language of the country. To this chapter is appended an episode, entitled 'A Description of the Court of Rome,' in which the poet inveighs in strong terms against the corruptions of the church, and the gross frauds and scandalous lives of the clergy. A few stanzas may be quoted to show the spirit which pervades this biting invective—

'Peter, Andrew, and John, were fishers fine,
Of men and women to the Christian faith;
But they (the popes) have spread their net with hook
and line,
On rents rich, on gold and other graith,*
Sic fishing to neglect they will be laith:†
For why they have fished in athwart the strands Ane great part truly of all temporal lands.

'With that the tenth part of all gude movabil,
For the uphalding of their dignities;
So bene their fishery wonder profitabil,
On the dry land as weil as on the seas,
Their herry-water‡ they spread in all countries;
And with their hose-net, daily draw to Rome,
The maist fine gold that is in Christendome.

'Their merchandyse intill all nations,
As printit lead, their wax, and parchment,
Their pardons, and their dispensations,
They do exceed some temporal princes' rent;
In sic traffic they are nocht negligent:
Of benefice they mak gude merchandyse,
Thro' simony which they hold little vice.

'Christ did command Peter to feed his sheep,
And sa he hid them feed full tenderly:
Of that command they take but little keep,§
But Christ's sheep they spulye|| piteously;
And with the wool they claithe them curiously;
Like gourmand wolves they take of them their food,
They eat their flesh and drink baith milk and blood.'

At last, Experience having brought his narrative to a close, winds up his instructive lessons with 'Ane Exhortatioun unto his Son the Courtier,' and takes leave of his pupil in these sweet stanzas—

'Of our talking now let us make ane end,
Behold how Phœbus downward docs descend,
Toward his palace in the occident:
Dame Cynthia I see she does pretend,

'The Monarchy,' says Mr. Tytler, 'appears to have been Lindsay's last, and it is in many respects his best work. It is nervous, original, learned, and pious—full, indeed, of many poignant satirical attacks upon the corruptions and licentiousness of the Romanist clergy, yet less bitter, coarse, and scurrilous than most of his earlier productions. It is pleasing, as he advances in years, to find the author receding from the indecency which was the poetical vice of the age—to mark the improved tendency and higher moral tone of his writings; and while we sympathize with the pensive melancholy which tinges his last poetical legacy to his countrymen, to know that when he entered his quiet oratory, he met there that stedfast faith, and rested on those blessed hopes which furnished him with a key to all the sorrow, darkness, and vicissitude of this fluctuating existence,¶

¶ Be not too much solyst in temporal things,
Since thou perceivis Pope, emperor, and kings,
Into the earth hath na place permanent.
Thou seest that death them shamefully down thrings,
And rives them from their rents, riches, and rings;††
Therefore on Christ confirm thine hail!‡‡ intent,
And of thy calling be right well content;
Then God that feeds the fowls of the air,
All needfull things for thee he shall prepare.'

The writings of Lindsay undoubtedly exercised the strongest influence on the age in which he lived, and were a powerful instrument in hastening the overthrow of the papal system in Scotland. But we lose sight of him as the revolution advanced; and, during the closing years of his life, he seems to have retired from all active co-operation in those measures which ultimately led to the final and happy triumph of the Protestant faith. Various conjectures have been offered respecting the causes which made him a spectator rather than an actor in the mighty events that were taking place around him; but nothing can be known of the motives by which he was influenced. The keen invectives against the abuses of the Romish system, with which his last work abounds, show that age had abated nothing of the intensity of his zeal against the corruptions of the church. While his bold and unsparring denunciations in the presence of the king and court, of the avarice, ambition, and licentiousness of the clergy, make it evident that no apprehensions of personal danger could have induced him to remain neutral in the contest. 'His warfare was as fearless as it was determined; while the printer's name was studiously concealed, and the place of impression falsified in the publication of his works, his own full name and titles always figured on the title-page, scorning concealment; and strange to say, there is no record of his having been challenged or persecuted in consequence.'* It was not till 1558, the year after his death, that his works were condemned to be burnt by the last Roman Catholic synod held in Scotland before the Reformation.†

The private character of the distinguished reformer appears to have been blameless, and not a word has ever been breathed against it by his enemies. Archbishop Spotswood, speaking of the eminent men who adorned this era, says, 'Sir David Lindsay of the Mount shall first be named, a man honourably descended, and greatly favoured by King James V. Besides his deep knowledge in heraldry (whereof he was the chief), and in other public affairs, he was most religiously inclined, but much hated by the clergy for the liberty he used in condemning the superstition of the time, and rebuking their loose and disorderly lives. Not the less he went unchallenged, and was not brought in question, which showed the good account wherein he was held.' 'His personal deportment,' says Dr. McVie, 'was grave, his morals were correct, and his writings discover a strong desire to reform the manners of the age, as well as ample proofs of true poetical genius, extensive learning, and wit the most keen and penetrating.' If we may give credit to the testimony of an English contemporary writer, Lindsay's aspirations for his country soared onward to a consummation as yet only partially attained. Dr. Boleyn, brother of Queen Anne, and who lived in the north of England, and had visited Scotland, introduces the Lion King as 'an ancient knight, sitting in a black chair of jet-stone, in a coat-of-arms, in orange tawny (the symbol of integrity), bearing upon his breast a white lion, with a crown of rich gold upon his head; with a hammer of strong steel in his hand, breaking asunder the counterfeit keys of Rome, forged by Antichrist. And this good knight of Scotland said to England the elder brother, and Scotland the younger,

'Habitate fratres in unum;
Is a blissful thing,
One God, one Faith, one Baptism pure,
One Law, one Land, one King! §

It must be admitted that Lindsay's poetical talents do not entitle him to a place in the highest rank of poets, and that he wanted that creative power which was possessed by Dunbar and the other 'Makers' of the golden age of Scottish poetry. He seems incapable, indeed, of rising either into the imaginative or the romantic sphere, and his writings are characterized by sound sense, sagacious observation, and sarcastic wit, rather than by brilliant imagination or deep poetic feeling. On the whole, a very fair estimate of Sir David's poetical merits has been taken by Mr. Ellis, who says, 'In his works we do not often find the splendid diction of Dunbar, or the prolific imagination of Gawin Douglas. Perhaps, indeed, the 'Dream' is his only composition that can be cited as uniformly poetical; but his various learning, his good sense, his perfect knowledge of courts and of the world, the facility of his versification, and, above all, his peculiar talent of adapting himself to readers of all denominations, will continue to secure to him a considerable share of that popularity, for which he was originally indebted to the opinions he professed, no less than to his poetical merits.' His writings not only enjoyed unbounded popularity in his own day, but till very recently they were to be found along with Barbour's Bruce and Blind Harry's Wallace, in almost every cottage north of the Tweed; and many of the Scottish peasantry could repeat long passages of them, and even whole poems by heart. They were even read at one time as class-books in the schools,* and were esteemed such treasures of sound wisdom, that the proverbial expression, 'Ye'll no find that in Davie Lindsay,' or 'It's no between the brods (boards) o' Davie Lindsay,' was in common use, implying that, not even Lindsay, whom nothing escapes, has noticed the thing in question.†

* Blind Harry's Wallace was used in the same way by the more advanced pupils. Hence the proverb, 'Out o' Davie Lindsay into Wallace.' So in Pennycuik's description of a Scottish cotter's fire-side—

'My mither hale her eldest son say
What he'd by heart o' Davie Lindsay.'

† Lives of the Lindsays, vol. i. p. 262. The following spirited sketch of the personal appearance of the Lion King is given by Sir Walter Scott in 'Marmion':—

'He was a man of middle age,
In aspect manly, grave, and sage,
As on king's errand come;
But in the glances of his eye,
A penetrating, keen, and sly
Expression found its home.
The flash of that satiric rage,
Which, bursting on the early stage,
Branded the vices of the age,
And broke the keys of Rome.
On milk-white palfrey forth he paced,
His cap of maintenance was graced
With the proud heron's plume.
From his steed's shoulder, loin, and breast,
Silk hoseings swept the ground,
With Scotland's arms, device, and crest,
Embroidered round and round.
The double treasure might you see,
First by Achais borne,
The tunic and the fleur-de-lys,
And gallant unicorn.

Nothing is known of the exact time and circumstances of Sir David Lindsay's death; but as Charteris, the bookseller, who published Lindsay's works in 1568, speaks of the cruel martyrdom of the venerable Walter Mill, who was burnt at St. Andrews, in April, 1558, as having taken place shortly after the death of Sir David, that event probably happened about the close of 1557. The poet must, of course, have been buried in the family vault, in the church of Ceres; but no stone marks the spot where the Lord Lion sleeps with his fathers.

As Sir David died without issue, he was succeeded in his estates by his brother Alexander, whose descendants continued in the possession of the 'Mount' till the last century, when it became the property of the Earl of Hopetoun, and now belongs to the Hopes of Rankeillour. The office of Lord Lion King-at-Arms was held successively by two members of the poet's family—Sir David, his nephew, became Lion King in 1591, and was succeeded by his son-in-law, Sir Jerome Lindsay, in 1621.

Dunbar, in his 'Lament for the Makers,' has enumerated at least twelve poets, who Other contemporaries, among porary poets. whom are Sir Hugh de Eglinton, Sir Mungo Lockhart, Sir John Ross, James Affleck, Alexander Traill, Patrick Johnstone, the two Rowls, Stobo, Quintyne Schaw, and Walter Kennedy; but their writings, have unfortunately nearly all perished. Lindsay, in the prologue to his 'Complaint of the Papingo,' also speaks of Quintyn, Mereer, Rowl, Sir James Inglis, Kid, Steward, Stewart of Lorn, Galbraith, Kinloch, Kennedy, and other poets of famous 'ingyne,' who

'Tho' they be dead their libellis* bene living.'

Of most of these writers, who seem to have obtained considerable celebrity in their day, little or nothing is now known except their names. Sir Hugh Eglinton. 'The good Sir Hugh Eglinton,' as he is styled by Dunbar, flourished about the middle of the fourteenth century. In 1361 he was one of the justiciaries of Lothian; and in September, 1367, he was appointed a commissioner for negotiating a treaty of peace with England. He married Egidia, sister of King Robert II., and died, it is supposed, about the year 1381, leaving an only daughter and heiress, Elizabeth, who married John Montgomery, an ancestor of the Earl of Eglintoun, and thus carried his great estates to the Montgomeries. It is

So bright the king's armorial coat,
That scarce the dazzled eye could note.

But all unarm'd, around him wait.

matter of regret that none of Sir Hugh's compositions have survived. Sir John the Ross is the person to whom Dunbar addresses his invective against Kennedy. He was in all probability a priest, as 'Sir' was the common appellation of secular priests at this period—the 'Pope's Knights,' as they were vulgarly denominated. James Affleck is also believed to have been in holy orders, and to have held the chantry of Caithness, which on his death, in the year 1497, was given by the king to James Beaton, afterwards Archbishop of St. Andrews. The only specimen of his composition now existing, is a poem entitled 'The Quair of Jealousy.' In the Bannatyne MS., Patrick Johnston is said to be the author of a short but curious poem, called 'The Three Deid Powis,' or 'The Three Death's Heads,' first printed in Lord Hailes' Collection. The name of this writer occurs occasionally in the Treasurer's accounts, during the earlier part of the reign of James IV. On the 5th of August, 1488, £5 were paid to 'Patrick Johnson, and the players of Lithgow that playit to the king; and on the 31st of August, 1489, the sum of £3 10s. were paid to Patrick Johnson, and his fellows, that playit a play to the king in Lithgow.' Mercer is commemorated in Dunbar's Lament as a poet of peculiar merit:

'He has reft Mercer his endyte,*
That did in love so lifly† write,
So short, so quick of sentence hie.'

Of the writings of this author, only one poem, entitled 'Perrel in Paramours,' has been preserved. Dunbar makes mention of two poets of the name of Rowl—'Rowl of Aberdeen, and gentle Roul of Corstorphine;' and the name of Rowl is also noticed by Lindsay; but it is uncertain which of these two persons was the Sir John Rowl who was the author of the strange poem of 'Rowl's Cursing,' first printed from Bannatyne's MS., in the 'Select Remains of the Early Popular Poetry of Scotland.'

Dunbar, writing about 1507, says,

'And death has now tane last of a'
Gude, gentle Stobo, and Quintyne Schaw,
Of whom all wights has pity.'

'Stobo' was the familiar cognomen of John Reid, rector of Christ's Kirk, who was employed as a writer, and notary-public, at court, during the reigns of James II., III., and IV. In the Treasurer's accounts for the years 1473 and 1474, mention is made of a half-yearly pension of £5 paid to Stobo at Whitsuntide, and the same at Martinmas. This pension, increased to £20 annually, was confirmed to him by charter from James III., January 9th, 1477-8, payable out of the customs of the burgh of Edinburgh, for the period of his life, in return for the gratuitous services which he had rendered to the king and his predecessor, in writing their letters to the pope and to sundry kings, princes, and nobles, and in payment of the expenses which he had incurred in the preparation of these epistles. None of his writings are now known to exist.

In the 'Fyting' of Dunbar and Kennedy, repeated mention is made of a poet named Quintyne, who is represented as the cousin and commissary of Kennedy, and, according to Dunbar, gave assistance to his relative in writing the verses which occasioned this contest. Gawin Douglas, in his 'Palace of Honour,' written in 1501, celebrates Kennedy, Dunbar, and Quintyne, as three living poets belonging to this court, who were held worthy of a place in the Court of the Muses. This Quintyne was probably a different person from Quintyne Schaw, who is commemorated by Dunbar in his 'Lament,' and who was the son of John Schaw of Haily, a family of considerable distinction in Ayrshire at that time. He appears to have been in the receipt of an annual pension of £10 from the king, and numerous entries appear in the Treasurer's accounts of additional sums paid to him at different times from 1480 to 1504 by the royal command. The only poem of his known to exist, is the 'Advyce to a Courtier,' which was first printed by Pinkerton, from Maitland's MS. Walter Kennedy, who is indebted for his reputation mainly to his poetical contest with Dunbar, was the third son of Gilbert, first Lord Kennedy. He received his education at the College of Glasgow, where he took his degree as master of arts, in 1478. Like Dunbar, he appears to have been early intended for the church, but it is uncertain whether or not he obtained any ecclesiastical preferment. His poetical reputation stood high in his own day. Gawin Douglas styles him 'Great Kennedy.' Dunbar, in his 'Lament,' says,

'Gude Maister Walter Kennedy
At point of death lies verily, Great rewth* it were that so suld be.'

And Lindsay asks,

'Wha can now the warke counterfeit
Of Kennedy, with terms aureate?†

But his scanty poetical remains do not seem to warrant the high praise bestowed upon him by his contemporaries.‡

Sir James Inglis, Abbot of Culross, is celebrated by Sir David Lindsay as a writer of miscellaneous poetry. In the prologue to his 'Complaint of the Papingo,' he asks,

'Wha can say mair than Sir James Inglis says,
In ballads, farces, and in pleasant plays?
But Culross bath his pen made impotent.'

Inglis appears to have been a person of some distinction at court, and to have obtained considerable ecclesiastical preferment. His name occurs in the Treasurer's accounts, under the date of December 10th, 1511, when 12 ells of taffety, at a cost of £8 8s., and 12 ells of canvass at 14s., were furnished to be 'play-coats' for him and his colleagues. At this time he was attached to the royal household, and received his 'leveray' or dress, at Yule, with an annual salary of £40, paid quarterly to 'Sir James Inglis, Clerk of the King's Closet.' He was appointed chaplain to the prince-royal, afterwards James V., at the same time that Gavin Dunbar was appointed his preceptor, and David Lindsay his usher. In the year 1515, he is called Secretary to the Queen Margaret; but he must still have continued in the service of the prince, for in the same year, September 12th, the sum of £2 16s. was 'delivered' by the Treasurer 'to Sir James Inglis for the king's grace, and for my lord duke his brother, to be them sarkis (shirts) eight ells holland clath' (cloth); and on the 28th January, 1515-16, 'Item to Sir James Inglis for wyl-coats (under-vests) to the king, two ells scarlet, £5.' In a charter of September 19th, 1527, he is styled Chancellor of the Royal Chapel at Stirling, and in that capacity he was furnished by the Treasurer with 16 ells of black satin to be a gown, at the cost of £22 8s. In the Treasurer's accounts of the same year, he is also styled Master of Works to the King, with an annual salary of £40, and he appears to have been at the same time employed as in former years, in getting up dramatic representations for the court; for about the end of 1526, the Treasurer paid 'to Sir James Inglis, to buy play-coats against Yule by the King's precept, £40.' thus presenting, as Mr. Laing remarks, a singular instance of the diversified kinds of employment in which ecclesiastical dignitaries deemed it not unbecoming in those days to be engaged.* Shortly after this he must have been advanced to the Abbacy of Culross; but he did not long enjoy his new dignity, for on the 1st of March, 1531, he was cruelly murdered by Blacater, baron of Tullialan, and his followers, among whom was a priest named Lothian.†

The reputation of Inglis as a poet rests mainly upon the testimony of Sir David Lindsay, who insinuates that his advancement to the Abbacy of Culross had withdrawn his attention from his poetical studies. A poem entitled 'A General Satire,' which in the Bannatyne MS. is attributed to Dunbar, is ascribed in the Maitland MS., and probably more correctly, to Sir James Inglis. The writer, like Lindsay and the other satirists of the period, complains bitterly of the pride, negligence, and incontinences of the clergy; of the oppression of the poor by the feudal laws and the lawyers; the protection afforded by the great barons to bands of thieves and murderers; the frauds practised by the merchants; the cheating of knaves and boasters at cards and dice; the prevailing extravagances in female attire, and especially the enormity of the long trains which 'sweep the causey clean.'

Two poets of the name of Stewart are mentioned by Sir David Lindsay, distinguished as

'— Steward who desireth ane stately style,
 Full ornate warke daylie does comyle.'

And Stewart of Lorne, who 'Will carpe* richt curioslie.'

Several pieces bearing that name occur in the collections of Lord Hailes, Allan Ramsay, and Mr. Sibbald, but to the two Stewarts, which of the two poets they belong it is now impossible to determine. Two of these poems are addressed to James V., and are calculated to give a high idea of the courage, honesty, and piety of the writer. In the first of these addresses, the plain-spoken bard exhorts the young king to confine himself to the amusements which were practised by his royal ancestors, and are becoming in a prince, such as hawking, hunting and archery, justing and chess; to play at cards and dice only with his nobles, or with the queen his mother; to shun the vice of playing for the sake of gain; and to remember that there is a King of kings who ruleth in heaven and on the earth, to whom he ought to pray when he lieth down and when he riseth up, that He would be to him his guide and governor.† In the second,‡ which is of a much higher order, the poet takes up the same strain, and exhorts the prince to strive earnestly against the sins which do 'most easily beset him,' and especially to be on his guard against covetousness; to perform promptly what he has promised; to beware of wasting his money on fools and flatterers; to exercise strict self-control,

'For wha himself can nocht guide nor advance,
 Why should ane province do on him depend;'

to love God above every earthly thing; and to pray that He would grant him grace in the days of his youth, to rule well his subjects in peace and honour, to the end of his life.

'And since thou stands in so tender age,
 That Nature to thee yet wisdom denies,
 Therefore submit thee to thy Counsel sage,
 And in all ways work as they devise;
 But above all keep thee fra Covetice;
 To princely honour if thou would pretend,
 Be liberal, then shall thy fame uprise,
 And win thee honour to thy life's end.'

'In that thou gives, deliver when thou hechtis §
 And suffer nocht thy hand thy hecht delay;
 For then thy hecht and thy deliverance fechtis ¶
 Far better were, thy hecht had been away.
 He owes me nocht that says me shortly nay,
 But he that hechts, and causes me attend,

And make on earth an honourable end.'

Another of these poems, from its biting satire, was probably written by Stewart of Lorne, whose satirical talents are commemorated by Lindsay. It is entitled 'Largess, largess hay, Largess of this New-Year day,' and passes a sarcastic eulogy upon the liberality of the king and his ministers, the chancellor, Archibald, Earl of Angus, husband of the queen dowager, the secretary, Sir Thomas Erskine of Brechin, the treasurer, Sir Archibald Douglas of Kilspindie, the comptroller, Sir James Colvill, the bishop of Galloway, and the young abbot of Holyrood, brother of the Earl of Angus. First came the king, head of the clan Stewart, and to show his generosity secretly slipped into the hand of the poet—a couple of shillings.

'First largess of the king my chief,
Who came as quiet as a thief,
And in my hand slid shillings tway,
To put his largness to the preif,¶
For largess of his New-Year day.'

The officers of the court to whom the poet presented his ballad, as in duty bound, followed the example of their sovereign. The abbot gave him—nothing.

'The secretar baith war and wise,
Hecht me ane cast of his office;
And for to read my bill alsway,
He said for him that might suffice,
For largess of this New-Year day.'

'The treasurer and comptrollar,
They bade me come, I wat nocht wha,
And they should gar,†† I wat nocht wha,
Give me, I wat nocht wat, full fair,
For largess of this New-Year day.'

The poet then proceeds to anathematize the keen frost which had so benumbed the fingers of the courtiers that they were unable to draw their purses; and concludes with an encomium on the Earl of Bothwell, and Margaret the queen dowager, whose absence from the court he feelingly laments.‡‡ In all these three poems James V. is represented as inclined to avarice even in his early years. The truth of the charge is virtually admitted by Buchanan, who, however, offers this apology for the prince, that 'he was the more avaricious of money, as when he was under ago he had been educated with the greatest parsimony; and when he became his own master he entered into an empty house, for the whole furniture having been carried off, he had every part of his palace to furnish anew; the regal patrimony was spent by his curators for purposes of which he exceedingly disapproved.'

Besides these pieces, and another, entitled 'Of Hap at Court,' which must have been written by one or other of the authors referred to, there is an unpublished poem, entitled the 'Vision of Dame Veritie,' by William Stewart, which is calculated to give a high idea of the talents of the author. The poet in his sleep sees a vision of 'Lady Veritie,' whom he humbly entreats to inform him when the kingdom of Scotland is likely to be at peace. Her answer conveys a powerful picture of the anarchy which prevailed in that country during the minority of James V.

'Then said this bird of beauty maist benign,

It is deeply to be regretted that the life of the author of these vigorous lines should be an entire blank in our national literature.

Archdeacon Sir David Lindsay, in the poem Bellenden, already quoted, after enumerating 'the poets auld,' who had written—

'in style heroical,
In brief, subtle terms rhetorical,
Of every matter, tragedy, and storie,
Sa ornatie to their high laud and glorie.'

proceeds to speak of a new candidate for fame, who bid fair to outstrip all his predecessors,

'But now of late is start up hastilie,
Ane cunning clerk who writeth craftilie,
Ane plant* of poets called Bellendyne,
Whose ornate warks my wit cau nocht defyne;
Get he into the court auctoritie,†
He will precell; Quintyne and Kennedie.'

The author referred to, in these encomiastic lines, was John Bellenden, Archdeacon of Moray, the translator of Hector Boece's History of Scotland, and of the first five books of Livy. He appears to have received an unusually liberal education; and as he took the degree of Doctor of Divinity in the Sorbonne, it has been supposed that he had pursued a regular course of study in the University of Paris.‡ His poetical talents attracted the notice of the Scottish court, and he was appointed 'Clerk of the Accounts' to the youthful prince James V.; but in consequence of the state revolution which took place in 1524, he was dismissed from his office, along with Sir David Lindsay and the other personal attendants of the king. Like his brother poet, however, we find him afterwards enjoying the friendship of his sovereign, at whose request he undertook the translation both of the Chronicles of Boece and of the first five books of Livy. Into the former of these works he has introduced two poems of considerable length, entitled 'The Proheme of the Cosmographè and the Proheme of the History,' which bear internal evidence of having been composed with a view to the instruction of the young monarch. The following quotation from the speech of Virtue, in the Proheme of the Cosmographè, may be taken as a specimen of the poetical abilities of this writer:—

'As carvel§ tycht fast tending thro' the sea,
Leaves na prent among the wallis¶ hie;
As bird swift, with moony busy plume,
Pierces the air and wait nocht where they flee;
So like our life without activitè,
Gives na fruit howbeit ane shadow blume.
Wha does their life into this earth consume

'As water purges and makes bodies fair,
As fire by nature ascends in the aire,
And purifies with heats vehement;

As flowers does smell; as fruit is nurisare;
As precious balm reverts things sare,*
And makes them of rot impatient;
As spice maist sweet; as rose maist redolent.
As star of day by moving circulare,
Chases the night with beams resplendent;

'Sic like my wark perfites every wycht;
In fervent love of most excellent lycht,
And makes man into this earth but† peer;
And does the soul fra all corruption dycht.‡
With odour dulee, and makes it more brycht
Than Dian full, or yet Apollo clear;
Synic raises it unto the highest sphere,
Immortally to shine in God's sycht,
As chosen spouse and creature most dear.§

'Of the compositions of a writer, who discovers so fine a vein of poetry,' says Dr. Irving, 'it cannot but be regretted that so inconsiderable a portion has been preserved. His poems are the effusion of an excursive fancy and a cultivated taste. He has been extolled as a master of every branch of divine and human learning; and it is at least apparent that his literature was such as his cotermporaries did not very frequently surpass.¶

Bellenden was a strenuous opponent of the Reformation, and died while on a visit to Rome in the year 1550.

Among the poetical writers of this age a conspicuous place is due to the Scotch James the Fifth. king himself, James V., who was not only the patron and friend of poets, but if we may credit the testimony of his contemporaries, was the author of many pieces displaying poetical talents of no mean order. Sir David Lindsay speaks of the 'ornate meter' of the royal bard, and styles him 'of flowing rhetorick the flower.' Bellenden also, in the prologue to his translation of Livy, addressed to the king, says,

'Ye my sovereign—
Write in ornate style poetical,
Quick flowing verse of rhetoric colours,
Sa freshly springing in your lusty flowers,
To the great comfort of all true Scottismen.'

And in the 'Proheme of the Cosmographic,' he makes the allegorical personage 'Delight' thus address the king—

'Maist valiant knycht, in deeds amorous,
And lustiest that ever nature wrought,
Who in the flower of youth mellifluous,
With notis sweet and sang melodious,
Awalks here among the flowers soft;
Thou has na game but in thy merry thocht.¶¶

Drummond of Hawthornden also informs us that 'James V. was naturally given to poesie, and many of his works yet extant testifie.' The greater part of the poems thus highly eulogized have unfortunately perished; but even the scanty remains of his poetical pieces which have survived to the present day, are sufficient to show, that the praise which Lindsay and Bellenden bestowed upon this accomplished prince was not overstrained. Bishop Gibson and various other writers have attributed to James V. the authorship of 'Christ's Kirk on the Green;' but in the Bannatyne MS. this poem is ascribed to his accomplished ancestor James I.; and the weight of evidence appears to preponderate in favour of that opinion.*

It is well known that James was in the habit of traversing the country in disguise, and mingling much with the common people, for the purpose of seeing that justice was impartially administered, and sometimes for the less justifiable motive of gallantry. Tradition has preserved many curious anecdotes respecting the adventures which befel this popular monarch while roaming through his kingdom in various disguises. It is related that on one occasion being "benighted after hunting, he entered a cottage situated in the midst of a moor, at the foot of the Ochil hills, near Alloa, where, known only as a stranger who had lost his way, he was kindly received. To regale their unexpected guest, the gudeman desired the gudewife to fetch the hen that roosted nearest the cock, (which is always the plumpest,) for the stranger's supper. The king, highly pleased with his night's lodging and hospitable entertainment, told mine host at parting that he should be glad to return his civility, and requested that the first time he came to Stirling he would call at the Castle, and inquire for the gudeman of Ballangeich. Donaldson, the king's landlord, did not fail to comply with this injunction, when his astonishment at finding the royal rank of his guest, afforded no small amusement to the merry monarch and his courtiers; whilst, to carry on the pleasantry, he was thenceforth designated by James with the title of 'King of the Moors,' which name and designation have descended from father to son ever since, and they have continued in possession of the identical spot, the property of the Earl of Mar, till very lately, when this nobleman, with reluctance, turned out the descendant and representative of the King of the Moors, on account of his Majesty's invincible indolence, and great dislike to reform or innovation of any kind, although, from the spirited example of his neighbour tenants on the same estate, he was convinced similar exertion would promote his advantage."†

A similar story is told of James, in the genealogical work of Buchanan of Auchmar, upon Scottish surnames: "This John Buchanan of Auchmar and Arnpryor was afterwards termed King of Kippen,‡ upon the following account: King James V., a very sociable, debonaire prince, residing at Stirling, in Buchanan of Arnpryor's time, carriers were very frequently passing along the common road, being near Arnpryor's house, with necessaries for the use of the king's family; and he, having some extraordinary occasion, ordered one of these carriers to leave his load at his house, and he would pay him for it; which the carrier refused to do, telling him he was the king's carrier, and his load for his Majesty's use; to which Arnpryor seemed to have small regard, compelling the carrier, in the end, to leave his load; telling him, if King James was King of Scotland, he was King of Kippen, so that it was reasonable he should share with his neighbour king in some of these loads, so frequently carried that road. The carrier representing this usage, and telling this story, as Arnpryor spoke it, to some of the king's servants, it came at length to his Majesty's ears, who, shortly thereafter, with a few attendants, came to visit his neighbour king, who was in the mean time at dinner. King James having sent a servant to demand access, was denied the same by a tall fellow with a battle-axe, who stood porter at the gate, telling him there could be no access till dinner was over. This answer not satisfying the king, he sent to demand access a second time; upon which he was desired by the porter to desist, otherwise he would find cause to repent his rudeness. His Majesty finding this method would not do, desired the porter to tell his master that the gudeman of Ballangeich desired to speak with the King of Kippen. The porter telling Arnpryor so much, he, in all humble manner, came and received the king, and having entertained him with much sumptuousness and jollity, became so agreeable to King James, that he allowed him to take so much of any provision he found carrying that road as he had occasion for; and seeing he made the first visit, desired Arnpryor in a few days to return him a second to Stirling, which he performed, and continued in very much favour with the king, always thereafter being termed King of Kippen while he lived."*

'The readers of Ariosto,' says Sir Walter Scott, 'must give credit for the amiable features with which James is represented, since he is generally considered as the prototype of Zerbino, the most interesting hero of the Orlando Furioso.'

"Another adventure, which had nearly cost James his life, is said to have taken place at the village of Crauon, near Edinburgh, where he had rendered his addresses acceptable to a pretty girl of the lower rank. Four or five persons, whether relations or lovers of his mistress is uncertain, beset the disguised monarch, as he returned from his rendezvous. Naturally gallant, and an admirable master of his weapon, the king took post on the high and narrow bridge over the Almond river and defended himself bravely with his sword. A peasant, who was thrashing in a neighbouring barn, came out upon the noise, and, whether moved by compassion or by natural gallantry, took the weaker side, and laid about with his flail so effectually, as to disperse the assailants well thrashed, even according to the letter. He then conducted the king into his barn, where his guest requested a basin and a towel to remove the stains of the broil. This being procured with difficulty, James employed himself in learning what was the summit of his deliverer's earthly wishes, and found that they were bounded by the desire of possessing, in property, the farm of Braehead, upon which he laboured as a bondsman. The lands chanced to belong to the crown; and James directed him to come to the palace of Holyrood, and inquire for the Guidman (i.e. farmer) of Ballangeich, a name by which he was known in his excursions, and which answered to the Il Bondocani of Haroun Alrashid. He presented himself accordingly, and found, with due astonishment, that he had saved his monarch's life, and that he was to be gratified with a crown charter of the lands of Braehead, under the service of presenting a ewer, basin, and towel, for the king to wash his hands, when he shall happen to pass the bridge of Cramond. This person was ancestor of the Howisons of Braehead in Mid-Lothian, a respectable family, who continue to hold the lands (now passed into the female line) under the same tenure."

The two excellent ballads ascribed to James, and entitled 'The Gaberlunzie Man,' and 'We'll gae nae mair a roving,' are said to have been founded upon his adventures when travelling in the disguise of a beggar. They display poetical talent of a very high order, and are equal to anything of the kind in the Scottish language. We give a few stanzas of 'The Gaberlunzie Man,'† which an eminent critic has pronounced in point of humour superior to anything of Dunbar's or of Lindsay's.

'The pawky auld carle cam o'er the lee,‡
Wi' mony gude o'ens and days to me,
Saying gude-wife for your courtesey
Will ye lodge a silly auld man.

'The night was cauld,§ the carle was wat,||
And down ayont the ingle¶ he sat,
My daughters shoulders he gan to clap,
And oadgily ranted and sang.

'O wow, quoth he, were I as free
As first when I saw this countrie,
How blith and merry would I be,
And I would ne'er think lang.

'He grew canty,†† and she grew fain,‡‡
Her little did her auld minny§§ ken,
What these steel || twa thegither were saying,
When wooing they were sae thrang,¶¶

The result of the adventure—the elopement of the daughter with the Gaberlunzie—the picture of the auld wife's alarm when she found that the beggar had decamped, lest some of her gear should have walked away with him, and her satisfaction on finding all safe, are given with inimitable humour.

* Lady of the Lake, Appendix, p. 350. W. Howison Cranford, Esq., of Braehead and Craunfurland, discharged this duty at the banquet given to King George IV. in the Parliament House, at Edinburgh, in 1822.

The effect of the discovery of the daughter's elopement is very graphically described:—

'O fy! gar ride, and fy gar rin,
And haste ye find these traitors again,
For she's be burnt, and he's be slain,
The wearyfu' gaberlunzie-man.

'Some rode upo' horse, some ran aft,
The wife was wud ¶¶ and out of her wit,
She could na gang, nor yet could she sit,
But aye she curs'd and she bann'd.'

The poem concludes with a description of the shifts by which the Gaberlunzie of that period eked out a living:—

'Wi' cauk, and keel, I'll win your bread,
And spindles and whorles for them wha need,
Whilk is a gentle trade indeed,
To carry the gaberlunzie on.

'I'll bow my leg, and crook my knee,
An' draw a black clout o'er my e'e,
A cripple, or blind, they will ca' me,
While we shall be merry, and sing.'

A beautiful little poem, entitled 'The Mourning Maiden,' belongs to this period. Its author is unknown, but it must have been written before the middle of the sixteenth century, as the first verse of it is quoted in the 'Complaint of Scotland,' which was published in the year 1549. 'This piece,' says Pinkerton, 'for the age in which it was written, is almost miraculous. The tender pathos is finely recommended by an excellent cadence. An age that produced this, might produce almost any perfection in poetry.'

An unpublished poem entitled 'Duncan Laider, or Maegregor's Testament,' was communicated by Pennant to Warton, who gives some quotations from it in his History of English Poetry, and represents it as containing strokes of satirical humour not inferior to those of Dunbar and Lindsay. The date of its composition is uncertain, but it was probably written during the reign of James

V., as it mentions the death of James IV., and reprobrates in strong terms the ruinous policy and general corruption of public manners which prevailed in Scotland during the minority of his successor. The testator, by way of preface to his testament, describes his own character, and mode of life, in the following vigorous lines.

' At length, in consequence of repeated enormities and violations of justice, Duncane supposes himself to be imprisoned, and about to suffer the extreme sentence of the law. He therefore very providently makes his last will, which contains the following witty bequests:—

CHAPTER XXV.

CONDITION OF THE PEOPLE.

SCOTLAND appears to have made considerable progress in civilization during the vigorous reign of James IV. The efforts of this active and energetic monarch were successfully directed to the introduction of law and order into every part of his dominions—the impartial administration of justice—the repression and punishment of crime, and the encouragement of the agriculture, manufactures, trade, commerce, and fisheries of his kingdom.* Under his firm, yet popular sway, the turbulent districts of the Highlands and Isles were reduced to a state of comparative tranquillity, the Border marauders were brought to punishment, and the common people, relieved, to some extent, from the oppression of the nobles, and trusting to the protection of the law, began to devote their energies to peaceful and industrious pursuits. This fair prospect, however, was suddenly overcast by the untimely death of the king at Flodden, and the country was once more thrown back into a state of anarchy. The desolating war with England, the nefarious policy of Henry VIII. in fomenting disputes among the Scottish nobles, the bitter feuds between the rival factions who struggled for the mastery, all combined to aggravate the miseries of the people, and to render the kingdom the scene of almost incessant turmoil, misrule, and disorder. The continued inroads of the English marauders reduced the Border districts to the state of a desert. Lord Dacre, in a letter to the English Council, 17th May, 1514, vindicating himself from the unmerited accusation, that he had done no great harm to the Scots, says, “The water of the English. Liddell being twelve miles in length, within the Middle March of Scotland, whereupon was one hundred ploughs; the water of Ladder, in the same Marches, being six miles in length, whereupon was forty ploughs; the two towns of Carlanriggs, with the demaynes of the same, whereupon was forty ploughs; the water of Euse being eight miles in length, whereupon was seven ploughs, the head of the water of Teviot, from Branxholm up unto Euse Doors, being eight miles in length, whereupon was four ploughs; the water of Borthwick, being in length eight miles, whereupon was one hundred ploughs, and the water of Ale fro Askrige to Elmartour, whereupon was fifty ploughs, lies all and every of them waste now, and no corn sown upon none of the said grounds. And upon the West Marches of Scotland I have burnt and destroyed the townships of Annan, Dronoch, Dronochwood, Tordoff,” &c., adding thirty other townships, “with the water of Esk, from Stabl Gorton down to Canonby, which is six miles in length; where as there was in all times past four hundred ploughs and above, they are now clearly wasted, and no man dwelling in any of them at this day, save only in the towns of Annan, Steple, and Walghopp.” “And so,” he adds with extreme complacency, “I shall continue my service with diligence, from time to time, for the most annoyance of the Scots.”*

Whilst such was the miserable condition of the Borders, the interior of the country exhibited an equally melancholy picture. “I assure you” says Gavin Douglas, Bishop of Dunkeld, in a letter to a friend in England, written in 1515, “the people of this realm are so oppressed, for lack of justice, by thieves, robbery, and other extortions, that they would be glad to live under the Great Turk to have justice.”† The country still continued to be torn asunder by the Distracted state of the country. sanguinary and interminable feuds of the barons, who trampled on all law and order, and robbed and oppressed the people with impunity. The criminal records of the period show that murders, robberies, fire-raising, and other crimes of a similar kind, were of almost daily occurrence in every part of the kingdom, and that the very persons who were appointed to administer justice to the lieges were, in many cases, the most flagrant violators of the laws, and the worst oppressors of the poor. We find, for example, that on the 3rd of March, 1513, Patrick Agnew, the Sheriff of Wigtown, was permitted to compound for what is termed ‘common oppression’ done to a number of his poor neighbours, in plundering them of their property and compelling them to till his lands. Nothing seems to have come amiss to this worthy official. Two he robbed of their swine, a third he deprived of an ox, a fourth he ‘harried’ of ten bolls of barley, from a fifth he carried off a young horse. He was also ‘art and part’ in the ‘stouthreif’ of four cows from Thomas Cunyngnam, in Carrik, and in ‘the convocation of the lieges with warlike arms, contrary to law,’ and in ‘the oppression done to Sir David Kennedy coming to Leswalt, and hindering him from holding his court.’ On another occasion this exemplary dispenser of the law was convicted and fined five marks for taking a bribe to acquit a murderer.§ What a melancholy picture does it afford of the state of society at this period, to find the hereditary judge and highest legal functionary in the district thus vying with the most notorious Border freebooters in the open violation of the law, of which he was the appointed guardian. At the same sitting of the Justiciary Court, Nevil Agnew, a confederate, and probably a relative of the Sheriff, was allowed to compound for ‘art and part of the forethought, felony, and oppression done to Archibald M’Culloch, of Ardwel, an William Adair, of Kingate’; for the ‘stouthreif of horse from John M’Nesche’; for ‘the stouthreif of an ox from Gilbert Adair’; for ‘the stouthreif of a ox from John M'Culloch'; for the 'oppression done to Sir David Kennedy, and for the breaking of the king's protection upon him'; for 'the stouthrief of certain tymmer (timber) of two houses, with the windows and doors thereof'; for 'the stouthrief of an ox from Thomas Bell'; and for 'common oppression of the lieges, and specially of the tenants of Leswalt.' Other two accomplices of the sheriff, named Patrick Agnew and George Crukshank, produced at the same time 'a remission for the slaughter of Patrick and Thomas M'Ke'; for 'the stouthrief of seven cows, with their calves, from John M'Ke, of Myrtoune,' and for the mutilation of the luckless sufferers. The worthy sheriff became most appropriately the surety for the whole of these villains.*

The unfortunate tenant of Myrtoune appears to have been plundered also of certain oxen, horses, and sheep, as well as of a quantity of barley and oats, by two brigands, bearing the uncouth names of Simon Makeristin and Dominick M'Clellanc.† These 'masterful' robbers were, in all proba-

Prevalence of robbery and theft. bility, chiefs of some of the turbulent Galloway septs, and must have had a considerable body of retainers, for we find that among other crimes they were permitted to compound for 'oppression done to the community of Wigtoun, in taking the best merchandise coming in ships to the said burgh, and keeping thereof in their cellars, and in forcibly collecting the profits of the town and burrow lands.‡ The Galwegian plunderers appear to have spared no rank or condition, and to have levied their contributions with the utmost impartiality from the clergy and the laity. Even their lord bishop himself was not exempt from their depredations, for we find that Patrick Waus, Vause, or Vans was allowed to compound for the theft of six silver 'tasses,' or drinking cups, from that prelate, and for the oppression done to him in houghing or hamstringing his oxen.§ It was said of the Liddesdale thieves that nothing came amiss to them which was not too hot or too heavy. But the marauders of Galloway seem to have improved upon the practice even of the experienced Borderers, for in the criminal records of this period various cases are mentioned in which they are charged with having stolen, not only the crops and the cattle, but the very land itself. The above mentioned Patrick Waus, for example, is found guilty of an act of oppression done to John M'Gilwyan in Whithern, 'in the detention of his croft|| for the space of twelve years;' and a certain Andrew Dunbar was allowed to compound for forcibly retaining possession, for four years, of a farm belonging to Walter M'Culloch's mother, destroying her crops and stock, consisting of six score bolls of barley and oats, fifteen score of sheep, and forty cows and 'queys;' for taking the horses of the said Walter, and riding them to kirk and market when he pleased, and killing one of them; for the stouthrief of the 'tymmer' of two of his houses, and for various other acts of oppression and violence done to him and his servants.* The criminal records testify that similar outrages were committed in all parts of the country, and in not a few cases by persons of the highest rank. We find, for example, that Hugh, High rank of the Lord Somerville, was accused of criminals oppressing John Tweeddale in Carnwarth, and robbing him of all his horses, mares, oxen, cows, and crops, with all his goods and utensils. George Ramsay of Clatto, John Betoun of Balfour, James Betoun of Melgoun, John Graham of Claverhouse, and others, found caution to 'underlie the law at the next Justiciaire of Fife, for convocation of the lieges, to the number of eighty persons,' and for a violent assault on John, Lord Lindsay, Sheriff of Fife, in the execution of his office, and breaking up the doors of the Tolbooth of Cupar, in which he was holding his court.‡ Three of the chiefs of the clan Grant were charged with having assisted the Mackintoshes in besieging and burning the house of Davy in Strathavern, and the houses and buildings of the tenants of Dyke, Ardrossere, and other lands; plundering the estates of cattle and goods to the value of twelve thousand pounds, and slaughtering men, women, and children, to the number of twenty persons. William Douglas of Bone-Jedburgh, Thomas Macdowell of Makerstoun, and John Moll of that ilk, three Teviotdale barons of large possessions, were compelled to give security that they would 'underlie' the law for art and part of the oppression and hame-sucken done to Mr. Alexander Dunbar, Dean of Moray, and his servants, under silence of night; and Nicholas Lermonthe of Floors, and Andrew his brother, 'having obtained a respite,' found caution to satisfy the parties, for their being art and part of the oppression done to Sibilla Corsby and James Gray, scourging them and burning their house;—Item, for theftuously breaking a house in the town of Smallholm, and stealing goods therefrom;—Item, for oppression done to John Edmonstoune of that ilk, keeping his five mark lands of Ednam hurting for nine years, and cruelly wounding and hurting his servants;—Item, for stouthrief and concealment of eighty sheep, taken from the poor tenants on the lands of Raeburn.§ The last three of these entries occur consecutively under the date of May, 1536. The property of the king does not appear to have been more secure from depredation than that of his subjects, for we not only find mention made of the theft of his majesty's sheep by a Border reiver, bearing the appropriate name of Symon Armstrong, but, in 1526, the artillery and certain mangonels, 'coming from the castle of Stirling to the king's majesty at Edinburgh, for the defence of his person,' were carried off by Robert Bruce of Airth and his brothers; and even the royal crown appears to have been stolen about the same time from the crown-room in the palace of Holyrood.*

As might have been expected, offences both against person and property were especially numerous on the Borders, and homicide, fire-raising, 'forethought (premeditated) felony and stouthrief; treasonable inter-communing with English thieves, 'hereschip,'† oppression, resetting thieves and traitors, wounding, mutilation, and other kindred crimes seem to have been of almost daily occurrence throughout these lawless districts. As a specimen of the wholesale depredations carried on by these irreclaimable marauders, we may give the charge brought against Alexander Turnbull, son of the laird of Dryden, for treasonably bringing in the thieves and traitors of Levin† upon Thomas Myddilmas in Floro, and assisting them in plundering his property, and in the slaughter of his wife and two sons. Among the articles carried off by this gang, mention is made of eleven horses and mares, price one hundred marks; forty-four oxen and cows, valued at eighty-eight pounds; two suits of mail worth twenty pounds; forty pounds in gold and silver money; six silver spoons, worth six marks; a 'great dozen' of tin or pewter flagons or vessels, price seven pounds; six men's gowns, price eight pounds; eleven women's kirtles, price twenty-two pounds; twelve scarfs or veils, price twelve pounds; five shields or targets, price ten pounds; five hand-bows, price fifty shillings; six lanecs, six halberts or poleaxes, price two pounds ten shillings; two gold rings, price five pounds; three 'tykes' of feather-beds, price five pounds; twenty-two pairs of linen sheets, price eleven pounds; twenty-two blankets or worsted coverlets, price ten pounds; sixteen sheets, price six pounds; twenty hair-pins or bodkins, price twenty shillings; five swords, price five pounds; one daker‡ of tanned hides, price three pounds; riding greaves or boots and other goods, valued at five pounds; five Flanders caps, worth two pounds ten shillings; two webs of grey worsted cloth, price ten pounds; three webs of linen cloth, price three pounds; five boxes, price two pounds ten shillings; four coffers, valued at twenty-six shillings and eightpence; three elms of English cloth, worth three pounds; and three handkerchiefs, price six shillings.‡ Thomas Myddilmas, thus ruthlessly plundered and maltreated, must evidently have been a person of considerable wealth; and the specification of the stolen goods gives us an interesting glimpse of the dress and manners of the Border lairds of that period. The 'stouthrief' of horses, cows, and sheep is the charge usually brought against the Border freebooters, but nothing seems to have come amiss to them, and one peculiarly needy or greedy marauder, named James Turnbull, brother of the laird of Whitehope, was actually convicted of carrying off the iron windows, doors, and 'crukis' of the tower of Howpasley.* Even sacrilege had no terrors for the Borderers, for we learn that the brother of the vicar of Innerleithen was robbed by David Tait of a golden signet, a gold ring, two silver girdles or zones, nine veils or scarfs of lawn, 'holland claiith,' and other goods, to the value of twenty pounds, taken out of the kirk of Innerleithen;† and that the kirk of Jedburgh was plundered of certain silk cushions, sheets, linen cloths, 'fustiane,' scarfs or surplices and other clothes, by Robert Rutherford of Todlaw.‡

One portion of the Register of the Justiciare of Jedburgh is almost exclusively devoted to an account of the remarkable activity of the family of the Olivers of the Stryndis, who appear to have made the most of the preceding Michaelmas moon in their 'herships' and forays. Mention is made of twelve horses and mares, seventy-four oxen and cows, and a hundred and twenty-five sheep, together with two pots, a gown of Rouen tawny, a kirtle of broad red cloth, a brown gown, veils or scarfs, linen sheets, bed-sheets, shirts, a doublet, a pair of kersey galligaskins or hose, and other articles, as having been 'conveyed' away by Long John Oliver, Little John Oliver, David Oliver in Stryndis, called 'David na gude Preist,' and other 'minions of the moon,' who at the same time were charged with the 'cruel slaughter' of John Moffat, Robert Brig, and Adam Barnisfader.§ The extent to which murder, homicide, mutilation, and other deeds of violence and bloodshed prevailed at this time, as shown by the criminal records, is perfectly appalling. Page after page is filled with the notices of such crimes as the slaughter of Sir George Farnylaw, chaplain, by Roger Langlands, and of Adam Crawford by Robert Scott of Whitechester—the burning of the place of Whitslade by Hector Lauder—the slaughter of David Henrison at the kirk of Maxton by John Paulo of Littledean and his accomplices, the Rutherfords and certain English freebooters—the 'stouthrief' of the cattle of Thomas, John, Allan, and Thomas Henrison, junior, the abduction of their persons, and their forcible detention in England for three months, till they consented to ransom themselves—the slaughter of James Rutherford by the Turnbulls at the kirk of Hawick—the burning of the place of Bafnhill, and the carrying away an immense quantity of plunder from the lands of Rutherford of Langnewton—the burning and plunder of Borthwickshiels by the Armstrongs—the violent occupation, by William Scott of Thirlestane, of the lands of Sir Patrick Crichtoun of Cranston-Riddell—the slaughter of Edward Hunter, laird of Polwood, by Gilbert Tweedie—of Sir John Mac-

The offences of the ‘rascal multitude’ were probably for the most part tried in the local courts, which each baron was privileged to hold on his own estates.

A highly interesting document, entitled ‘a proclamation for regulating the proceedings of the Justice Ayre of Jedburgh,’ A.D. 1510, throws great light both on the form of procedure before the Justiciars, and on the state of the country at this period. Although apparently framed for the Ayre of Jedburgh, there seems no doubt that this proclamation was circular, and addressed to every

It is evident both from the repeated enactments of the legislature and from the complaints of the poets of the day that the farmers and cottagers were still grievously oppressed by their landlords, and that the levying of 'caupes' or pretended benevolences of horses, cattle, &c. the unjust resumption of leases and 'grassums' or excessive fines for their renewal, and the forcible expulsion of tenants from their farms, rapine and outrage, 'stouthrief, hersclup and sorning,' the partial administration of justice, 'the destruction of cornes, meadows, and harrying of puir folks,' continued to prevail throughout the kingdom. The Scottish laws, 'which were as wisely and judiciously made as they were carelessly and ineffectually executed,' in vain endeavoured to restrain the injuries thus inflicted on the industrious classes of the community. Margaret, in a letter of September, 1523, 'regard not the disasters of the poor, but laugh at them;' and their military retainers, who lived in a great measure by plunder, were ever ready to execute any commands of their masters, however unlawful. The intolerable grievances to which the poor husbandmen and cottagers were subjected by the oppressive exactions of the nobles and their armed followers are enumerated with great bitterness in the anonymous complaint of John Upland, a fictitious character representing a countryman into whose mouth the poets of the day put their general satires upon men and manners.

But it was not merely the farmers and cotters who suffered from the oppression of these titled robbers, but all who were not strong enough to resist force by force were compelled to submit to their exactions. It was no uncommon occurrence for the higher barons to exact hospitality from the clergy for themselves, and their armed bands of retainers to sorn upon the monasteries in the vicinity of their castles until their substance was consumed. The community of Aberbrothoch complained of an Earl of Angus, who was in the regular habit of visiting them once a year with a train of a thousand horse, and abiding till the whole winter provisions of the convent were exhausted. Well might one of the sufferers from this shameless rapacity complain that 'the goods of the church which were bestowed upon her by holy princes and pious nobles were thus consumed in revelry by every profligate layman who numbers in his train more followers than he can support by honest means or by his own incomings,' and lament that 'the barons of Scotland are now turned masterful thieves and ruffians, oppressing the poor by violence, and wasting the church by extorting free-quarters from abbeys and priories without either shame or reason.'

An interesting view of the state of the country at this period and of the manners and sentiments of the people is given in a work entitled 'The Complaint of Scotland,' which was printed at St. Andrews in the year 1548. In this curious piece Scotland is represented under the figure of a lady of excellent extraction and of ancient genealogy, but with a doleful countenance, and making 'ane melancholious cheir for the great violens that she had sustenit.' Her golden hair was disordered and dishevelled, her golden crown tottering on her head. A red lion blazoned on a field of gold bordered with the fleur de lis, appears wounded on her shield. The lady was clothed in a mantle blazoned with figures of different kinds. On the upper border there were many precious stones, on which were engraven shields, spears, swords, and armour, representing the nobles and barons. In the middle there were portrayed books, and figures, and various sciences, human and divine, emblematic of the clergy; and on the lower part were represented all kinds of cattle and beasts, with all varieties of corn, herbs, plants, and trees, ships, merchandise, and work tools, in allusion to the occupations of the commons. This 'marvellous' mantle was in many places so rent and torn that the various devices by which it was adorned were almost erased, and not a few of the shields in the upper part were wanting, the armour was broken and rusted, the beautiful workmanship in the middle was so defaced that 'na man could extract ony profitable sentens nor gude exemplif furth of ony part of it.' The lower border had suffered the greatest injury, and the figures embroidered upon it were so grievously spoiled as to be almost incapable of being repaired. As the afflicted lady was sitting with her gay clothes riven and ragged, contemplating with the deepest sorrow the barren fields which were formerly covered with corn, she perceived three of her sons approaching, who represent the three estates of Scotland. The eldest was clothed in armour, and trailed a halbert behind him. The second was clad in a long gown, and with an aspect of great gravity held in his hand a book, the clasps of which were 'fast lokkyt with ruste.' The youngest was lying flat on his side on the cold ground, and all his clothes in rags, making ane dolorous lamentation, and striving in vain to stand upright.

Dame Scotia seeing her sons in this lamentable condition, begins to upbraid them with their negligence, cowardice, and ingratitude towards her, and declared that much as she has suffered from her 'auld enemies' of England, she has suffered still more from the grievous misconduct of her children. They are so divided among themselves, she alleges, that no one can trust another; and in consequence of this mutual suspicion and distrust, all seek their own not the welfare of the commonwealth, for some 'are fled far within the country, some are fled to the hills, and some remain in their own houses on the Englishmen's assurance, and some are become neutral men like to the riders that dwell in the Debateable land.' She affirms that the country has suffered great injury from the familiar intercourse between the Scottish and English borderers, 'contrair the laws and customs baith of England and Scotland; and that in consequence of this treasonable familiarity, the secret plans of the lords of the council for the defence and welfare of the realm are immediately betrayed to the English king. The correspondence of the English ambassadors and wardens of this period, which has been only recently brought to light, shows that these charges were but too well founded. The third son, who is the representative of the labouring classes of the community, defends himself from the accusations of his mother, and declares that he is unjustly blamed for the offences committed by his brothers, the nobles and clergy, who show themselves his worst enemies. 'I may be compared,' he says, 'to the dullenss in as far as I am compelled to bayr ane importabil * burdyng, for I am dung and broddit † to gar me do and to thole the thing that is above my power. Allace I am the mark of the butt contrair the whilk everie man shoots arrows of tribulation. Sir David Lindsay, in his Interludes, complains almost in the very same terms of the oppression of the farmers and cottagers by their landlords.

'Thir pur commons daylie, as ye may see,
Declyne down till extreme povertie,
For some are heichtit so into their mail,
Their wykmen will nocht find them water-kail. ¶
How kirkmen heicht their tiends it is weil knawin

And now begins a plague upon them new,
That gentlemen their steadings take in feu.
Thus maun they pay great farm, or leave the stead,
And some are plainlie harlit out by the head,
That are destroyit without God on them rue.'

And in the fourth book of the Monarchy, in denouncing vengeance on the oppressors of the poor, he makes special mention of the injustice suffered by the tenants and husbandmen.

'Ye lords and barons, mair and less,
That your pur tenants does oppress,
By great grassum ++ and double mail,
Mair than your lands bene avail.
With sore exorbitant cariage,
With merchets of their marriage,

And to the priest their tiends hail;
And when the lands again is sawin,
What rests behind I wald were knawin. † †

The gross abuses complained of, however, were too deeply rooted to be eradicated at once, even by the powerful denunciations of Lindsay. 'Wha labours took he,' says his first editor, Charteris

Dame Scotia refuses to sustain this defence of her youngest son on the ground that no man should be admitted a witness in his own cause, and she declares that she will not listen to his charges against his brothers, because an accuser should be clean before he accuse his neighbour. She then addresses her three sons successively in a series of indignant admonitions, in which she exposes their particular faults, denounces their peculiar crimes, and exhorts them to unanimity in repelling the hostilities of the common enemy. The vices of the nobles are exposed with special severity. 'The arms,' she

Degeneracy of the nobles. says, 'that ye bear in your shields, and in the seals of your signets, which are sculptured on your walls and blazoned on your windows of glass, were given to your ancestors for the noble deeds they achieved; by bearing their arms you engage to tread in their steps, or you deserve to be degraded from your rank, and divested of your honourable arms;' and they are informed that they justly merit this punishment on account of their imbecility, avarice, and contention. 'Ye profess you to be gentlemen, but your works testify that ye are but unevill villains; ye wald be reputed and called virtuous and honest howbeit that ye did never ane honest act, and ye repute other men for villains that did never ane villain act. It appears that when your noble predecessors decessed, they took their virtue and gentrice with them to their sepulture, and they left nathing with you but the title.' Their pride, avarice, and licentiousness are denounced in equally indignant terms. 'The prodigal pride that ringes|| among gentil men is detestabil, nocht alanerly¶ in costly claithing above their state, but as weill in prodigal expenses that they make on horses and dogs, above their rent or riches. Ane man is nocht repute for ane gentil man in Scotland but gif he mak mair expenses on his horse and his dogs nor he does on his wife and bairna.' In the address to the spiritual estate the author Vices of the animadverts with great severity spirituality. on the vices of that order. He applies to them Plutarch's apologuo of the crab instructing her young, and declares that the people disobey their gudo doctrine because of their malversion and neglect of the duties of their office; and that the punishment they inflicted upon heretics, unaccompanied by the reformation of their own order, was only like 'ulye (oil) cast on ane liet birnand fyir,' for as 'soon as there is ane person slane, brynt, or banest for the halding of perverst opinions incontinent, there rises up three in his place.' But the most curious part of this address is the exhortation to the clergy to change their spiritual habits, 'baith cowls and syde-gowns, for steel jacks and coats of mail,' and to assist their countrymen to repel the invasions of their enemies. 'None of the spiritualitie,' he adds, 'shold be scrupulous in this business, considering that God's law, the law of nature, positive law, civil and canon law, has condescendit in ane purpose, that all staitis and faculties, without ony exception of persons, are oblist to pass in battel for the defense of the public weill and of their native countrie.' During the War of Independence, a number of the Scottish clergy fought valiantly in defence of the rights and liberties of their country; but in these degenerate days, a martial temper seems not to have been characteristic of the order, and they were as defective in patriotism as in other virtues.

The miseries of this unhappy country appear to have reached their climax after the death of James, and when a series of bloody and destructive inroads on the part of the English reduced the southern part of the kingdom to the condition of a desert, while the rapacity and violence of the nobles, the lawless turbulence of the commons, and the fatal discord of contending factions, paralysed every effort to unite the nation in repelling the common enemy. The author of the 'Complaint' draws a most frightful picture of the civil dissensions by which the country was Internal dissensions among the people. torn asunder at this period. 'All the realms,' he says, 'that are divided within themselves shall be left desolate; therefore it is na marvel that your country come to ruin, considering that all sorts of detestabil and unlawful wars that destroyed the Romans in the ancient days ringis presently among you. The first sort of battles and wars that brocht the Romans to ruin was called the "battellis finityvia." That is when ane man undertakes to conquest by violence and tyranny the lands of his neighbours that march and lye contigue with his lands. This same sort of wars is in Scotland, where there is nocht meay men, great nor small, that have heritage, but are aye inventing cavilation and wrang titles to have their neighbour's heritages that lye contigue beside them, either by process and pleas, or else by violens. There was ane other sort of battells among the Romans callit "battellis socialis." That is when towns of ane country mak war contrair others. This same sort of wars ringis presently in Scotland, for there is nocht ane burrowstoun nor landward parish within the realm but they have envy contrair the towns and parishes that are next neighbours to them. The third sort of wars were callit "battellis civilis." That is when citizens and indwellers of ane citie have mortal feud contrair others. This same sort of wars ringes instantly in Scotland, for there is nocht ane burrowstoun nor parish in Scotland but there is deadly feud among some of the indwellers of the said towns. There is ane other sort of wars callit "battellis intestinis." That is when kinsmen and friends have mortal wars contrair others. This same sort of wars ringes instantly in Scotland, for the intestine wars that ringes among the barons and gentill men are detestabil to be rehearsit, for they that are nearest of kin and blood have maist mortal feud contrair others. There is ane other sort of wars called "battellis aspiiales." That is when the people gather together in ane great convention, but the authoritic of the superior. This same sort of wars ringis instantly in Scotland, for I have seen nine or ten thousand gather together without ony commission of the King's letters, the whilk great convention has been to put their neighbours furth of their steading and tacks on Whitsun Wednesday, or else to lead way ane pair man's tiend in harvest; but they wald nocht be half as solist to convene three hundred at the command of the king's letters, to pass to resist our auld enemies of England.'[†]

But the contests of hostile factions, the ravages of war, and the famine produced by the destruction of the growing corn, and the uncultivated state of the arable land, were not the only miseries which at this unhappy period harassed the distracted kingdom of Scotland. The author of the "Complaint" likewise mentions the 'universal pestilence and mortalitie that has occurrit mercyless among the pepil.' A malignant epidemic under various forms continued at intervals to ravage the country for more than a century after this period. 'There was,' says an old annalist, 'twa yearis before this time, ane great universal sickness through the maist part of Scotland; uncertane what sickness it was, for the doctors could not tell, for there was no remedie for it, and the commons called it cowdothe.† Sir David Lindsay, in his 'Epistle Nuncupatorie' to the monarchy, speaking of this period of 'darkness and of gloomines,' says—

'Canse them clearly for till understand,
That for the breaking of the Lord's command,
His threefold wand of flagellation

Has scourgit this pair realm of Scotland,
By mortal wars baith by sea and land,
With many terrible tribulation;
Therefore to make them true narratioun,
That all thir wars, this dearth, hunger, and pest,
Was nocht but for our sins manifest.*

Muir, the historian, in his description of Scotland in 1521, mentions some particulars which confirm the statements of Sir David Lindsay, and the author of the 'Complaint of Scotland,' respecting the condition of the common people at this time.

Description of the country, by Muir.

The houses of the farmers, he says, were small, because their farms were rented only by the year, or at most for four or five, so that, though stone was abundant, there was no desire to erect good houses, to plant trees or hedges, or to enrich the ground—a state of matters which, he justly remarks, was most injurious to the prosperity of the kingdom. He adds, that if perpetual leases were granted, the rent might be tripled, and yet the farmers become rich, while the homicides which were caused by the forcible removal of tenants would be avoided; for it appears that the expelled tenant, like the Irish peasant of the present day, not unfrequently took vengeance on his successor for the loss of his farm. Muir also censures the farmers for their contempt of manufactures and of the inhabitants of the towns, whom they regarded as effeminate; and he adds, that they neglected their own proper business, and left the agricultural operations to their servants, while they rode in the trains of their lords. This, however, may have been more from necessity than choice, in order to retain possession of their farms. He is equally severe in his censures upon the nobles, for their perpetual feuds with their neighbours, and their total neglect of the education of their sons. The possessions of the Highlanders, he says, consisted almost entirely of horses and cattle. Sometimes two or three hundred horses, wild and unbroken, were brought by one Highlander to Perth or Dundee, and sold for two francs each; but others, who possessed no property of their own, lived by hunting, or followed their chiefs in their constant expeditions and conflicts. Their dress consisted of the trows, reaching only to the middle of the leg, a mantle, and a shirt stained with saffron; they were armed with bows and arrows, a broadsword, a small halbert, and a dagger. The chiefs wore coats of mail formed of iron rings, but the defensive armour of their vassals consisted only of jackets made of quilted linen, steeped in melted wax or pitch, and covered with deerskin.

On the death of James V., a clergyman named John Eldar, who, as he informs us himself, was a native of Caithness, and had studied for twelve years in the three southern universities, retired into England, and presented to Henry a project of union between the two kingdoms, which contains some curious notices of the manners of the Highlanders at this period. He thus explains the reason why they were called by the Lowlanders 'Redshanks,' and by the English 'Rough-footed Scots.' "Please it your Majesty to understand that we of all people can tolerate, suffer, and away best with cold: for both summer and winter, (except when the frost is most vehement,) going always bare-legged and bare-footed, our delight and pleasure is not only in hunting of red-deer, wolves, foxes, and graies, whereof we abound and have great plenty; but also in running, leaping, swimming, shooting, and throwing of darts. Therefore, in so much as we use, and delight, so to go always, the tender, delicate gentlemen of Scotland call us Redshanks." "And again in winter, when the frost is most vehement (as I have said), which we cannot suffer bare-footed so well as snow, which can never hurt us when it comes to our girdles, we go a hunting, and after that we have slain red-deer, we flay off the skin by and by, and setting of our bare foot on the inside thereof, for want of cunning shoemakers, by your Grace's pardon, we play the cobblers, compassing and measuring so much thereof, as shall reach up to our ancles: pricking the upper part thereof with holes, that the water may repass where it enters, and stretching it up with a strong thong of the same, above our said ancles. So and please your noble grace, we make our shoes. Therefore, we using such manner of shoes, the rough hairy side outward, in your Grace's dominion of England, we be called Rough-footed Scots."*

A graphic and very interesting description of the manners and occupations of Scottish pastoral life at this period is given by the author of the 'Complaint of Scotland.' The shepherds are represented as wearing hoods which covered their heads and shoulders, and conveniently admitted the additional envelope of the plaid. They amuse themselves with the buckhorn and corn pipe, while their flocks graze along the 'banks and braes,' and dry hills. About breakfast-time they are joined by their wives and daughters, who bring their food and prepare them a seat by spreading the soft, yellow moss of a lea ridge, with rushes, sedges, and meadow-wort, or queen of the meadow. The food of which they partake consists principally of various preparations of milk, all of them still well known in Scotland. 'They made great cheer of everie sort of milk, baith of cow milk and ewe milk, sweet milk and sour milk, curds and whey, sour-kitts, † fresh butter and salt butter, reyme, ‡ flot-whey, § green cheese and kirn milk. || They had na bread but rye cakes and fustean ¶ scones, made of flour.' Every shepherd is represented as carrying a spoon in the 'lug (ear) of his bonnet'—an extremely characteristic circumstance, for even down to a very recent period not only shepherds, but reapers and peat diggers, frequently provided themselves with spoons, which they carried about with them in the manner described. On the conclusion of their simple meal, the shepherds amused each other by relating in turn tales or stories in prose and verse, and their wives 'sang sweet melodious songs.' The entertainment at length terminated in a general dance to the music of eight different kinds of instruments; after which the shepherds collected their flocks and drove them tumultuously to the folds. This simple representation is accurately copied from nature, and Dr. Leyden says the original might still be seen in his day in some of the wild pastoral districts of Scotland. As the flocks of sheep after grazing some hours are always disposed to rest in the sunny days of summer, basking themselves on some dry acclivity, a concourse of shepherds for a social meal enlivened with songs and stories, and occasionally diversified by a dance, was by no means an uncommon incident.*

At this period the first notice occurs in Scottish history of that singular race—the gipsies. Under the date of the 22nd of April, 1505, we find the following entry in the books of the High Treasurer:—
First appearance of the gipsies in Scotland.
'Item, to the Egyptians, by the king's command, seven pounds.' It appears that after this wandering race had sojourned for some months in Scotland under a leader named Anthony Gavino, who assumed the style of 'Lord of Little Egypt,' they determined to pass over to Denmark, and that they succeeded by some means or other in inducing the Scottish king, James IV., to address to his uncle, the king of Denmark, the following curious letter, which was found by Pinkerton in the manuscripts of the royal library, and published by him in his Appendix, vol. ii. No. 4:—

'Most Illustrious Prince, — Anthony Gavino, Earl of Little Egypt, along with his company, an afflicted and miserable race of men, in the progress of his peregrination round the Christian world, undertaken, as he affirms, by order of the Pope, hath at length reached the borders of our kingdom, and entreated that, out of our royal humanity, he might be permitted, with his goods, chattels, and company, to travel through our territories, where he may find some refuge for his helpless fortunes, and miserable subjects. You may believe that a request of this kind, proceeding from the unfortunate, could not be refused; and accordingly, after having lived here for several months, comporting himself, as I am informed, after a con-scientific and catholic fashion, he is now preparing, my excellent king and uncle, to pass over to Denmark. Before crossing the sea, however, he hath requested our letters, by which your highness might not only be informed of the truth of these particulars, but might also be moved to extend your kindness and munificence towards relieving the calamities of this people. Yet as the kingdom of your highness is nearer to Egypt than our dominions, and as there must consequently be a greater resort of these people within your territories than to these our realms, it follows that the fate, manners, and extraction of these Egyptian wanderers must be more familiar to your highness than to ourselves. Farewell, most illustrious prince.'

Thirty-four years later, (Feb. 15, 1540,) a singular document, called a 'writ of privy seal,' was granted by James V. This writ enjoins all sheriffs and magistrates to support the authority of John Faa, in execution of justice upon his company and folks conform to the laws of Egypt, and more particularly they are directed to assist in apprehending 'Sebastian Lalowe, Egyptian, one of the said John's company, with his eleven complices and partakers,' who have rebelled against him, and 'removed out of his company, and taken frae him divers sums of money, jewels, claiths, and other goods, to the quantity of ane great sum of money, and on nac wise will pass hamo with him; howbeit, he has bidden and remained of lang time upon them (waited for them long), and is bounden and obliged to bring hame with him all them of his company that are alive, and ane testimonial of them that are dead; the non-fulfilment of which obligation, he pretends, will subject him to 'heavy damage and skaith (hurt) and great peril of loss of his heritage.' A special injunction is then given to all magistrates, to lend John Faa their prison, stocks, and fetters, and whatever may be necessary for reducing his refractory subjects to order; and masters of vessels and mariners are charged to receive John Faa and his company, when they shall be ready to go 'furth of the realm to the parts beyond the sea.' It appears from this curious edict, that the 'Lord and Earl of Little Egypt' had succeeded in completely imposing upon the government, by this story about his 'band' and 'heritage,' and had so adroitly managed matters as to obtain from the authorities not only toleration, but a recognition of his jurisdiction within his own band, 'according to the laws of Egypt.' In the following year, however, the Lords of Council seem to have discovered the deception that had been practised upon them, and revoked the letters and privileges formerly granted to John Faa and his followers, and proceeded forthwith to pass sentence of banishment upon the whole race. In spite of this peremptory injunction, the gipsies appear to have pursued their trade of tinkering and fortune-telling in Scotland with impunity, for the next quarter of a century; till, at length, both their numbers and their crimes increased to such a degree during the 'troublous times' of Queen Mary, that in 1570 it was found necessary to adopt vigorous measures for their repression, and a statute was enacted for the 'punishment of the strang and idle beggars,' in which 'bards, minstrels, and vagabond scholars,' are conjoined in ignominious fellowship with 'the idle people calling themselves Egyptians,' and it is provided that, being apprehended they shall be put in the king's ward and irons, sae lang as they have ony goods of their own to live on, and when they have not whereupon to live of their own, that their ears be nailed to the tron or to another tree, and their ears cuttit off, and banished the country, and if thereafter they be found again, that they be hanged.'

Statutes enacted for the suppression of the gipsies.

This stringent statute, though repeatedly renewed and strengthened with additional clauses, seems to have utterly failed in restraining the depredations of these vagrants; and in 1603, a proclamation was issued, banishing the whole race out of Scotland for ever, under the severest penalties. This, and various other sanguinary edicts which followed, were put into execution without mercy against this unhappy race, and the records of the Scottish criminal courts make mention of great numbers of 'Egyptians,' both men and women, who were hanged and drowned in the most summary manner. Notwithstanding these severities, the gipsies prospered amid the intestine feuds by which the country was torn asunder, and received large accessions from among those whom famine, oppression, or civil broils, had deprived of the ordinary means of subsistence. In the progress of time, however, as the power of the laws and the national prosperity of the country increased, the gipsy tribes were gradually reduced in numbers, and many were entirely rooted out. The comparatively small number of these vagrants who now remain in Scotland have for the most part taken up their residence in the border counties, principally in the village of Yetholm, situated among the Cheviot hills.

The burghs of Scotland seem to have made considerable progress during this period in wealth and refinement, and the statuto book contains numerous enactments for the regulation of their manufactures and trade. In 1491 it was ordained, "that the common good, meaning the profits and revenues of all the royal burghs within the realm, should be so regulated as to promote the prosperity of the town, by being spent according to the advice of the council of the burgh, upon things necessary for its security and increase, whilst the burgh rents, such as lands, fishings, mills, and farms, were not to be disposed of except upon a three years' lease."* Two years later an enactment was passed which evinced for the first time some conception of the true principles of commercial legislation. The deacons of particular trades were it seems in the habit of 'imposing a taxation penny upon men of the same craft coming to market or the Mondays, which necessarily enhanced the price of the articles to the consumer. This tax was commanded to be discontinued, so that the craftsmen, without interference upon the part of the deacons of the burghs, might be at liberty to sell their commodities at the usual prices. The office of the deacons was at the same time abolished for a year to come, and their authority was restricted to the mere examination of the work executed by the artisans of the same trades. It was alleged as a reason for this step, that the authority of the deacons and the bylaws which they enacted, caused great trouble in the burghs, by increasing the prices of labour, and encouraging combinations among the workmen. It was declared accordingly that all makers and users of these private acts and constitutions were to be prosecuted as oppressors of the king's lieges. It was at the same time enacted, that the tax or 'multure' which had hitherto been levied upon the flour brought into the port of Leith, or offered for sale in the various markets throughout the country,* should be abolished; and it was declared, that for the future all flour should be permitted to be brought to market and sold without payment of any new taxation; and that all manner of persons should be free to buy and sell their victual throughout the land all the days of the week, as well as on the market days.† The same liberality, however, was not shown in regard to the sale of other articles, for a few years later it was ordained that none except freemen of burghs should be permitted to trade or to sell wine, wax, silk, spices, stuffs, or staple goods.

It was enjoined by the parliament of 1503, that the magistrates of all burghs should be annually changed, and that resident merchants should alone be appointed to the office of the magistracy. It appears, however, that this, like many other judicious enactments of the legislature, remained a dead letter, and that a practice had crept in of electing to the office of the magistracy the neighbouring barons, who, under colour of protecting the burghs, domineered over the industrious citizens, and wasted their substance. To remedy this grievance it was enacted in 1535, that the magistrates should hereafter be chosen exclusively from among the merchants and the honest and substantial burgesses; and that their accounts should be annually produced at the exchequer after a public notice of fifteen days, that all the inhabitants might have an opportunity of examining them.‡

Few of the incorporations of trades in the Scottish burghs are of more ancient date than the close of the fifteenth century. The fraternity of the carpenters, masons, and cordiners, appears to have originated about 1475, the weavers in 1476, the butchers about 1488, the hammermen in 1496, the waukers, or fullers, in 1500, the corporation of the surgeons and barbers appears in 1505, the bakers in 1522, the bonnet makers in 1530, the goldsmiths in 1581, and the skinners in 1580. The deed of incorporation of the hammermen of Edinburgh (12th April, 1496), granted by the provost and magistrates at the royal command, is a curious specimen of the municipal regulations of the period. It includes blacksmiths, goldsmiths, lorimers, or bit and spur-makers, saddlers, cutlers, buckle-makers, armourers, and pewterers; prohibits interlopers, and allows none to open shops within the burghs except freemen after they have been examined by three masters of the craft, and have paid forty shillings for the service and ornaments of St. Eloi's altar; regulates the admission of apprentices; appoints two searchers to examine all the work every Saturday afternoon; authorizes meetings to deliberate on any infringement of the rules, and to report to the magistrates. The penalty for a breach of the regulations was eight shillings for the use of the altar, where divine service was to be performed daily by the chaplain of the corporation.*

In the mistaken spirit which characterized the commercial legislation of the age, repeated, but evidently unsuccessful attempts ^{Attempts to regulate late prices and wages.} continued to be made to fix the prices of the various kinds of manufactured articles and the wages of the artificers. The magistrates of the burghs were at first empowered to regulate these matters, but their efforts having failed, and complaints continuing to be made respecting the extortions of the cordiners, smiths, bakers, brewers, and other craftsmen, their prices were referred to a committee of the lords, and maltmen were forbidden to charge more than two shillings of profit on each boll of barley. To prevent forestalling, it was ordained by the parliament of 1541 that no fish should be sold in the markets to retailers, except between the hours of eleven and two, and that the price should be regulated by the magistrates. Permission was at the same time given to all the lieges to sell bread and flesh in the capital on three market days in the week, on account of the great influx of natives and strangers.

If we may believe the poet Dunbar, other important measures were imperatively required at this period to purify the streets of Edinburgh, and to render the city fit for the reception of strangers. In a satirical poem entitled an 'Address to the Merchants of Edinburgh,' he gives a most graphic, though probably somewhat highly coloured picture of the Scottish capital at this period. "The principal streets crowded with stalls—the confined state of the different markets—the noise and cries of the fishermen and of other persons retailing their wares round the cross—the booths of traders crowded together 'like a honey-comb,' near the church of St. Giles, which was then, and continued till within a very recent period, to be disfigured with mean and paltry buildings stuck round the buttresses of the church—the outer stairs of the houses projecting into the streets—the swarm of beggars—the common minstrels, whose skill was confined to one or two hackneyed tunes—all form together the subject of a highly graphic and interesting delineation, which is the more curious as we have no other description of so early a date of ‘mine own romantic town.’” There is reason to believe that the satire of Dunbar was by no means inapplicable at a comparatively recent date. ‘Those who remember the High-street and Luekenbooths,’ says Mr. Laing, ‘previous to the first alterations which took place in the Parliament-square, and the neighbourhood of St. Giles’s Cathedral, and before the removal of the Tolbooth, the Krames, and other adjacent buildings, will be fully sensible of the correctness of the poet’s description.’*

¶ The cross of Edinburgh was an ancient and curious structure. The lower part was an octagonal tower, sixteen feet in diameter, and about fifteen feet high. At each angle there was a pillar, and between them an arch, of the Grecian shape. Above these was a projecting battlement, with a turret at each corner, and medallions, of rude but curious workmanship, between them. Above this rose the proper cross, a column of one stone, upwards of twenty feet high, surmounted with a unicorn. This pillar is preserved in the grounds of the property of Drum, near Edinburgh. The cross was celebrated as the spot from which was heard the singular summons of Ptolecock, before the battle of Flodden, which forms so striking an incident in Sir Walter Scott’s Marmion. The magistrates of Edinburgh, in 1766, with the consent of the Lords of Session (proh pudor!) destroyed this curious monument, under a wanton pretext that it encumbered the street.

‘But now is razed that monument,

Heavy complaints were made respecting the frauds practised by merchants and tradesmen. Drapers were accused of drawing or extending their cloth, and thereby weakening it, in order to increase the measure. Dyers were charged with using perishable colours, and goldsmiths with mixing alloy with their gold and silver; and in 1490 a statute was enacted for the purpose of preventing these impositions. The fraudulent arts and extortions of the craftsmen were favourite topics with the satirists of the day; and Lindsay takes special notice of them in his 'Satire of the Three Estates.' Deceit, in his last dying speech and confession, speaks of the merchants whom he had learned 'mony a wile' to beguile country wives upon a market-day.

'And gar them trow your stuff was gude,
When it was rotten, by the rude,*
And swear it was nocht sa.'

He learned them, he says, to ban, and swear what their goods cost in France, although not one word was true. He taught them many wiles, to mix the new wine and the old; to buy goods cheap, and to sell right dear; to mix rye meal among the soap, and saffron with the olive oil; to exact usurious interest as rigidly as the vear does the best cow of his parishioner, and the landlords their double mail; to use an ell wand (ell measure) too short, and a pound weight which wanted three ounces. Falsehood, also, before he is hanged, makes great lamentation for the craftsmen, who without him, he says, will all die of hunger.

Especially he leaves his 'broad black malisoun' or malediction to the brewers of Cupar, who think no shame to brew their ale of 'much water and little malt' against the market-day, and to the bakers who mix fine flour with 'dust, and bran, and bear barley) meal.' He then bids adieu to the 'maister vrichts and maissouns,' who need to learn few lessons from him, as they know his craft by heart; to

Fine ducat gold, with hard gaddings,†
Like as I learned you last!'

In 1504 it was ordained that markets and fairs were not to be held on holidays, or at any time in churehes or church-yards; from which we may infer that the merriment on these occasions was not always kept within the bounds of moderation. It was found necessary to re-enact the statute of James I., which ordained that in all 'burrow touns and throughfares there should be hostelries having stables and chalmers, and bread and ale, and all other food as well to horse as man, for reasonable price; and to enjoin the barons and magistrates of burghs to see that the innkeepers sold flesh, fish, bread, and ale, at the rates usual in such houses, and had proper stabling, racks, inangers, eorn, hay, and straw. If Simon Lauder, the hosteler spoken of in the tale of the Friars of Berwick, may be regarded as a fair specimen of his class, it would seem that legislative enactments were not required to ensure attention to the wants of travellers. Simon's house had a 'but and a ben,' with sleeping-rooms and other conveniences. His kneading trough held a boll of meal, conveying a good idea of the extent of his business. Two mendicant friars who claim the hospitality of his wife, are treated with bread and cheese and ale. Fat capons and rabbits were prepared for the prior, who brought with him a pair of partridges, a wicker basket filled with the finest wheaten bread, and two bottles of Gaseon wine; while Simon himself was contented with cold meat, a cow's heel, and a sheep's head, a favourite dish among the Scotch. The table was covered with a costly green cloth, above which the napery, or table-cloth, was spread; and Simon's wife was attired in a kirtle of fine red cloth, a white kerchief on her head, a belt of silk adorned with silver, from which hung an embroidered purse and her keys, and she wore two rings on each finger.

The Netherlands continued to be the chief seat of the foreign trade of Scotland; and we now find a conservator appointed, who, with the assistance of a council of six of the most able merchants, was to decide all disputes among Scottish merchants abroad. He was commanded to visit Scotland once every year, that he might be ready to answer any charges that might be made against him. The mistaken policy of the age caused the trade and commerce of the country still to be seriously impeded and fettered by legislative interference. In the parliament held in October, 1488, it was ordained that all ships, home or foreign, should arrive only at the free burghs, such as Dunbarton, Irvine, Wigton, Kirkcubright, Renfrew, and others. That no foreigner should buy fish, except salted and barrelled, nor any other merchandize except in free burghs, paying their duties and customs. All commercial transactions at the Isle of Lewis were specially prohibited; and foreigners were forbidden to freight Scottish vessels, or Scotchmen to freight foreign ships. It is supposed that these injudicious and unreasonable restrictions were intended to prevent contraband trade on the western coast of Scotland. The prohibition of navigation between All Saints Day and Candlemas was renewed; and in 1535 it was ordered that ships should be freighted to Flanders only twice a year, to the Easter market, and to that which was held on the third of May. The exportation of tallow was strictly forbidden, as the realm only furnished a sufficient quantity for home consumption.

The numerous regulations which relate to shipping and foreign commerce evince that the attention of the Scottish legislature at this period was particularly directed to maritime affairs. Reference has already been made to the enactment which ordained that ships and fishing boats of not less than twenty tons should be built and equipped with their appropriate nets and tackling by all the burghs and sea-coast towns.* The most energetic measures were adopted by James IV. for the establishment of a royal navy;† and from the success which Sir Andrew Wood, the two Bartons, and other experienced Scottish mariners met with in several encounters with the English and the Portuguese, it may be inferred that in the size and construction of their vessels, as well as in their seamanship and the skill and valour of their men, they were not inferior to other European nations. In 1512 the Scottish navy, which consisted of no fewer than forty-six ships of war, contained four of more than three hundred tons burden, and two of one hundred tons. The Lion, the ship of the celebrated Andrew Barton, which was captured by Lord Thomas and Sir Edward Howard, in 1511, became the second man of war in the English navy, being inferior only to the Great Harry, built in 1504; and the Great Michael, which was constructed by James IV. in 1509, was the largest ship of war then known in the world.‡ Some of the merchant vessels also appear to have been of considerable size. In 1542 redress was demanded from the English for a ship belonging to Aberdeen, laden with fish, cloth, and wool, and worth six hundred pounds Scottish money. Two kinds of galleys were in use at this period, the one of which was only rowed with oars; the other, which was frequently denominated a galenasse, was much broader as well as larger than the galley, and was propelled both by sails and oars. Some of these vessels had triple banks of oars raised over each other, and were capable of containing sixty men in iron armour, besides the sailors who managed the vessel, and a hundred and four rowers. Besides guns on each side of the deck interspersed between the banks of oars, they had both artillery and small arms planted on the fore-castle and stern.

In the 'Complaint of Scotland,' there is a sea scene which gives both a curious illustration of ancient naval tactics, and an enumeration of the different kinds of ordnance, engines, and weapons employed in a sea fight at that early period. The principal object in manœuvring was to attain the windward of the foe, when those who manned the tops sprinkled powdered quicklime with great effect in the faces of their enemies, and attempted to set fire to the rigging by different kinds of combustibles.* Among the artillery employed by the Scotch at this time, mention is made of culverins,† falcons,‡ sakers,§ half falcons and half sakers, slangs,|| half slangs, and quarter slangs, head sticks, muredsars,¶ pasvolans, bersis,†† doggs,‡‡ double bersis, and hagbuts.§§ Pitscottie informs us that the artillery employed by James V. against Tantallon consisted of 'two great guns—thrown-mouthed Mow, and her marrow (companion), with two great boteards, and two moyans, two double falcons, and two quarter falcons.' According to the same author, 'Crooked Mow' and 'Deaf Meg' were employed against the castle of St. Andrews, after the murder of Cardinal Beaton. The names of the different kinds of ordnance enumerated are derived from the French and Flemish languages. So late as the reigns of Henry VII. and VIII., Flemish gunners were retained in England for the purpose of introducing the art of founding of cannon; but the Scots seem to have derived their knowledge of the art from the instructions of French artificers. Robert Borthwick, master-gunner to James IV., was probably the first Scottish founder of cannon, and he had a French assistant named Percs Rowan, who was appointed in 1532 principal master-maker and melter of 'our sovereign lord's guns and artailzianie during life. The celebrated train of artillery called the 'Seven Sisters,' which were cast by Borthwick were captured by the English at Flodden; and the excellence of their workmanship seems to have excited great admiration in the victors, who boasted that they were longer, larger, and more beautiful than any in the arsenal of their own king. James V. appears to have emulated his father in his desire to improve this arm of war; and in the parliament of 1540 it was ordained that merchants trading with foreign countries should import with every cargo at least two hagbuts, or metal to make them, together with powder and 'calms,' for the furnishing of the same. In the same parliament it was enacted, that every landed proprietor should furnish himself with a 'hagbut of founde,' called a 'hagbut of erochert,' with their calms, bullets, and pellocks of lead or iron, and a proper quantity of powder for every hundred pounds of lead. The owner of a hundred-mark land was to have two culverens, while the possessor of a forty-mark land was enjoined to provide one culveren, with calms, lead, and powder, and trestles, to be ready at all times for firing the hagbuts. The act extended not only to lands of regality, but to the clergy and to ladies; and directed that the artillery which they were commanded to provide should remain at their castles, abbeys, or mansions, to be kept in due order by them and their successors, for the defence of the realm.

For a considerable time after the invention of firearms, they were only partially adopted, and the crossbow and the longbow, and the ancient battering engines, continued to be employed, along with the different kinds of artillery. Thus, in the 'Complaint of Scotland,' the captain before attacking the enemy's vessel commands the soldiers to make ready their crossbows and longbows, firespears* and hail shot, and the gunners to stand by their guns; and the celebrated Sir Andrew Wood, in his address to his men, before his engagement with Stephen Bull, says, "Set yourselves in order everie man to his awn room; let the gunners charge their artillyiarie, and the crossbows make them readie, with the lyme pottis and fire-ballis in our tops; and let us keep our overlofts weil with two handit swords, and every gude fellow remember the weil of his country; and will God, for my part I shall shaw good example."

The defence of the country still continued to occupy a considerable share of the attention of the legislature. In 1491 a statute which had been repeatedly passed by the parliament was re-enacted, enjoining 'weaponshawings,' to be held four times

Weapons and armour. in the year, for the praeitice of warlike exercises. It was ordained that every landowner worth ten pounds a year in land, should provide himself with a basnett sallat, (a helmet without a crest,) white hat, gorget, peane, and greaves, with a sword, spear, and dagger. Those of smaller incomes were to be armed according to their station. Yeomen and burgesses were enjoined to arm themselves either with bows and arrows or an axe, and with a sword, buckler, dagger, and spear; and for defensive armour they were to wear, according to their station, white armour, brigantines or jacks, with splents and gauntlets of plate armour. Foot-ball and golf were again prohibited, in order that the people might devote more of their time to the practice of archery. Similar injunctions were issued in 1540, for the observance of the stated military musters, and the arming of all classes of the community. The nobles and barons were directed to arm themselves in white harness, light or heavy according to their pleasure, and with the weapons becoming their rank; whilst all persons whose property was below a hundred pounds of yearly rent, were to have a jack, or a halkrick (a corslet), or brigantine, and gloves of plate, with peane and gorget; no weapons were admitted by the muster officer except spears, pikes of six ells length, Leith axes, haberds, hand-bows and arrows, cross-bows, culverins, and two-handed swords. It was at the same time decreed, that in consequence of the damage done to the grounds of the poor by the multitude of horsemen advancing to the army, and the impediments they caused in battle, 'where all must fight on foot,' the yeomen who brought horses with them should only use them for carriages or baggago waggons, and that none should be permitted to be mounted in the host, except earls, barons, and great landed proprietors.*

The manners of the Scottish court at this period were characterized by rude magnificence, but had no pretensions either to refinement or delicacy. In 1503, that alliance Manners of the period. was formed between James IV. and the Princess Margaret of England, which, one hundred years after, united the sovereignty of the two countries. If we may judge from the entries respecting the preparations for this ceremony, which occupy forty leaves of the 'Treasurer's Accounts,' the marriage must have been celebrated with remarkable pomp and magnificence. No less a sum than £1045 5s. 9d. Flemish money was spent in the purchase of silver plate, in Flanders. Among many other entries relative to the repairing of the regalia and a new crown to the queen, on the 16th of July, 1503, there was given 'to Matho Auchlek, goldsmith, that wantit of the king's crowne five ridars (a denomination of weight), twa Scottish crowns, half ane angell, wey-and, ane unce,' equal to seven pounds, thirteen shillings, and four pence. Two Harry nobles were given to 'gilt the king's capture.' Preparations for the marriage of James IV. and the Princess Margaret. Amongst an immense variety of household furnishings, including the state bed, dresses, &c., occur the following. 'Item, boecht fra James Hommil, unce pece of Hercules, ane pece of Marcus Coriolanus, twa peeces of Susanna sewit to gidder, ane cover for ane bed of Susanna, ane pece of Salamone, coontening in the hale ten score elne, and boecht all for one hundred and sixty pounds.'

* The fire-spear is the lance à feu, a species of fusil nited with a spear, much used before the invention of the ayonet. One of the inventions for which a patent was granted, in 1625, to Drummond of Hawthornden, by Charles I. seems to have been an improvement of this weapon. See Glossary to the 'Complaint of Scotland,' p. 349.

Some curious particulars respecting the journey of the youthful princess from her father's dominions, and the mode of her reception in Scotland, are given in the narrative of John Young, Somerset herald,* who accompanied the royal cortège. The roads were so bad that in some places it was necessary to send bodies of workmen to 'make by force, ways for the queen's carriages.' 'Great numbers of people,' he says, 'assembled to see their queen, and lined the wayside where we passed. They brought with them plenty of drink, and served with it every one that wished for it, if so be that person was willing to pay for the same.' On approaching Dalkeith, where Margaret had her first meeting with the Scottish king, the queen and her attendants halted by the wayside, half-a-mile from the town, for the purpose of removing the travel-stains from their dress. The ladies equipped the princess in a new fresh dress, and 'every body likewise dressed and set themselves off to the best advantage, and then took their appointed places.'

On the night after her arrival at Dalkeith Castle, at that time the residence of the Earl of Morton, a fire broke out which entirely consumed the stables, and the queen's two white palfreys perished in the flames. One of these was so much beloved by Margaret that she spent the next morning in tears for its loss. James hastened to console her under the misfortune, and lost no time in seeking to repair it. Three days after (Aug. 6th) there is the following entry in the 'Treasurer's Accounts.' 'To John Auchlek for gilding of the Queen's bukills and bosses of the Queen's bridill and harnessing that was burnt in Dalkeith, four pounds two shillings; and on the 10th of August, the sum of fourteen shillings was paid 'to Maistr. James Henrissonnes man, of bridill silver of ane horse giften for the quene, for hir hors were brynt in Dalkeyth.' At the second interview between the king and the princess, which took place in Newbattle Abbey, the Somerset herald mentions that 'after some words rehearsed, the minstrels began to play a Case dance, which was danced by Queen Margaret and the Countess of Surrey. The minstrels then played a round, the which was danced by the Queen led by the Lord Gray, and they were followed by many lords, ladies, and gentlewomen. The King of Scotland then began to play on the claricords before his Queen: after that he played on the lute, which pleased her very much, and she had great pleasure to hear him. Sir Edward Stanley then sat down to the claricords, and played a ballad which he sang withal. The king commended it much, and called one of his gentlemen who could sing very well and made him sing with Sir Edward Stanley, and their voices accorded very well. Afterwards, Sir Edward sang some ballads, with two of his servants, and the King of Scotland gave him good thanks.' On the following Sunday, Aug. 6th, Margaret attended the private chapel of Newbattle, 'accompanied by her own English household and the lady of Newbattle. The sermon was preached by one of the Friars Observant. After mass the Queen was conveyed to her chamber, and during the dinner, trumpets and sackbuts blew. The minstrels of the queen's chamber began to play after dinner, and then danced the Queen, the Countess of Surrey, the Lady Lisle, and the daughter of the lady of Newbattle. The dance over, they passed the Sunday afternoon in games and in conversing.'

The next day was appointed for the queen's solemn entry into Edinburgh. She was met half way by James and his company. The king's steed was trapped with gold, and round its neck was a deep gold fringe; the saddle and harness were of gold, but the bridle and headgear of burnished silver.' On seeing the queen he made a very humble obeisance, and leaping down from his horse, he came and kissed her in her litter. Then mounting, 'without putting his foot in stirrup,' he rode by the side of the queen's litter, conversing with her and entertaining her.

'Before they entered Edinburgh, one of the king's gentlemen brought out a fair courser, trapped in cloth of gold, with crimson velvet interlaced with white and red; the king went to the horse, mounted him without touching the stirrup, in the presence of the whole company, then tried his paces—choosing to judge himself whether it were safe for his bride to ride on a pillion behind him, which was the mode in which he intended to enter the city. Likewise he caused one of his gentlemen to mount behind him, as a lady would ride, to see whether the courser would bear double or not.' Having decided that it was not proper to trust the safety of his bride to his favourite charger, 'he dismounted from him, and condescended to ride on the queen's gentle palfrey. He mounted, and the queen was placed on a pillion behind him,' in which 'honest and antique fashion the gallant monarch rode through the good town to his palace, amid the acclamations of his subjects.' The way was enlivened by feats of horsemanship, the hunting of a tame deer, and the performance of a pageant made up of 'drama, joust, and tourney.' As the royal cortège was entering the city 'the grey friars came in procession with the cross and some relics, which were presented by their warden for the king to kiss. But he would not, until the queen had kissed them, and his grace would still ride with his head uncovered, out of respect to her. Right across the entry of Edinburgh was a gate with two tourelles and a window in the midst. In the tourelles were at their windows vested angels, singing joyously for the coming of so noble a lady; and at the middle window was another angel, who flew down and presented the keys of the town to Queen Margaret. Then came in procession the collego of the parish of St. Giles, richly vested, and they brought the relic of the arm of their saint, which was presented to the king to kiss.

* Leland's Collectanea, vol. iv. pp. 287—300. Strickland's Lives of the Queens of Scotland, vol. i. pp. 27—66.

‘In the midst of Edinburgh was a cross, and hard by a fountain casting forth wine; and each one drank that would. Nigh to the cross a scaffold, where was represented Paris and the three goddesses, with Mercury, who gave Paris the apple of gold.’ With that strange and incongruous mixture of heathen mythology and Christian truth, which was so characteristic of the age, upon the same scaffold were represented the ‘Salutation of Gabriel to the Virgin;’ the ‘Marriage of the Virgin to Joseph;’ and a pageant with the ‘Four Virtues;’ likewise were stationed war-tablets which played merrily. There were devices of a licorne (unicorn) and a greyhound, being ‘the Stuart and Tudor beasts,’ and wreaths of cardons, or thistles, and red roses interlaced, formed the borders.

‘Then the noble company all passed out of the town (down the Canongate), and approached to the church of the Holy Cross (Holyrood), where they were met by the Archbishop of St. Andrews, brother to the king, with his cross borne before him, accompanied by the Bishops of Aberdeen, Orkney, Caithness, Ross, Dunblane, and Dunkeld, together with many abbots, all in their pontificals, preceded by their crosses.’ After mass, the queen was conducted by the king to the great chamber of Holyrood, where the ladies of the principal nobles and knights were presented to her. She saluted each of them in turn, and then ‘the king kissed her for her labour; and so took her by the waist again with lowly courtesy, his bonnet in his hand, and brought her to her second or inner chamber, and there saluted her once more, taking his leave right humbly.’ ‘The town of Edinburgh was all that day hung with tapestry; the houses and windows were full of lords, ladies, and gentlemen; and in the streets so great a multitude of people, that it was a fair thing to see. The people were very glad of the coming of their queen, therefore all the bells of Edinburgh town rang for mirth.’

Next day, August 8th, the marriage ceremony was performed. The Somerset herald dwells with peculiar and characteristic complacency on the magnificent dresses of the royal pair, and their attendant lords and ladies. The bride was arrayed in a rich robe of white and gold damask, bordered with crimson velvet, and lined with white sarcenet. She wore a magnificent crown, a collar of pearls and precious stones, and a rich coif; her hair was hanging down the whole length of her body. The king wore ‘a robe of white damask, figured with gold, a jacket with slashes of crimson satin, and the border of black velvet, a waistcoat of cloth of gold, and a pair of scarlet hose. His shirt was brodered with gold thread, his bonnet black velvet, looped up with a rich balass-ruby, and his sword was girt about him.’ The marriage ceremony was performed by the Archbishops of St. Andrews and York. At the Gospel the newly-married pair ‘made their offerings.’ We learn from the ‘Treasurer’s accounts’ that the king ‘laid on the buke six demys, five shillings white silver;’ and that there was given him ‘to put in his caudell, and the quene’s caudell, two French crowns.’ At the dinner which followed, the queen was served at the first course with a wild boar’s head, then with a fair piece of brawn, and in the third place with a gambon (ham), which was followed by divers other dishes to the number of twelve, all in fair and rich vessels. The king was served in gilt vessels as the queen was. The Archbishops of St. Andrews and York dined with him. The state-chamber was hung with red and blue, and ‘in it was a ceil of state of cloth of gold, but the king was not under it that same day. There was also in the same chamber a rich state-bed,* and a rich dresser set out after the manner of the country.’ After dinner the minstrels played and sang the epithalamium, composed in honour of the nuptials.

When they had concluded, a hall was cleared for a dance. In the evening the king again went to church, and on his return sent his marriage robe as a perquisite to the English heralds and officers-of-arms. The queen’s robe, according to ancient custom, was sent as a fee to her husband’s heralds; but Margaret, like most ladies, had an affection for her wedding gown, and redeemed it for fifty marks.

On the 9th of August, a curious entry appears in the ‘Treasurer’s accounts,’ respecting the clipping of the king’s beard. In his description of the king’s first interview with his bride at Dalkeith, Young, the English herald, seems to have been struck with the length of James’s beard, and his young bride was probably a little annoyed at it, for on the day after the marriage we find that the gallant monarch employed the Countess of Surrey and her daughter Lady Grey to clip his beard—for which service, the Treasurer informs us, these noble tansors received—the former ‘fifteen ells of cloth of gold, at twenty-two pounds the ell; and the latter fifteen ells of damask gold, ilk ell twelve pounds.’ ‘This somewhat expensive frolic,’ says Mr. Chambers, ‘acquires a melancholy interest, from the reflection that only ten years after, the husband of the fair barber (who conducted the queen into Scotland), met and slew the king of Scots at Flodden.’

We are informed by Young that the marriage was celebrated with jousts and tournaments, and other chivalric exercises; and the Treasurer’s accounts contain numerous entries relating to the preparations for these amusements. August 21st we find that the worthy official ‘payit to Johne Mayne, bowar, for sixty justing speris at the marriage, ilk peece three shillings,’ nine pounds (Scots). ‘Item, for sic score speris for turnaying,’ eighteen pounds. ‘Item, ane blak burdowne spere,’ five shillings. ‘Item, to Robert Cutelar for 24 swordis, 41 lang and 12 short swordis, for turnaying, ilk peece ten shillings,’ forty pounds. Sums are paid for ‘spere hedus,’ and for virales and diemendis ‘for speris.’ ‘Sept. 19— to ane man to pas to Strivilin for bataile axes and swordis, and to cum again that nycht,’ nine shillings. 'Oct. 24—to the heraldis, for their compissioane of the eschet of the barres, when Christofers Tailyour fought,' six pounds, thirteen shillings and fourpence. 'Nov. 22—to Robert Cutelar, lings, eight pounds.' 'Item, to Moncur armorar crowns,* equal to three pounds ten shillings.

'Item, to John Mayne, bowar, for twenty-seven speris,' fifty-four shillings. 'Item, for three speris,' nine shillings.

There are some curious entries relating to the miscellaneous articles required for the same occasion. The 'carters of Leith,' a class of men still existing in an associated capacity, received six pounds twelve shillings for the use of twenty-two carts (six shillings each), to bring the queen's luggage to Edinburgh from Dalkeith. On the first of September the Treasurer 'payit to James Doig,† to cartaris and pynouris, for carrying of beddis-clothes and hingings (bed-clothes and hangings) fra the Castle to the Abbay and other places,' twenty-six shillings. 'Item, to the said James, to be laid doune for stray (straw) to beddis, and for strowing of the Abbay close with girse, (dried meadow hay,) the time of the marriage,' thirty-five shillings. 'Item, to the said James, he gairt at diverse tymes for forty-two turses (trusses) of bent, ilk turse three shillings,' six pounds six shillings. 'September 3rd. Item, for seven laid (loads) of bent,' twenty shillings.
In numerous other instances reference is made to the same custom of strewing the floors of the chambers with rushes. Under the date of Sept.
10th there is an interesting entry of twenty French crowns paid by the king's command, to the English painter who accompanied the marriage train, in charge of the portraits of the English king and his queen, the Prince of England, and Queen Margaret, presented by Henry to his son-in-law. It is probable that this artist remained in Scotland two months, following his profession; for, under date November 10th, 1533, occurs the entry of a propyne to 'Mynour ye Inglishe Payntour when he passit away,' one French crown.

The records of the Treasurer show that the bounty of the king had overflowed towards the musicians and other persons of the queen's train. On his wedding-day he presented to the heralds the large sum of forty French crowns. Two days later (August 10th), twelve pounds are paid for a present of 'Hollande claith giffen to the Archbishops of Zork.' On the 13th, eight English minstrels received by the king's command forty French crowns; and an equal sum is paid to the trumpets of England; to the queen's four minstrels who remained with her, seven pounds, and an equal sum 'to the English minstrel that passed away, and the king sent for him again;' to the three minstrels of Berwick, six pounds six shillings; to the 'five loud minstrels,' forty French crowns; to 'the Erle of Oxfordis twa menstrualys, five pounds twelve shillings. The 'bere ledair (bear-leader) of England' is honoured with eight crowns; 'the English spelair (climber) that playt

the supersalt,' receives eight crowns; 'the portair' eight 'to by him ane hors,' and 'the cofferair' gets 'eighty Scotch ridaris,' which were equal to ninety-two pounds. The 'cofferair' was no doubt an official connected with the 'Inglishe coffir,' which probably contained the first instalment of the queen's dower, consisting altogether of thirty thousand gold angels, payable in three equal portions. On the 12th of August four shillings are paid to six men that carried the coffer 'fra the Abbey to the Castell of Edinburgh,' and next day ten pounds are given for 'a eup of silver overgilt' to the cofferer. On the 11th of September 'the Italiene lass (girl) that dansit' received by the king's command the sum of thirty French crowns, together with five ells of blue damask, 'to be ane
gounne to hir, ilk elne' twenty-four shillings.
Bountas, a cornet-player, who played in Queen Margaret's chamber, was paid the sum of twenty-eight shillings; and shortly after, on the occasion of the queen's coronation, her 'loud minstrels' and her cornet-player got double fees, and Bountas was presented by the king with 'new quhisellis' (whistles). A company of English comedians, under the management of John English, regaled the court with a dramatic representation. 'After dinnar,' says 'Johne Youuge,' Somerset herald, 'a moralitie was played by the said Master Inglishe and his companions in the presence of the kyng and quene, and then daunces were daunced.'
The 'three gysaris that playit the play,' and who on the 13th of August received a gratuity of thirty French crowns, probably belonged to this company.

In the succeeding year the king undertook an expedition to the Borders, for the repression and punishment of the freebooters who infested that district. The accounts of the Lord Treasurer in reference to this affair, popularly termed the 'Raid of Eskdale,' east most interesting light both on the manners of the times, and the personal character of the Scottish monarch, who was fond of combining amusement with the weightier cares of government. They show that he 'was attended in his progress by his huntsmen, falconers, morris-dancers, and all the motley and various minions of his pleasures, as well as by his judges and ministers of the law; and whilst troops of the unfortunate marauders were seized and brought in irons to the encampment, executions and entertainments appear to have succeeded each other with extraordinary rapidity.' One of the first items of expense is the very characteristic entry of a sum for horses to carry James Mylson and Alex. Harper two of the king's minstrels into Eskdale, and for 'twa hides to be jacks' for other two of the same tuncful fraternity. James Hog, the 'Tale-Teller,' receives twenty-eight shillings to 'fee twa hors to take the king's harness' or armour into Eskdale. Then follow various sums for crossbows and bolts, five pair of spurs to the king, stirrup-irons, riding girths, horse-collars, &c., new 'leg-splentis' (greaves) to the king, 'twa gret bueklaris,' 'twa dosan' bows and as many bow-strings. Two shillings were given to the 'armoraris that brocht the king's leg-splentis, for drink-silver,' and four shillings to John Foreman for mending the king's leetdecamp.* On the king's arrival at Dumfries, forty-two shillings were disbursed on the 13th of August 'to menestrales to fee thaim horses to Eskdale, and syne again to Dumfriese.' Next day fourteen shillings were distributed among the town 'piparis;' on the 17th the same sum was paid 'to the man that hangit the thievis at the Hullirbus,' and eight pence 'for ane raip to hang thaim in.' Four days after, fourteen shillings were paid 'to the man that hangit the thieves in Canonby.' On the same evening the king was entertained by two English women who sang to him in his pavilion, and received a donation of twenty-eight shillings. Mention is also made of 'ane Englishman that gaif ane bow and arrowes to the king,' of another who 'brocht ane deir fra Lord Daere,' of 'ane gyde' who passed with Sir Thomas Alane 'to Edinburge, for wyne to the king in Eskdale,' of 'the prior of Carliles twa men,' who brought a present of malmsey wine to the king, of 'twa wyffis who brocht aill to the king fra Sir John Musgrave,' who all came in for a liberal share of the royal bounty. On the 23rd of August, James was at Lochmaben in company with Lord Daere, the English warden, who had received his master's instructions to meet the Scottish king, and afford him every assistance in the suppression of the Border thieves. James appears to have lost several sums at cards to the English baron. On the 31st of August, thirty pounds were paid to Sir Alexander Jardine and his men, for the capture of a notable thief named Gib Lindesay, and two of his accomplices. An entry, under the date of September 11th, of forty-two shillings 'to Johne Goldsmythe for tursing (packing and carrying) of the organ in Eskdale,' shows that the king in this expedition had 'not only his minstrels to cheer his hours of relaxation, but also musical instruments, and those not the most portable.' On the same day a second donation of twenty-eight shillings was given by the king to the pipers of Dumfries. On the 7th he paid fourteen shillings for 'ane Portugale skin to be halk ludis (hawk-hoods), and next day fourteen shillings were paid by the king's command to William Spicehouse in contentacioune of ane ring whilk

the king tuke fra him.' Numerous entries occur in these records which exhibit the character of James in a very favourable light, and afford unequivocal proofs of his generosity and sense of justice. Thus, for example, on the 14th of September, he caused ten shillings to be paid 'in Lochmaben to ane pair man that all the court tuke his hay fra him.' On the same day he gave a unicorn, or eight-and-twenty shillings, to 'ane Inglisman that was ship-broken.' On one occasion he bestowed two pounds fourteen shillings on 'puir wyffis of Ballincerefe that had thare gudes taken away by Johne Stewart,' and on the same day he gave eighteen shillings 'till other twa pair wyffis that the king spilt (spoiled) there corn.' In his journeys he seems to have been in the habit of giving small sums to 'puir wyffis be the gait' (by the way), and his return to his capital from this 'raid' was marked by his giving twelve pence on the 19th of September 'to ane pair wyfe on the muir of Edinburge.'

The accounts of the Lord High Treasurer, during the reign of James IV., afford a great deal of valuable and curious information respecting the favourite amusements of the king and nobles at this period.

'The king's fondness for games, glee, and merriment of every kind,' it has been justly said, 'is ludicrous; and, when we consider the many grave and valuable qualities which James undoubtedly possessed, presents a singular picture of human nature.' The chief out-of-door sports of the king seem to have been the tournament, hunting the deer, hawking, archery, 'the cache,' and playing at bowls. In the Treasurer's accounts, there are frequent payments for balls to the king to play at the 'cache,' and for money lost by him at the game. For example:— 'May 10, 1496, to the king in Strivilin, to play at the cache,' six pounds ten shillings. 'April 17th, 1508, for balls to the king, to play at the cache,' four shillings. Same day, 'to the king, whilk he tint (lost) at the cache,' fourteen shillings. April 19, the king 'playit at the cache with the Laird of Burley, and tint four pounds four shillings.' An entry on the 7th of June, 1496, shows the possibility of very deep play at this game:— 'To Wat of Lesley, that he wan at the cache fra the king,' twenty-three pounds eight shillings. The 'cache' was probably a similar game to that of 'cache,' or 'cage-ball,' which is still practised by boys in Scotland, and is played against a dead wall. Another is also made of 'the kites,' probably nine pins or skittles, the 'Irish gamyne,' the 'prop,' at which the king played in Strathbogy, losing four shillings and four pence, the 'lang bowlis,' with which his majesty amused himself at St. Andrews on the 28th of April, 1487, and the 'row bowlis,' which contributed to his royal diversion on the 20th of June, 1501, on which occasion Sir John Sinclair of Dryden, and the prothonotary, Andrew Forman, were his partners in the game.

An entry, on the 28th of December, 1501, affords one out of hundreds of similar instances of the king's urbanity:—'To play at the byllis (bowls) with Johne Anderson, that wantis feit and handis,' fourteen shillings. In spite of his detruncated condition, John seems to have been more than a match for his majesty. There are continual references throughout the Treasurer's accounts to archery, shooting at the butts, shooting with the crossbow and culveren, and playing at the golf and football. In all of these games the king appears to have been no mean proficient. Another favourite sport of James was the exhibition of his skill and strength in striking with the great sledge hammer used by smiths in their forge. Thus, when Sir Anthony d'Arzy came into Scotland from the French court, and distinguished himself at the tournament held at Stirling in 1506, we find on the 25th June this entry in the books of the High Treasurer:—'Item, to the smith, when the king and the French knyght strack at the steddye, thirteyn shillings.' One curious instance of James's love of practical jokes and vulgar merriment is to be met with under the 14th August, 1491:—'Item, to a wife at Bathgate-bog, that the king revit a rung fra (wrested a stick from), eighteen shillings. On the 2nd of May, 1504, there is a curious entry of twenty-eight shillings, paid to 'Dande Doule quhilk he wan fra the king on hors-ryning,' which, as Mr. Pitcairn remarks, is probably the earliest notice of horse-racing in Britain, and betting on the event of the race as an amusement.

The principal in-door amusements of the king and nobles were playing at chess tables, cards and dice, and listening to tale-tellers, minstrels, and players. The king seems almost invariably to have played for money, and his losses at cards were frequently very heavy. Thus, in 1488, we have—'Item, on Yule-day, for the king himself to play at the dice and cards,' twenty-eight pounds; 'Item, on St. John's-day, at even (only two days later), sent with Archie Dickson to the king, to play at the dice at Lithgow,' forty-two pounds. On the single night of Christmas, 1490, there are given to the king, at Melrose, to spend at cards, 'thirty-five unicornis, eleven French crowns, a ducat, a ridare, and a lew'—in all forty-two pounds. Throughout the whole of the winter period, indeed, there are entries almost every night for sums lost at the cards or the tables; for, as Mr. Chambers remarks, the king, with true royal feeling, seems to have thought it beneath him ever to win.

James was passionately fond of music, both vocal and instrumental, and appears to have been himself no mean proficient in that delightful art. As Mr. Tytler remarks, when the noted papal embassy arrived at his court, which brought him from his Holiness a splendid sword of justice still to be seen amongst the Scottish regalia, the first attitude in which we discover the king is 'listhening,' not to the ambassador, but to the 'Paip's ambassador's servant,' who was a celebrated singer.* In his frequent progresses through his kingdom, he was generally met at the gates of the town by maidens, who welcomed him with songs; and wherever he went, he appears to have sought and liberally rewarded those who could please him in his favourite art. Thus, in the Treasurer's accounts, as regularly as the king comes to Dumfries, 'a little crukit-backit vicar' makes his appearance, and this deformed vocalist figures from year to year as a recipient of the royal bounty.† James retained about his person a vast multitude of 'lutaris,' 'piparis,' 'fithelaris' (fiddlers), 'clarschaaris' (Highland harpers), 'tabrounaris,' 'trumpetaris,' 'schawmeris,' &c., to all whom frequent entries are made, both for ordinary pay and presents. Thus, on July 10, 1489, eight pounds eight shillings were paid 'to Inglis (English) pyparis that came to the castell, and playit to the king.' On the 26th of August, 1504, four French crowns were given 'to Cuddy the Inglis luter, to louse his cheyne of grotis, quhilk he tint at the cartes (to relieve his chain of groats, which he lost at cards). And on New Year's-day, 1506, the sum of forty-one pounds eleven shillings was paid 'to divers menstiales, schawmeris, trumpeteris, taubronaris, fithelaris, lutaris, clarschaaris and piperis,' extending to eighty-nine persons. Of 'menstiales' who combined the professions of music and poetry, James entertained no fewer than thirty-one at his own court; many of these appear to have been natives of England and the southern states of Europe. Thus, on the 21st of November, 1504, fourteen shillings were paid 'to one of the four Italiane minstrels, to by him ane hat, by the king's commands,' and, on February 15, 1512-13, twenty-five pounds five shillings were given 'to Guilyeame, organer, Frenchman, and his five complices, French menstialis.' One of the king's favourite amusements was listening to tale-tellers and the singers of songs and ballads.

Thus, in June, 1489, the accounts introduce us to 'Cunninghame the singer,' who receives at the king's commands a demy; that is, fourteen shillings. A few days later, we find an entry of ten pounds 'to Wilyeam Sangster, of Lithquo, for a sang-buke he brocht to the king.' 'On Monunda, the 2nd of January, 1491'—probably on the festival still observed in Scotland under the name of Handsel Monday,—three unicorns, equal to two pounds fourteen shillings, were paid 'to Sir Thomas Galbreth, Jok Goldsmyt, and Crawford, for the singing of a ballad to the king in the morning;' and, among frequent entries of the same kind, we find, 'May 23, 1496,' fourteen shillings paid 'to twa women, that sang to the king in Strivilin.' In the department of story-telling, we hear of 'Wallase that tells the geistis;' 'Widderspoon the Foular that tald tales and brocht foulis to the king,' of Watschod the tale-teller; of 'the twa filhilaris,' who 'sang' the ballad or romance of 'Greysteil to the king;' and of 'a puir man, who told tales' to his majesty of Scotland, and received for his recitations the reward of six shillings and eight-pence. Mention has already been made of the company of English comedians who entertained the court at the celebration of the nuptials of James IV. and the Princess Margaret; and we learn that on the 5th of Aug. 1488, five pounds were given at Linlithgow, to 'Patrick Johnson, and the players that playt to the king.' The same company played a twelve-month after at the same place for the entertainment of a Spanish embassy, and were rewarded with eight pounds eight shillings. We find in the

Dancers and 'gysaris,' accounts numerous references to 'gysaris,' 'dansaris and gysaris,' who seem to have entertained his majesty in all parts of the country, and were probably connected with the particular places where they exhibited. Thus entries are made of gratuities bestowed upon 'the gysaris of the toune of Edinburgh,' the 'dansaris and gysaris' at Lanark, and the 'dansaris and gysaris' at Arbroath. The 'dansaris' were no doubt morrice dancers, for there are an immense number of entries in the Treasurer's accounts regarding this pastime. Thus '1501-2, Feb. 8, To the men that brocht in the morrice dance, and to the menstrolles of Strivelin be the king's command,' forty-two shillings. '1503-4, Jan. 5, To Maister John (the French Leech, afterwards Abbot of Tunland), to buy bells for the morris danss,' twenty-eight shillings. 'Jan 6. To Colin Campbell and his marrowiss (companions) that brocht in the morris daunns, and for their expenses maid thairon, be the king's command,' twenty French crowns, equal to fourteen pounds Scots. On the following day there are entries of considerable sums for 'rede and blew taffeti,' to make 'six daunsing cotes in Maister John's dauns,' for 'blak gray to lyne the same,' for 'blew taffeti to the womane's gown in the said dance,' and for 'seven eln quhite to lyne the same,' for 'taffeti blew, rede, and variant, for the said dansaris hede gere.' On a subsequent occasion, the Treasurer paid for 'green sey to be dancing coats, doublets and hose, &c. to five boys, and a kirtle, &c. to a woman (Margaret Napcr), for dancing, and for stuff to be seven dancing coats and doublets to the squires, viz. Thomas Boswell and his companions.' Next day four pounds twelve shillings were paid to Thomas 'for thirty dosane bellis to the dansaris.' Margaret Napcr received for her services on this occasion the gift of 'four eln of scarlet at fifty shillings the eln, and five quarters wellus,' at two pounds fifteen shillings. On the 5th of Dec. 1512, nine pounds were paid to 'the servitouris of Monsur la Mote,' (the French ambassador who fell at Flodden,) that 'dansit ane morris to the king,' and on the 16th of the same month they received a further gratuity of five pounds eight shillings for dancing 'an uther morris to the king and quene.' 'Gysaris,' 'dansaris,' and 'playeris' appear to have been in some measure synonymous; as mention is made of 'gysaris that dansit to the king and quene,' of 'gysaris that playit the play,' of French minstrels 'that maid ane danss in the Abbay,' and of 'the Spanyeartis (Spaniards) that dansitt before the king on the cawsay of Edinburgh before the Thesauris (Treasurer's) lugeing,' on the 16th of Jan. 1491, and who received from his majesty a gratuity of thirty unicorns, equal to twenty-seven pounds.

In the family of every person of distinction at this period there was a jester Fools and jesters. maintained, generally a composition of knave and fool; and it appears from the Treasurer's Accounts that several 'fools' formed part of the establishment of James IV. Among these is one styled 'Jok Fule,' 'Daft Jok the Fule,' and 'John Wallass the Fule,' who attended the king on his visit to St. Andrews, in Oct. 1504, and died in the summer of 1508, as on June 19, the sum of sixteen shillings was paid 'for Jok Wallass tyrment.' Another of these jesters named John Bute received for his dress in Dec. 1506 'a doctor's gown of chamlot, lined with black grey and purfellt with skins, with a hoode, a doublet of fustian, hose, and a grey bonnet,' and at the same time 'Spark, Johu Butis man,' received a gown of russet, doublet of fustian, and hose of carsay. A third, named Thomas Nornee or Norny seems to have been a favourite attendant, and to have regularly accompanied the king on his journeys from one part of the country to another. There are various entries in the accounts for articles of dress to him, such as bonnets, shoes, a coat of yellow and black chamlot, a doublet of birge satin, a pair of carsay hose, red and yellow, &c. In May, 1505, three pounds ten shillings were given 'to the wif quhair Nornee lay sick in the Sennis,' and July 23, three pounds were paid for 'ane hors to Nornee.' Mention is also made of an English jester styled variously 'Jolly John the fule of Englande,' and 'Gentil John, the Englishe fule,' to whom numerous sums are given.

In the Treasurer's Accounts there are numerous entries of sums paid for the cloth- Blackamoors. ing and entertainment of a party of blackamoors who were maintained at the court of James IV. They were captured by one of the Bartons in a Portuguese ship, in which, among other curiosities, were found a musk cat, and a 'Portengale horse with a red tail.' Two of the Blackamoor girls were baptized by the names of Ellen and Margaret; and were educated at court, where they remained as attendants upon the queen. A tournament was held in 1506, in honour of one of these 'Moor lasses' in which the 'dark

* Thomas Boswell, who figures so conspicuously in the train devoted to the amusement of the Scottish monarch, was a cadet of the old house of Balmuto, in Efyfe, and was finally rewarded for his services by a grant of the estate of Auchinleck, in Ayrshire. He was an ancestor of the well-known biographer of Samuel Johnson.

ladye' was seated in great state in a triumphal chariot, and adjudged the prize to the victor. The object of this was not, as some may suppose, to ridicule the splendid solemnities of the jousts and tournaments of the day. The preparations for the ceremony were made with all gravity and solemnity; and articles of defiance were even sent to France, in which a Scottish champion, under the name of a wild or savage knight, challenged the chivalry of the French court to break a spear in honour of the noble damsel. Among other knights the gallant Sir Anthony D'Arse de la Bastie visited Scotland on this occasion, and appears to have gained great distinction. In the succeeding summer of 1507 the king instituted another gorgeous tournament in honour of the Moor. 'She again appeared in a triumphal chariot, and was arrayed in a robe of damask silk, powdered with gold spangles; whilst her two damsels were clothed in gowns of green Flanders taffeta.' On this occasion there was introduced a troop of wild men clothed in goat-skins and harts' horns, which, we learn from the Treasurer's books, were sent by Sir William Murray from Tullibardine, at the expense of six shillings.* It was probably on this occasion that Dunbar indited his lines on 'Ane Black-Mojir.'

'Lang have I sung of ladies white,
Now of ane black I will indite,
That landed forth from the last ships,
Whom fain I would describe perfyte,
My ladye with the meikle lips.

'How she is tute mow'd,§ like an ape,
And like a gangaral|| unto graip,
And how her short cat-nose up skips,
And how she shines like ony saip,—¶

'When she is clad in rich apparel,
She blinks as bright as ane tar-barrel;
When she was born, the sun thold clipse,••
The nycht be faine† fought in her quarrel—
My ladye with the meikle lips.'

Blackamoors, however, were not such a novelty at the Scottish court as might be supposed. In 1608 two Blackamoor Friars came to Scotland, and remained for a few months, James IV. having occasionally contributed to defray their expenses and to furnish 'the More Freris' with articles of dress. In the Treasurer's Accounts there occurs repeated mention of one of the king's minstrels, who is variously styled 'the More taubroner,' 'Peter the Moryen,' and 'Peter the More.' And the following entry in the same record shows that the queen also had a black maiden, who waited on her: 'Item, for three ells ½ French russet, to the queen's black maiden, £3 16s. 6d.'

In Dunbar's 'Remonstrance to the King,' we are presented with a remarkably graphic picture of the crowd of importunate, idle, and worthless characters who infested the Scottish court at this period, attracted by the indiscriminate prodigality of his gay and gallant sovereign.

The accounts of the Lord Treasurer show how well deserved were these indignant censures. Opening them at random with Mr. Tytler, we find the king, on the 11th February, 1488, (then not twenty years of age,) bestowing nine pounds on Gentle John, the English Fule: on the 10th of June, we have an item to 'English pypers, who played to the king at the castle gate, of eight confirm the assertions of the indignant poet, and evince the extravagance and levity of the monarch.*

'The same records not only corroborate Dunbar's description, but bring before us, in fresh and lively colours, the court itself, with its gay and laughter-loving monarch. Let not history deride the labours of the patient antiquary; for never, in her moments of happiest composition, could she summon up a more natural and striking picture than we can derive from these ancient and often neglected records. We are enabled, by the clear and authentic lights which they furnish, to trace the motions of the court and its royal master, not only from year to year, but to mark the annals of every day. We see his majesty before he rises on the new-year's morning; we stand beside his chamberlain, and see the nobles, with their gifts and offerings, crowd into the apartment; nor is his favourite, gentle John, the English fool, forgotten, who brings his present of cross-bows; then enters the King of Bene,* enacted by Tom Pringle; Jok Goldsmith chaunts his ballat below the window; the gysars dance; and in the evening the Bishop of Glasgow, the Earl of Bothwell, the Lord Chancellor, and the Treasurer, play at cards with his Highness. Such are but a few of the characteristic touches of these remarkable records. They would furnish us with a thousand more, had we time, or limits to detail them. They enable us to accompany the prince to his chapel royal at Stirling; we see the boys of the choir bending down to remove his spurs, and receive their ac-

* This personage was the king elected on Twelfth-night, being the individual in whose portion of the cake a bean was found. On January 16th, 1489-90, there is an entry in the Treasurer's Accounts of eighteen shillings paid to the 'King of Bene,' and there are various other entries of sums paid on different occasions to Robin Hood and the Abbot of Unreason. James himself mingled freely in all the sports of the court, and was remarkably dextrous in all amusements, games, and manly exercises. 'Under the date of February 23, 1504-5, there is an entry of eight pounds eight shillings and eightpence, paid to Alex. Herse to louse the king's stoupe (release the king's drinking cup), which was tane when he was Abbot of Unreason,—which affords a very remarkable instance of the manners of the times, and of the revels sanctioned by long usage during 'the daft days.' Criminal Trials, vol. i. p. 123.

customed largess; we follow him in his progress through his royal burghs, and listen to the thanks of the gudewife of the king's lodging, as the generous prince bestows his gratuity; we climb the romantic crag on which St. Anthony's chapel is situated, and almost hear his confession; we can follow him into his study, and find him adding to the scanty library which was all the times permitted even to a king—the works of Quintillian and Virgil, and the sang-buiks in which he took so much delight; his shooting at the butts with his nobles; his bandying jokes with his artillerymen; his issuing to the chase or the tournament from his royal castles of Stirling or Falkland, surrounded by a cavalcade of nobles, knights and beautiful damsels; his presence at the christening of the Earl of Buchan's son, and the gold piece which he drops into the cauldre,—all are brought before us as graphically as at the moment of their occurrence. And whilst our interest is heightened, and our imagination gratified, by the variety and brilliancy of the scenery which is thus called up, we have the satisfaction to know that all is true to nature, and infinitely more authentic than the pages even of a contemporary historian.'

Dunbar, in his 'Remonstrance,' speaks of the patronage which the king bestowed upon certain adventurers, who had studied the mysteries of alchemy, and were ingenious in making 'quintessence' which should convert other metals into pure gold; and in the Treasurer's Accounts Fondness of James for alchemy. counts there are numerous payments for alchemy. payments for the 'Quinta Essentia,' including wages to the persons employed, utensils of various kinds, coals and wood for the furnaces, and for a variety of other materials, such as quicksilver, aqua vitæ, litharge, auri, fine tin, burnt-silver, alum, salt and eggs, saltpetre, &c. Considerable sums were also paid to several 'Potingairs' for stuff of various kinds to the Quinta Essentia. Thus, on the 3rd of March, 1501, 'the king sent to Strivelin four Harry nobles in gold;—a sum equal, as it is stated, to nine pounds Scots money—'for the leech to multiply.' On the 27th of May, 1502, the Treasurer paid to Robert Bartoun, one of the king's mariners, 'for certain droggis (drugs) brocht home to him to the French leich, £31 4s.' On the 11th of February, 1503-4, we find twenty shillings given 'to the even well mak aurum potabile, be the king's command.' And on the 13th of October, 1507, the Treasurer paid six pounds for a punction of wine to the Abbot of Tugland, to 'mak Quinta Essentia.' The credulity and indiscriminate generosity of the Scottish monarch appear to have collected around him a multitude of quacks of all sorts, for, besides the Abbot, mention is made of 'the leech with the curland hair;' of 'the lang Dutch doctor;' of one Fullertone, who was believed to possess the secret of making precious stones; of a Dr. Opely who laboured hard at the transmutation of metals, and many other empirics, whom James not only supported in their experiments, but himself assisted in their laboratory. The most noted of these adventurers was the person who is variously styled in the Treasurer's Accounts, 'the French Leich,' 'The Flying Abbot of Tungland,' 'Maister John the French Leich,' 'Maister John the French Medicinar,' and 'French Maister John.' The real name of this empiric was John Damian; and we learn from Dunbar that he was a native of Lombardy, and had practised surgery and other arts in France before his arrival in Scotland. His first appearance at the court of James was in the capacity of a French leech, and as he is mentioned among the persons who received 'leveray' in 1501-2, there can be no doubt that he held an appointment as a physician in the royal household. He soon succeeded in ingratiating himself with the king, and it is probable that it was from him that James imbibed a strong passion for alchemy, as he about this time erected at Stirling a furnace for prosecuting such experiments, and continued during the rest of his reign to expend considerable sums of money in attempts to discover the philosopher's stone. 'Maister John,' says Bishop Lesley, 'caused the king believe, that he by multiplying and utheris his inventions wold make fine gold of uther metal, quihilk science he callit the Quintassence, whereupon the king made great cost, but all in vain.' There are numerous entries in the Treasurer's Accounts of sums paid for saltpetre, bellows, two great stillatours, brass mortars, coals, and numerous vessels of various shapes, sizes, and denominations, for the use of this foreign adept in his mystical studies. 'These, however, were not his sole occupations; for after the mysterious labours of the day were concluded, Master John was wont to play at cards with the sovereign—a mode by which he probably transferred the contents of the royal exchequer into his own purse, as efficaciously as by his distillations.' We find that on the 4th of March, 1501, nine pounds five shillings were paid 'to the king and the French leich to play at cartis.' A few months later, on the occasion of a temporary visit which the empiric found it necessary to pay to France, James made him a present of his own horse and two hundred pounds. Early in the year 1504, the Abbot of Tungland, in Galloway, died, and the king, with a reckless disregard of the dictates of duty, and even of common decency, appointed this unprincipled adventurer to the vacant office. On the 11th March, the Treasurer paid 'to Gareoch Par-saivant fourteen shillings to pass to Tungland for the Abbey, to French Maister John.' On the 12th of the same month, 'by the king's command,' he paid 'to Bardus Altovite Lumbard twenty-five pounds for Maister John, the French Mediciner, new maid Abbot of Tungland, whilk he aucht (owed) to the said Bardus;' and a few days later, on the 17th, there was given 'to Maister John, the new maid Abbot of Tungland, seven pounds.' Three years after, in 1507, July 27, occurs the following entry: 'Item, lent by the king's command to the Abbot of Tungland, and can nocht be gettin fra him, £33 6s. 8d.)* A singular adventure which befel this dextrous impostor in September, 1507-8, appears to have afforded great amusement to the Scottish court. On the occasion of an embassy setting out from Stirling to the court of France, he had the assurance to declare that by means of a pair of artificial wings which he had constructed, he would undertake to fly to Paris and arrive long before the ambassadors. 'This time,' says Bishop Lesley, 'there was an Italiane with the king, who was made Abbot of Tungland. This abbot tuke in hand to flie with wings, and to be in France before the said ambassadors; and to that effect he caused make ane pair of wings of feathers, quihilk being festinit upon him he flew off the castle-wall of Stirling; but shortly he fell to the ground and broke his thie-bane; but the wyte (blame) thereof he ascribed to their beand some hen feathers in the wings, quihilk yarnit, and coveted the myddin† and not the skies.† This incident gave rise to Dunbar's satirical ballad entitled, 'Of the Fenyeit Friar of Tungland,' in which the poet exposes in the most sarcastic strain the pretensions of the luckless adventurer, and relates with great humour the result of his attempt to soar into the skies, when he was dragged to the earth by the low-minded propensities of the 'hen feathers,' which he had inadvertently admitted into the construction of his wings. The unsuccessful attempt of the abbot, though, according to Lesley, it subjected him to the ridicule of the whole kingdom, does not appear to have lost him the king's favour, for the Treasurer's books, from October, 1507, to August, 1508, repeatedly mention him as having played at dice and cards with his majesty; and on the 8th of September, 1508, 'Damiane, Abbot of Tungland,' obtained the royal permission to pursue his studies abroad during the space of five years. He must have returned to Scotland, however, before the death of James; and the last notice given of this impostor is quite in character. On the 27th of March, 1513, the sum of twenty pounds was paid to him for his journey to the mine in Crawford Moor, where the king had at that time artisans at work searching for gold.‡

According to Pitseottie, King James 'was well learned in the art of medicine, and was ane singular guid chirurgiane, and there was none of that profession if they had any dangerous cure in hand but would have craved his advyse.' The good monarch seems to have been very fond of displaying his surgical skill; and it would appear from his Treasurer's Accounts that he was even willing to pay poor people for liberty to operate upon them. Under the date of April 10th, 1510, we find an entry of thirteen shillings paid 'to the blind wyf that hed her eyne schorne'—that is, we may suppose, couched for the cataract. The phrase, as Mr. Pitcairn remarks, is most ominous of 'evil success.' On the 9th of Feb. 1511-12, a donation of fourteen shillings was made 'to ane fallow because the king pullit furtht his tootht.' And on the 25th, a similar amount was paid to 'Kynnard, the barbour, for twa teith drawin furtht of his heid be the king.' On another occasion his foreign minstrel Dominico receives eighteen shillings 'to gyf the king leve to lat him bluid.' Nov. 6th, 1508, we have the characteristic entry of six shillings and eight peuce 'to James Dog quhilk he laid doune for claith to be wippes to John Balfouris sair leg quhilk the king helit.'

Pitcottie mentions a curious experiment which His curious experiment. was undertaken by James for the purpose of discovering the primitive language of mankind. 'He caused tak ane dumb woman,' says that garrulous but picturesque chronicler, 'and pat her in Inchkeith, and gave hir two bairnes with hir, and gart furnish hir in all necessaries thingis pertaining to their nourishment, desiring heirby to know what languages they had when they cam to the aige of perfyte speach. Some sayes they spak guid Hebrew, but I know not by authoris rehearse.'* We are also informed that he took great interest in a monster which at this time was born in Scotland. 'In the lower part of its body,' says Buchanan, 'it resembled a male child, nothing differing from the ordinary shape of the human frame, but from the waist upwards it had two bodies, male and female. The king gave special order for its careful education, especially in music, in which it arrived at an admirable degree of skill, and moreover it learned several tongues; and sometimes the two bodies did discover several appetites disagreeing one with another, and so they would quarrel, one liking this, the other liking that; and yet sometimes again they would agree and consult as it were in common for the good of both. This was also memorable in it, that when the legs or loins were hurt below, both bodies were sensible of this pain in common; but when it was pricked or otherwise hurt above, the sense of the pain did affect one body only; which difference was also more perspicuous in its death, for one of the bodies died many days before the other, and that which survived being half-putrified, pined away by degrees. This monster lived twenty-eight years, and then died when John (Duke of Albany) was regent of Scotland.' 'I am the more confident in relating this story,' he adds, 'because there are many honest and credible persons yet alive who saw the prodigy with their eyes.'†

It is well known that James suffered considerably His remorse and ably from remorse on account of superstition. the part which he took in the rebellion against his father, and 'in the midst of all the reckless dissipation in which he indulged, it is curious to remark the outbursts of superstitious feelings, the strange mixture of levity and austerity which distinguishes his character.' According to a common tradition, he was in the habit of wearing a heavy iron chain as a penance for his sin in having appeared in arms against his father; and as another method of making his peace with Heaven, he frequently undertook a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. Duthoc, at Tain, which appears to have been at this time held in particular sanctity. It is curious to observe from the account of the expenses incurred in these pilgrimages, that during the journey the king indulged as much as usual in sports and games; and that he carried with him the whole train of minstrels, jesters, and other attendants who ministered to his amusement. On one of these occasions, we find among other items of a similar kind, fourteen pounds lost at cards by the king in Brechin—eighteen shillings paid in Dunnotar to 'the chield that playit on the monocordis'—the same sum given to the pipers of Aberdeen by the king's command—eight shillings to the 'falconaris in Inverowry'—nine shillings 'to the madinis of Forres that dansit to the king'—nine shillings and sixpence 'to the madinis that dansit at Elgin sielike'—fourteen shillings 'to the madanis that dansit at Darnway'—and four pounds 'to John Goldsmyth for tursing (packing) the organis to Tayne and hame again.' We find that the king on one occasion, probably under the influence of some sudden fit of remorse, when other avocations detained him in Fife, had requested and obtained the loan of St. Duthoc's relique, for there is an entry on the 17th of November of five shillings to a man who carried that sacred object back from Dumfermline to its proper place. In a more homely frame of superstition, the monarch occasionally borrowed an angel or gold noble from his High Treasurer, and after 'cruking' or bending it fixed the talisman to his beads.

It must be evident from the information furnished by the accounts of the High Treasurer, that at this period there was a general homeliness of manners, and great simplicity and absence of the intellectual, in the whole system of society in Scotland. 'When the king and his nobles spent the greater part of their time in seeing dances and mummers, hearing syrens in their chambers, listening to tale-tellers and minstrels, and a thousand other amusements equally remote from rational, what must have been the intellectual habits of the uninstructed poor?' In justice to James, however, it should be mentioned that to him belongs the honour of having first introduced printing into Scotland. In 1507, he procured the materials of typography for Walter Chapman and Andro Millar, the first of whom was previously his personal servant; and there are a few entries His purchase of in the Treasurer's Accounts of sums books, and money paid for the purchase of books, to print and minstrels. Thus on one occasion we find fifty shillings paid 'for three prentit bukes to the king, tane fra Andro Millar's wyff,' and on another eleven pounds paid 'to Walter Wodis wyff, for ane buke to the queen's grace.' James was also a liberal patron of poets and minstrels. Dunbar, as we have seen, was in the constant receipt of twenty pounds a year, and Blind Harry, the minstrel to whom we are indebted for the well-known popular poem of WALLACE, was a regular attendant of the court, and appears to have received eighteen shillings every three months as a pension.

The records of the Lord High Treasurer furnish an equally minute and interesting view of the Domestic life of domestic life and habits of James James V. V., from his cradle to his grave.

The first notice of the infant monarch in the accounts of the Treasurer is sufficiently appropriate. On the 4th of March, 1516, nineteen pounds three shillings were disbursed for 'twenty-four elne of rowen russet to mak gownis,' to the king's nurses and the rockers of his cradle, of whom there were altogether no fewer than six. In the following year we find him under the tuition of Maister Gawin Dunbar, as the following entries intimate: 'February 10—Item, to Maister Gawin Dunbar, the king's master, to by necessar thingis for the Kingis Chamer' (schoolroom), nine pounds; and 'August 28th—Item, to Maister Gawin Dunbar, for expensis maid be him in reparatis of the Chamer in the quhilk the kingis leris' (learns), 'now in the Castle,' four pounds. For exercise the youthful prince seems now to have been provided with a mule to ride upon; the sum of twenty shillings and sixpence being entered as paid to 'Robene Purvese for schoyne (shoes), howsis, breddil, and halteris bocht for the kingis mule.' In 1525, when James had reached his fourteenth year, we find thirty-one pounds four shillings expended on New Year's gifts for the king to bestow upon his courtiers and attendants. James appears to have practised the game of tennis or the 'cache,' a

His youthful favourite game at the Scottish amusements. court during this and the preceding reign; and among his other amusements we find him diverting himself with 'bikkiring' mock castles with 'eggis.' This it seems was a foolish pastime invented for him by his servants, in which one party played the part of besiegers, and the other that of the besieged, the missiles on both sides being eggs. 'It may easily be imagined,' says Mr. Pitcairn, 'in what a plight both victors and vanquished would be after a cessation of hostilities.' The ammunition for this mimic warfare is thus gravely entered in the Treasurer's Accounts: 'June 29—Item, gevin for eggis to bikkir the Castell,' fifteen shillings and sixpence. But the supply of ammunition would seem to have fallen short in the heat of the conflict, and the king's servants appear to have carried on the war by levying forced contributions upon the lieges, for on the 17th of July we find his majesty ordering payment of twenty shillings 'till puir wivis that came gretand (weeping) upon his grace for eggis takin fra thame be his servandis.'

James appears to have been fond of splendid apparel, and we learn from the accounts of his Treasurer that he was in the habit of expending large sums of money upon clothes and personal ornaments. Under the date of March 22nd, 1540, we find an entry of thirty-two pounds, paid to 'Johnne Young, brodistar (embroiderer), for stuff and broudering of sixty-four pece of brownis, James and Thrissilis set upon twa tynnakilis of tanny velvet, quhilk was the lining of ane gowne of claith of gold, of the kingis price of the pece ten shillings.' (This magnificent garment appears to have been a dress gown for wearing in the palace.) 'Item, for six elnis bukrem to lyne ye saidis tynnakilis, with pricc of the elne, two shillings and eightpence.' 'Item, for twenty-sie elnis of rubbennis (ribbons) to thame, price of the elne, eightpence.' 'Item, for broudering of ane vestment of tanny velvet with fourteen James Crownis and Thrissilis, seven pounds.' The coins mentioned in these entries were given to the embroiderer to be converted into gold work, to be put on the gown and vestment. The other articles of the king's apparel were equally gorgeous. His shirts, as we learn from the following and many other similar entries, were richly and elaborately wrought about the collar and breast with gold and embroidery. 'To David Bonar for thirteen double hankis of gold, quhilk war deleurit to David Lindsays wife, to sew the kingis sarkis. Item, deliverit to Katherync Bellendene till complete ane sark to the kingis grace, sewit with gold and silver work half ane dowbell hank of sewing gold, price thair of twelve shillings; the pricc of ilk hank ten shillings.' His short surtout was composed of fine cloth, or the richest velvet embroidered with gold; his black velvet bonnet was looped up with a diamond or ruby, and surmounted by a light and graceful feather, while his hunting horn, sword, and dagger, were suspended by massive chains of pure gold. He wore russet half-boots, which at home were exchanged for shoes of white or black velvet, which we are told cost 'three pounds the elne.'

There are many curious details given respecting the king's preparation for his Preparations for voyage to the Western Isles in his voyage to the Isles. May, 1540. On the 21st of that month there was 'deliverit to Thomas Arthure to be ane cote and ane pair of brekis, to the kingis grace for the see, ten elnis red crammessye velvet, price of the elne seven pounds.' 'Item, for five unces of pasmentis of gold to it, eight pounds fifteen shillings. Item, for pointtis to the cote and brekis and ane tulat to the cote, three shillings.' No expense seems to have been spared in providing for his comfort in the ship. He had two different beds in the vessel, and two different apartments, which appear to have been richly furnished. The hangings of one chamber were of French green, and cost fifteen pounds fifteen shillings. The curtain and cover of one of his beds were composed of '25½ elnis blaek damis,' which cost forty-three pounds fifteen shillings and sevenpence. The bed in 'the nether chalmer' was hung with ·17½ elnis grene damis, fringed with grene silk.' The 'stremaris to the kingis schippis' were made of 'nine score elnis reid and yellow sey,' and 'till complete the samein,' fifteen elnis serge were given; to be 'ansenzeis (ensigns) to the schippis, 17 elnis reid and yellow taffitese of cord,' and 'to be croces thairfo four and a half elnis quhyte taffitese of Janis.' 'Two elnis of tanny velvet' were employed to make a cover for an easy stool for the kingis grace,' and it required three cases to contain the 'silver-wark,' which his majesty carried with him. Murdoch Strivelin, Patesar (pastry-cook) was paid seven pounds eight shillings and eightpence for 'the making of the unis (ovens) in the schippis,' and John Bertone received forty shillings for 'the making of six standartis to ye schippis,' and an equal sum 'for the making of three top-claithes and three flaggis.' Great quantities of bed clothing, and a number of pavilions to be erected on any of the islands on which the king and royal suite might land, were besides brought down to Leith from Holyrood by a cart, and put on board the ships.

Whatever may have been the general state of the country at this period, the lavish expenditure on gold and silver work and silver work of every kind must have been very great, and the Treasurer's Accounts show that his majesty was an excellent customer to George Heriot,* Thomas Rynd, John Mosman, and John Kyll, the fashionable goldsmiths of the day. The entries of this kind are so numerous, that we can only give a few of the most remarkable. 'Deliverit to John Mosman to mak ane croce of gold, to set diamant stanes in, eight angels rubbillis, six licht French crownis, fifteen pounds four shillings.' 'Item, to John Mosman for making the great basin of gold weyand ten pund wecht ane unce and ane half unce, and making of ane schip, twa brasillatis, diverse chenzies (chains) and rings, seventy-four pound† ten shillings.' 'Item, given for ane chenzie deliverit to John Mosman, to melt with other gold, to be the king's gilt chenzie, one hundred and ten pounds.' 'For making of the Queenis Crowne, and furnishing of stanis thairto, quhilk weyit thirty-five unce of gold of mynd,‡ forty-five pounds.' 'For making and fassoun of the kingis crowne, weyand three pund wecht ten unces, and thairfo gold of the mynd, forty-twa unce, thirty pounds.' 'Item, for twenty-four stanis thairto, of the quhilk thare was three grete garnettis, and ane grete ammerot (emerald), price of the three, six pounds; and price of the pece of the other nineteen stanis, fourteen shillings.' 'Item, given to the Capitane of Crawford, for fyve score 12½ unce unmolten gold of mynd, price of the

unce six pounds eight shillings, quhilk was deliverit to John Mosman and dispoit upon the King and Queenis graces erownis, and to eyk ane grete chenze to his grace 17 unce, and ane belt to the Queen weyand 19½ unce, seven hundred and eighteen pounds eight shillings.' Large sums were also paid to John Mosman 'for the makin and fassoun of ane pair of bedis to the kingis grace, weyand 17 unces of gold of his graces awin gold,' for 'the fassoun of 67 unces ekit to the kingis grete chenze,' 'for the making of ane quhisill of gold to the kingis grace weyand 3½ unces 2½ Unicornis wecht,' and a month later, for 'the making of another quhisill of gold of mynd weyand 3½ unces, half Unicornis wecht, with ane Dragoun anamulit.' 'October 9, 1540, there was deliverit to John Mosman 12 unces, quarter unce silver, to be ane relique to ane bane (bone) of Sanct Mahago. Item, gevin to gilt the said relique with, twa Roisnobillis. Item, gevin him for making of the uper relique of Sanct Mahago, four pounds.' Twenty-seven pounds seventeen shillings and threepence were also paid for 'ane reliet of Sanct Dutho set in silver weyand 36 unce,' and for 'making of the samyn,' fyve pounds nine shillings. On one occasion we find three hundred and eighty-seven pounds paid to Mosman for 'chenzies, tabulattis, braselattis, ringis, stanis,' &c., while under the same date there is an entry of two hundred and forty-nine pounds 'gevin to Thomas Rynd, for sielyke gold-wark.' Many of the articles of jewellery, however, purchased by the king, were not on his own account, but were bestowed with a princely munificence upon his courtiers and favourites. In December, 1538, The king's New Year's gifts. thirty-nine pounds nineteen shillings was paid 'to Thomas Rynd for chenzies of gold, gold ryngis, tabillatis, and uthir goldin wark deliverit be him to the kingis grace agane New Zeiris (Year's) mess, and given in New Zeiris gifts.' On the last day of the following year, two hundred and eighty-two pounds three shillings, and on December 31, 1540, three hundred and ten pounds were disbursed for various articles of jewellery, to be distributed in the same manner. We find that in one month the expenses of the king for 'ringis, goldin wark, dyamentis, and chenzies of gold, to gif away among the gentille wemene,' amount to four hundred and eleven pounds. His majesty evidently prided himself on the gold and silver ^{His silver plate.} work which he possessed, and seems to have had 'everything fine about him.' Mention is made by the Lord Treasurer of a silver 'buist (box) for onctments (ointments) to the kingis grace,' of a silver clam-shell for holding tooth-powder, and 'ane pennose of silver to keep pyketeith in to the kingis grace.' Even his hawks, we are informed, dined off silver plate, and their bells were of pure gold.

There are numerous entries in the Treasurer's Accounts of sums paid for arms ^{His arms and armour.} and armour, which King James and his father had a singular passion for collecting

* Probably the grandfather of the celebrated George Heriot, the founder of the Hospital which bears his name.

† Mr. Pitcairn states that he learned by inquiring of Her Majesty's goldsmith that such a piece of plate as that spoken of in the text would now cost £788 10s., and it of course bore this relative value at that time.

of the finest workmanship, from foreign countries, as well as what could be produced of every possible pattern in Scotland. Mention is made of the purchase of 'five quarters black velvet to seabartis to the kingis raperis.' 'Item to mak frenzies to his grace swerd handis, three unces blak sewing silk, fifteen shillings, and warkmanship three shillings.' On one occasion twenty-three pounds five shillings were paid to 'William Sinebeird, for dighting (cleaning) of swerdis, rapperis, harnessing, steill sadillis, Jedburcht stavis, and uther wappiness to the kingis grace.' The most splendid article, however, noticed amongst the king's defensive armour is, 'ane target of gold, with ane marmadyne in it of dyamentis, of the kingis awin gold'—that is, the gold raised from his own mines.

It has been justly said that 'if his majesty's ^{His practice of} example would have gone any ^{archery.} length in making his subjects archers they would have made some progress during his reign, for he was passionately devoted to the bow, and spent much of his time in practising with that weapon. Entries for bows and arrows for the king's use occur on almost every page of the accounts; and he seems to have procured them from a great variety of quarters, purchasing them from celebrated makers, and getting choice ones sent him as presents.' It appears that the example of the king had not been altogether without effect in inducing a portion, at least, of his subjects to acquire considerable dexterity in the use of this once celebrated weapon; for we are informed by Pitcottie, that when Lord William Howard was sent by Henry VIII. as ambassador to the Scottish court, he was accompanied by threescore cavaliers, many of whom were noted for their skill in all games of manly sport, as shooting, leaping, wrestling, running, and casting of the stone, but 'they were weill assayed in all these or they went home, and almost evir tint.* Queen Margaret, who witnessed all these trials of skill, favoured her own countrymen, and betted against her son two hundred crowns and a tun of wine, that six of these Englishmen would shoot better with the bow, at 'riveris, butts, or prick-bonnet,' than any half-dozen Scotchmen, nobles, gentlemen, or yeomen. 'The ground was chosen at St. Andrews. The Scottish archers were three landit gentlemen—David Weines of that ilk, David Arnot of that ilk, and Mr. Johne Wedderburn, vicar of Dundee, and three yeomen—Johne Thomson in Leith, Stevin Tabroner, and Alick Baillic, who was ane pyper, and shot wondrous near.† The Englishmen were defeated at their far-famed national weapon, and Queen Margaret lost her wager, to the great delight of the king and his people.

James was greatly addicted to the sports of the ^{Foodness for} field, and it appears from the ^{field sports.} Treatise's books that the royal preparations for the pastimes of hunting and hawking were conducted on a most extensive scale. His favourite hunting ground was Megotland, a wild district in the southern border of Peeblesshire, which appears to have been preserved for his own special sport. His majesty took the field in great splendour, accompanied by a numerous and gallant train of nobles and knights, for whose accommodation, pavilions, bed-furniture, and other conveniences had been previously despatched to the scene of action, as the pastime was not unfrequently followed for eighteen or twenty consecutive days at a time. James, like the other princes of the Stuart family, was passionately fond of fine horses, and had a most extensive stud, brought not only from England, but from Denmark, Flanders, France, and Spain.

* Lost—were defeated.

† Pitcottie, vol. ii. pp. 347, 348.

Music seems to have formed one of the most prominent of his indoor recrea- ^{His love of music.} tions. His favourite musical instrument was the lute, and judging from his great consumption of lute strings, he must have been very assiduous in his practice. In his Treasurer's Accounts there is only one allusion to the game of cards, and, unlike his father, he does not seem to have been at all given to betting. Various entries are made of sums paid for masks and mummeries, in which the king himself took an active part. At one of these masks he wore a 'play gown' of black and white, for the making of which Robert Spittal received three pounds. On another occasion, we find him appearing in a dress of red and yellow. He seems to have been at the expense of clothing many of the maskers, and to have also expended considerable sums on the popular game of Robin Hood. Mention is made on one occasion of the payment of six pounds for '4½ elnis rissillis blak, by the kingis precept, to Christiana Rae, when she was Quene of Bane,* a personage of whom no notice is elsewhere to be met with.

As might be expected, the fool or jester, the usual accompaniment of the Scot- ^{Fools, jesters, and} tish court, figures largely in my ^{dwarfs.} Lord Treasurer's books, and the queen also maintained a fool—a Frenchwoman, named Serat, who appears to have been in great favour at court, and to have partaken largely of the bounty of her royal mistress. Mr. Pitcairn is of opinion that this is the only instance in history of a female buffoon or fool, for the amusement of the court. There are numerous notices of several dwarfs whom the king clothed and fed, and who appear to have had regular pensions assigned them. One of these, designated the 'Littill Turk,' receives on one occasion a 'cote, hois, brekis, and dowblet' of red and yellow cloth, together with a red bonnet; and on another a motley coat of green and yellow, with a doublet and hose of 'blak fustiane and Scottis gray.' Another of these diminutive buffoons, humorously termed the 'Droich,' on whose account there are numerous entries for payments and liveries, does not seem to have been in good credit with the court tailor, for under the date of August 5, 1535, there is an entry of twenty shillings, paid to the 'Droich to lowse (release) his clathis fra the tailzeuris.' It appears that at this time a menagerie of strange birds and beasts formed a part of the royal establishment at Stirling, and Falkland. We find that £11 18s. were paid by the king's command for 'seven elnis fyne French black, to be ane gown and ane kirtyll to Thomas Melvillis wyff in Falkland, for keeping of certaine pettis (pets) and nursing of the samyn.'

Almost every page of these curious and interesting records bears testimony to the liberality and king's generosity and kindness of James.

heart. He seems to have taken great pleasure in providing a tocher both for 'penniless lasses wi' lang pedigrees, and for damels without any pedigree at all. Thus we find £400 'gevin to the Lord Fleming, at the king's command, in manner of tochir to his sister,' and again, £133 6s. 8d., by the king's precept to John Pipar, of Sanct Johnstoun, in toqher with Catherine Sinclair.' We find also such payments as the following: four pounds 'to ane pair man quhais horse fell our the castell wall of Striveling, and brak his nek;' forty shillings to 'ane pair woman quihill had her husband slane with ane guanne schot furth of ye castell;' 'twa kye' costing forty shillings each 'to twa pair women of Cowper' whose husbands had been accidentally killed; and five pounds 'gevin to Wiliame Lyell be ye kingis precept,' for lynt, cale, and corne, distroyit be his seruandis at the hunting.'

It is pleasing to observe, amidst all the frivolity, extravagance, and profligacy which king to literary men.

at this period prevailed at the Scottish court, that the claims of literary men were not overlooked. Among other examples of the king's bounty to this class mention is made of two payments of thirty pounds each to 'Maister John Bellentyné' for translating of the Cronykill, of twelve pounds 'for ane new Cronykill gevin to the kingis grace,' and of two sums of eight pounds each in part payment of 'the translation of Titus Livius.' Item to Maister Hector Boice, Principle in Abirdene, for ye tane (one) half of his pensiou' twenty-five pounds. The sum of twenty pounds was twice paid to 'Maister George Buchquhannan at ye kingis command,' and 'at the Quenis Grace entry in Edinburghe' this learned historian and poet received 'six elnis of Parise blak to be ane goune, threo elnis of blak satyne to lyne ye forder quarteris and slevis of ye said goune, and six elnis of blak velvet to be him ane Hugtoun cote, or cassock. 'Twa writing bukis of parchement' for the king cost eight shillings, and large sums were paid for binding the 'Matin-books' of the king and queen, in velvet, clasped with gold.

The records of my Lord Treasurer furnish us with the most minute information respecting all the most prominent events in the chequered career of his royal master—the interment of his first queen, the beautiful Magdalene,† and of his mother Margaret Tudor, his marriage to Mary of Guise, her public entry into Edinburgh, and coronation; the birth, baptism, death and burial of his short-lived sons, James and Arthur, the court mourning for his own untimely death, and the expenses of the funeral procession when he was buried with his fathers in the chapel of Holyrood.

In May, 1540, an heir to the throne was born at St. Andrews. On the 11th of that month, twenty shillings were 'gevin to James Bissat, messenger, for passing with certane close writings to warne certane Lordis and Ladyis to be in Sanct Androis at the birthe of my Lord Prince,' and various sums were paid for the carriage of tapestry, cloth of gold, and 'wardrop geir,' to St. Andrews, on the same occasion.‡ 'Andro Michelsoun' received a 'leveray for bringing of tidings to the kingis grace of the nativite of my Lord Prince;' twenty-two shillings were 'gevin to James Bissat to pass with letters and denunce' the auspicious event 'in all partis in Lothiane and ye Merse;' forty pounds were 'gevin to James Elphinstoun to pass 'to the King of England,' and an equal sum to 'James Serymgeour at his passing to France' with the news. April 24th, 1541, there is a notice of the 'expensis disbursit at the nativite of my Lord Duke' (the king's second son, Arthur, Duke of Albany), a few days after, an entry of fourteen shillings 'gevin to Andro Yare in Striveling for ane cap of leid that my Lord Duke was buryit in,' and of the sums paid for black velvet to be 'fute mantillis and harnessingis to the Quenis grace, and four of hir Ladyis,' on the death of James, Duke of Rothsay, close the earthly accounts of these short-lived hopes of Scotland. 'Just scene of all, which ends this strange

His own banal. eventful history,' is the entry in the Treasurer's Accounts of the 'expenses disbursed upon the Queen, the King's spouse, her ladies and servants, for dool' (mourning habits), and of the sums paid to the upholsterer for a canopy and cover to the bier, and to the carpenters and masons for work done in making a passage through the royal chapel to the vault, and for constructing the tomb in which the ill-starred monarch was himself soon after laid.

* Prayer-books.

† There is a curious entry of four pounds 'gevin to Anthone Barbour Frencheman for the grathing and bowell ling of the Quenis grace, whom God assolte.'

‡ The king and queen very frequently changed their place of abode from one palace to another, and their tapestry, beds, plate, and other articles of furniture, were generally removed at the same time for their use.

CHAPTER XXVI.

MARY.—[FROM HER ACCESSION TO HER DEPARTURE FOR FRANCE.]

A.D. 1542—1548.

OF the five Stuarts who preceded Mary in the sovereignty of Scotland, two had been assassinated; other two had fallen in battle; and the last of them, James V., the gayest, bravest, and most chivalrous of his race, died of a broken heart at the cowardice of his army and the humiliation of his kingdom. They had all died comparatively young, leaving mere infants as successors on the most troubled and uneasy throne in Europe. Many disorders and animosities had grown up during the repeated and long minorities: and anarchy, perpetuating itself, took various forms, and made new alliances during the practical abeyance of royalty. Nearly a third of the period occupied by the five reigns was under regencies; and each of these had revived old, and given birth to new, feuds and factions, to be thorns in the crown of the infant sovereign. An accumulation of unsolved perplexities and difficulties, and of evils and dangers unsubdued and likely to multiply, lay at the opening of this reign—the first female reign, moreover, in Scotland. The grand work of the Reformation from Popery was also going on, with strangely diverse agents and allies; and whilst sure to be a source of agitation, and even convulsion, to the rule of a sovereign who favoured it, it was still more certain to be fatal to the authority—if not to the life—of one who, like Mary, should hate and oppose it. The era was one of gravest importance and difficulty; it has been pronounced the only one in Scottish history that has a world-wide interest: the most masculine and sagacious spirit was needed to preside over it; and yet, amid the transcendent operations and results of that memorable period, poor Mary—baffled and beaten—keeps ever intruding with her wondrous spell of beauty and misfortune; and the remotest posterity will be unable to push the episode of her life into a mere corner of the national history, though her individual fate was really as nothing in the solemn epoch of her reign. The infatuated and crushed woman clings to the wheels of the mighty national revolution, which she could neither arrest nor guide; and is the most prominent object, both when they are in progress and at rest. Long after sacked and demolished abbeys and monasteries have ceased to tell of the Reformation, the ruined Queen of Scots will be remembered in connexion with that event; though much of her misery was the fruit of her passions as a woman,

* "In the history of Scotland I can find properly but one epoch: we may say it contains nothing of world-interest at all, but this Reformation by Knox."—Lectures on Hero-Worship, by Thomas Carlyle. Mr. Carlyle ought to have added the era of the struggles for Scottish independence under Wallace and Bruce.

rather than of her plots and proceedings as a Papist.

one of her letters, written immediately before the tragic close of her ill-fated life, when contemplating how long a period of that life—even all the years of her prime—had been spent without power and without personal liberty, she mentions that she, dethroned, imprisoned, and now ready to die, had been 'from the breast called to the royal dignity.' The unconscious infant had a sovereignty which was denied to the proud, energetic, gifted, and accomplished woman; for we find, on the very day of her father's death, a command issued in her name to one baron to deliver up the castle of Finhaven to another.† A keen con- Contest for the test, conducted by the candidates regency.—Cardinal with the manifold aim of gaining Beaton.

ascendancy for themselves personally, for their order, and for their party both at home and abroad, forthwith began as to who should be entrusted, during Mary's minority, with the guardianship of her person and the regency of her kingdom. Foremost in claiming the post was Cardinal Beaton, Archbishop of St. Andrews, the Wolsey of Scotland; a man of great ability and varied experience, but of inordinate ambition, who had long been familiar with courtly and priestly intrigues both in France and Scotland. Beaton may be regarded as the impersonation both of the faults and virtues of his age and order. He was of a good family, and had been carefully educated at Paris, where he continued for ten years. On his return to his native country, he was advanced to the highest offices both in church and state, and soon became the most powerful person in the kingdom. Though neither a theologian nor a man of great learning, he was a patron of letters and learned men, as well as a sagacious statesman and an accomplished courtier. But his character was stained by great vices. Like the greater part of his brethren, both in Scotland and on the Continent, he lived in open violation of his ordination vows. Notwithstanding all his zeal for the church, he did not hesi-

* The exact day of Mary's birth is keenly disputed. Almost all historians and biographers assume it to have been on the 8th of December: and Mary herself always named it as such. But a recently discovered document—communicated to Miss Strickland by John Riddell, Esq., of the Faculty of Advocates—shows that, at Stirling, her mother's confinement was, on the 9th of that month, only matter of expectation; and it is clear, that if the event had occurred on the previous day intelligence of it would have reached Stirling. All accounts, too, represent the King as having died on the 13th, a few hours (Pittscottie says a few minutes) after the arrival of the news of his daughter's birth: and as an express had been employed, it is incredible that five days should have elapsed between the event and its report to the dying monarch. It is reasonably conjectured by Miss Strickland, that, as the 8th of December is one of the four great Romish festivals in honour of the Virgin Mary the birth of the young queen may afterwards have been celebrated on that day, instead of on the real one, which was most probably the 11th or 12th of the month. (Miss Strickland's Lives of the Scottish Queens, vol. iii. p. 7.)

tato to dilapidate its benefices to enrich his own family. A strenuous opponent of the Reformation such a man could not fail to be, both from his character and position, but he showed himself utterly unscrupulous in the means which he used to crush the new doctrines, and persecuted to the death those who embraced the reformed cause. The deceased monarch had rather permitted than encouraged the growth of Beaton's influence, and only as an available cheek to the power of the turbulent nobles; but the ambitious character of the prelate would not permit him to rest satisfied with a subordinate position. Beaton's peculiar unscrupulousness and audacity of character appeared in his mode of trying to lay hold of the regency. He summarily seized upon it, as if disdaining to enter the arena with any rivals, though these might be closely related to the sovereign and heirs-presumptive to the throne. Instead of canvassing for the office, or standing forth in the modest guise of a candidate, he announced that it was his already by the late king's solemn and special appointment; and got himself proclaimed Regent at the Cross of Edinburgh. He produced a scroll bearing the royal signature, and purporting to be a will in favour of himself (assisted by a council of partizan nobles*) as governor of Scotland, and tutor to the infant queen, until she should be of age. That document was equivalent to a forgery; whether we regard Beaton as having induced James to sign it as a blank paper afterwards to be filled up, or as having guided the passive hand of the dying monarch in subscribing a document of the purport of which he was ignorant. On any possible supposition, it was in the circumstances a fraud. James's old servant, Sir David Lindsay, who stood by the death-bed, and whose testimony is that of a man of the greatest probity, makes the Cardinal say:—

'But after that baith strength and speech was leisit.†
 Ane paper blank his Grace I gart subscribe,
 Into the whilk I writ all that I pleisit,
 After his death, whilk lang war to describe.‡

The will was at once set aside, its authenticity being doubtful, and its matter hateful to the nobility and the people. It injured, instead of promoting, the bold and wily Cardinal's designs; and his usurpation of the high office ended almost on the day it began. Nor were his pretensions, when stripped of the seeming validity and sacredness

* Viz., the Earls of Huntly, Argyle, and Moray. "Buchanan expressly, and only, mentions the Earl of Arran, as one of the three; but that lord is omitted by Knox and Spottiswood, and the Earl of Moray, the late king's bastard brother, put instead of him."—Keith, p. 25. Recently, Mignet, in his 'History of Mary Queen of Scots,' has, from inadvertence probably, substituted the Earl of Arran for the Earl of Moray. That Arran might be the name in the scroll is far, however, from being incredible; for Arran was Beaton's relative, and though friendly to the Reformation, was of such a timid and vacillating character, that Beaton could not be alarmed to take him as a subordinate in the government.

given to them by the document, at all likely to be confirmed by the choice of parliament.

It might have been thought that the Queen-mother would lay claim to the ^{The} regency, for Mary of Guise had ^{Queen-mother.} ambition enough to aspire to such a post, if either it were hers naturally, or could be secured by intrigue; more especially as she knew that now her only connexion with royalty in Scotland was the slight thread of a babe's life, whilst that babe might share the fate of her two brothers—the princes—who had died in infancy. But if she ever intended to urge her pretensions, she must soon have merged them in those of the Cardinal; and, indeed, so far as party, if not personal considerations, were concerned, the claims of both were identical—those of the church and of a close alliance with France against the Scottish nobles, who had always been so troublesome to royalty, and many of whom also favoured the cause of the Reformation from Popery and an alliance with England. Had she felt that she could lead her party as ably as Beaton, and been desirous of the attendant dignity and honour, she was then, from her recent confinement, in no fit state for testing and deciding on whose side the majority of their faction would rank. Hitherto, also, Beaton had exercised the strongest political influence over her mind; and she could not but know that, were she to be chosen Regent, he would still possess the real and essential authority. Nor could the Queen-mother be unaware of the disfavour in which a female regency, during the minority of a female sovereign, would be held by the hardy and martial Scots; though she was more likely to be impressed with the recent examples of two queen-mothers having, for a short time, filled that office—Mary of Gueldres, the widow of James II., and Margaret Tudor, the late king's mother. It would not have been an excessive stretch of charity to suppose that, at this time, her heart was altogether engrossed with the aim of retaining possession of the person of her infant, had she not, from her earliest years, been accustomed to meddle daily with politics, and had not the influential and wily Cardinal been near her to introduce a topic of such primo concern to their common party. She had then only entered upon her twenty-eighth year; but we must not attempt either to qualify or to limit her ambition in state affairs by the consideration of what, in our days, a young widow and a young mother would project or wish.

The successful aspirant was James Hamilton, Earl of Arran, who, being the ^{The Earl of Arran.} direct descendant of the eldest daughter of James II., was the nearest heir to the crown. On this ground he claimed the regency, and was supported by the nobles and the people. He wanted the energy, decision, and self-reliance, requisite for the office in such an alarming crisis of foreign and domestic affairs. His soft and easy nature lay open to be operated upon from every quarter: nor had he either sagacity to see the designs of those who approached him, or resolution to grapple with them. For him to be excited was to be agitated: when he ought to have been finally resolved, he was turning and shifting everywhere for advice; and he shrank with timidity from straightforward and definite action. He was only fitted to adorn private life; the regency was a stormy sphere, for which he lacked both the active and the passive qualifications. In addition, however, to his being heir-presumptive to the throne, he was known to be a friend to the Reformation, a sort of Nicodemus one—from fear of the Papists, not remarkably open or bold in his adherence; and to have him in supreme authority would, if he did not greatly promote that cause, at least put an end to the barbarous persecutions which had made the last years of the previous reign tyrannical and bloody.

Were we to inquire as to the public opinion regarding either the Earl of Arran or the Reformation, we should find that, at that time, it could scarcely be said to be formed. For many generations there was but one subject on which there really was a public opinion, and that was the independence of Scotland, which was dear to all classes and ranks, and ever to be fought for against force and stratagem, as in the days of Wallace and Bruce. This, however, was instinctive nationality pervading and ruling the whole body of the people, rather than that product of general attention, discussion, and judgment, which moderns understand by the phrase, public opinion. Upon all other matters there was no concord, stress, or current of views and sentiments, worthy of such a name: and, indeed, as yet there was, strictly speaking, no public, for under feudalism such a body can scarcely be said to exist; and from being scattered, and without associations or organs, has neither unity nor life. We are left, then, without the means of estimating what kind and extent of sympathy on the part of the general population of Scotland gathered around the Earl of Arran, as candidate for the regency, and around the cause of the Reformation at this important crisis.

The nobles assembled on the 22nd of December to choose a Regent, when Cardinal Beaton distinguished himself by violent but impotent opposition to the claims of the Earl of Arran. He poured out coarse invective upon the proposal of having only one man at the head of affairs, and that man a Hamilton: "For who knows not," said the Cardinal, according to Knox,* "that the Hamiltons are cruel murderers, oppressors of innocents, proud, avaritious, double and false, and finally, the pestilence in this commonwealth?" "Whereto the Earl answered: Defraud me not of my right, and call me what ye please; whatsoever my friends have been, yet unto this day hath no man cause to complain upon me, neither yet am I minded to flatter any of my friends in their evil doing, but by God's grace shall be as forward to correct their enormities as any within the realme can reasonably require of me: and, therefore, yet again my lords, in God's name, I crave that ye do me no wrong, nor defraud me of my just title, before ye have experience of my government. At these words were all that feared God or loved honesty so moved, that with one voice they cried, 'That petition is most just; and, unlesse ye will do against God's justice and equity, it cannot be denied.'" Arran was chosen and declared Regent of the kingdom, and guardian of the infant queen. He entered upon his office in the midst of the discovery of the celebrated paper drawn up by the Cardinal, containing the names of the nobility and gentry suspected of favouring the doctrines of the Reformation, and whose estates he had recommended the king to confiscate.* The discovery of this document must have aggravated the odium in which Beaton was held by the nobility, whilst the incident rendered Arran and his authority highly acceptable. The Cardinal's two crimes were two gross blunders, which it required no ingenuity on the part of his successful rival to turn to good account. The Earl of Arran's well-known simplicity contrasted most advantageously with the tortuous villany over which it had triumphed.

The Regent was put in possession of the royal 'palace, treasure, jewels, garments, horse, and plate;† and he set about arranging for the charge and maintenance of the infant sovereign and the Queen-dowager. An act of mercy towards the Earl of Angus and the Douglasses, who had been exiles in England for upwards of fifteen years, distinguished the beginning of the Earl of Angus and the Douglasses's rule, though that act unquestionably treated them more permitted and invited to return to Scotland. than as daring criminals, to be forgiven and restored to their original rank and privileges. The circumstances of their treason were almost forgotten, the temptations to repeat it were removed; and the Regent, knowing that Angus, and especially his scheming brother, Sir George Douglas, had consented to and advocated proposals which seriously compromised the national integrity and independence, in encouraging Henry VIII.'s views of a union with Scotland, felt that it was desirable that they should come back to Scotland and meet a kindly reception there, in order that they might be filled with the genuine Scottish feeling, and act like patriotic nobles, when engaged in forwarding

* "For," saith the Regent, "If he (Cardinal Beaton) might have his purpose I should surely go to the fire, as when the king lived he told me I was the greatest heretic in the world. A number of noblemen and gentlemen the late king had got written in a roll, which were all accused of heresy, of the which I was the first, and the Earl of Cassils the Earl of Glencairn and his son, the Earl Marischal, and a great many gentlemen, to the number of eighteen score because they were all well-minded to God's word, which then they durst not avow."—Sadler's State Papers, vol. p. 93. the desirable consummation of a union between the two countries. He was warranted to hope that they might have purer motives, and give better counsels in furtherance of the important project, when away from the English court, and that revived patriotism might lessen the influence of Henry's bribes, and relax the obligations under which they had come to that monarch. It was resolved that they should have full liberty to return to Scotland, that their possessions should be restored to them, and that they should take their proper part as barons of the kingdom in the management of public affairs.*

Meanwhile the state of Scottish affairs, consequent on the battle at Solway Moss and the sudden death of King James, was the subject of anxious consideration at the English court. The victory gained for Henry VIII., like all his other victories over Scotland, had not been followed up, he being probably unwilling, as certainly he was unable, to turn victory into conquest. The intelligence of the Scottish king's death was good news to him, though, on its first announcement, he put on a sorrowful countenance and manner, and, amid much feigned grief, said: "Woe is me! for I shall never have any king in Scotland so sib to me again, nor one whom I favoured so well, and desired so greatly to confer with; but, alas! evil and wicked counsel would not let him speak with me, which would have been both to his comfort and mine."† Nor was he less pleased with the intelligence that James had left an infant daughter as his successor; for he saw how Scotland, through her, could be won. A more favourable crisis for carrying out his policy than had occurred at the battle of Flodden presented itself. Many powerful barons and gentry had been taken prisoners at Solway Moss, and conducted into England; and he imagined that, to purchase their deliverance, they would be ready to favour a proposal for the marriage of his son, Edward Prince of Wales, with the infant Queen of Scots. He was already sure of the support of the Earl of Angus and the Douglasses; and on the concurrence and assistance of the prisoners, who were on better terms with the various parties in Scotland, would, he felt, be far more valuable and efficient. They had been treated, on being brought to London, with unnecessary severity: they had been ignominiously led through the streets of the city as captives of Henry's bow, and afterwards closely confined within the Tower. But now he began to be a more indulgent victor: their keeper became their suitor; their rank was respected; they were liberated from the Tower, and given into the hospitable charge of the principal English families; they were admitted to the king's feasts, and he held out the prospect of a speedy return to their own country if they would accede to his designs, and pledge themselves to urge these faithfully and zealously at the Scottish court.*

The main article of the treaty, so far from being objectionable, was highly desirable; and the Scottish nobles and gentry—even if at liberty, and not in the hands of the English monarch, with whom they were bargaining for present indulgence and future enlargement—might have heartily supported it, without any treason or the least compromise of patriotism. During several reigns, it had been seriously entertained by the kings of Scotland and their most eminent and loyal-hearted subjects; and had the way to its honourable execution been open. Scotland would have been spared many disasters. An alliance, fair on both sides, between the two countries, by the marriage of the Prince of Wales and Mary, would, in itself, have been a great blessing, the source of tranquillity, and of commercial and social progress. But Henry's aims were despotic, and his conditions flagrantly unjust—degrading to, and destructive of, the independence of Scotland. The captives were required to acknowledge him as lord-superior of Scotland; they were to promise to use all their endeavours to invest him with the substantial and permanent government of the country; to place the various fortresses of Scotland

* "The chief of the prisoners taken at Solway Moss were carried to London by Sir Henry Savil and Sir Thomas Wentworth, whither they came on the 10th of December, wearing—by King Henry's appointment—a red St. Andrew's Cross, and were presently committed to the Tower; and on the 21st of the same month (before which Henry must have heard of the Scottish king's death) the noble, together with Oliver Sinclair, were conducted by Sir John Gage, Constable of the Tower, riding before them, and the Lieutenant behind them, two by two, in new gowns of black damask, furred with black conies, coats of black velvet, and doublets of satine, to the Star Chamber, where Thomas Lord Audley, the Chancellor, reprimanded them in the King, his master's name, for the late attempt upon his kingdom; but withal told them 'That such was his Majesty's benignity that he would show them kindness for unkindness, and right for wrong;' and thereupon (after their promise to remain true prisoners) commanded that they should no more be returned to gaol, but be distributed into divers noble houses, there to be entertained suitably to their rank and quality, which was immediately done, and they were lodged with the principal persons and noble-bearers of England, such as the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Chancellor, Dukes of Norfolk, Suffolk, &c., &c."—Archb. History, pp. 25, 26.

Keith also mentions that on "the 26th of the same month, King Henry gave orders for the Scottish limits to attend him at court, where they were nobly entertained, and then he discovered to them his inclination to have the kingdoms of England and Scotland united, by a marriage between his only son, Prince Edward, a child little above five years old, and Mary, their infant sovereign; nor did his majesty leave any proper means untried to gain his assistance and good offices of the nobles in to effect his design."

* Sir George Douglas, writing on the 10th of January, 1542-3, to Lord Lisle, mentions that he had received a safe conduct to pass into Scotland from the Earl of Arran.

† Pitcottic.

‡ The communication of the news to Henry by the council of Scotland is dated Dec. 21st, 1542, and is as follows:—"By the disposition of God Omnipotent, which nothing can resist, our sovereign and master, yair tender spouse, is departed fra this life, and has left an princess, our pro-niece, to be heretier and Queen of this realm, whose prosperity, succession, and long life we desire as devoutly and earnestly as can be thought, trusting your highness' blood reigning within this realm, ye shall not fail desire the weal and tranquillity thereof."—State Papers Published by Government Commission.

in his hands; and, above all, to carry out the arrangement that the infant Mary should be sent to the English court, to be educated and kept under his charge until her marriage with his son Edward.* It was but a fitting close to such humiliating conditions that, should these be rejected by the Scottish parliament, the released nobles should either return to their bondage in England, or employ all the forces they could command in co-operating with the English for the subjugation of Scotland. That the pledges exacted might be weighty and solemn, a regular bond, containing the foregoing stipulations, was subscribed and sworn to by the Scottish nobles, before they were allowed to return to their own country; and they had also to leave behind them their eldest sons or other nearest relatives as hostages. The personal liberty which they thus got from Henry, apart from its most dishonourable price, was unworthy of the name: they were to return to Scotland not as freemen, even only for a moment, but as the alert, vigilant, and hard-working agents and servants of the English monarch. It would be a waste of indignation to censure the barons who, for the sake of such, or indeed of any personal liberty, or from base motives of personal aggrandisement, agreed to betray that national independence which neither Henry nor previous monarchs, still more daring and subtle, could ever destroy by united force and guile. Their patriotism was not of the pure stamp, though it had passed through the ordeal of Solway Moss,—an ordeal, indeed, not fitted to detect either traitors or cowards, for instead of fighting there had been nothing but running! Their selfishness, we may suppose, had not yet grown and ripened, like that of the Earl of Angus and the Douglasses, under the sunshine of Henry's favour and the showers of English gold, so as to leave no room for their patriotism, and to make them unnaturally apathetic to the claims of their country: but prison-life was galling and irksome to feudal chiefs who had each freely ranged over a mountainous district and ruled its population; not to speak of Henry being capable of making confinement something worse than disagreeable: and they might hope that the good genius of Scotland, so long and in emergencies so often propitious, might save her from their treachery. The leading barons, the Earls of Glencairn and Cassilis, and the Lords Maxwell, Somerville, and Oliphant,† subscribed the English king's stipulations, and departed for Scotland on the 1st of Jan., 1543. † It is unknown whether the less influential of the Scottish captives remained behind in durance from virtue or from necessity, and whether Henry had thought it not worth his while to bribe them or had failed, owing to their higher honour and sterner patriotism. Their released brethren on their way 'dined at Enfield, in order to see the young prince, whose cause they were to take in hand;*' and, after waiting at Newcastle for the arrival of their hostages, who were to be delivered up to the Duke of Suffolk, proceeded to Scotland, which they appear to have entered about the same time as the Earl of Angus and his able and crafty brother, the latter of whom was to be the chief agent in carrying out Henry VIII.'s project. They reached Edinburgh about the middle of January.†

A few days previous to their arrival,‡ the funeral of the deceased king was solemn- The late king's fu- ized with all the magnificence of neral, and his national sorrow. The carefully daughter's baptism. embalmed body was conveyed from Falkland to Edinburgh, attended by the Regent, Cardinal Beaton, the Earls of Argyle, Marischal and Rothes, and a long train of the nobility and gentry, attired in deep mourning, with lighted torches carried before them. James was buried in the chapel of Holyrood§ amid the lamentations of the people, by whom he had been greatly beloved. The baptism of his infant successor took place about the same time.|| It cannot be doubted that these two ceremonies were an excellent loyal and patriotic preparation for encountering Henry VIII.'s agents, and for considering the proposals with which they were commissioned. A deeper and yet tenderer nationality must have been communicated. The reforming nobles would feel that whilst an alliance with England was most desirable, as tending to weaken the Popish and French party, yet it must not be allowed to compromise Scotland's integrity and independence. The Regent, naturally weak and timid, appears to have got an accession of nationality, for, along with his friends, he exhibited both in public and in private such a port of honest, resolute, and vigilant patriotism as abashed Henry's pensioners, and made them, against their original instructions, and in spite of the remonstrances and taunts which they were often re

‡ According both to Buchanan and Keith, the king's funeral took place on the 14th of January; but the Comptrol of Kirkaldy of Grange, quoted by Miss Strickland, fixes it on the 8th.

§ Keith says that, in his day, the "embalmed body is yet to be seen whole and entire. In the same vault are likewise to be seen the bodies of Queen Magdalene, of the Lord Darnley, husband of Queen Mary, the king's daughter, and the Countess of Argyle, his natural daughter, &c., all which bodies are lying open to the view within the vault the coffins having been broke open by a disorderly mob in the month of December, 1638."—Keith's History, p. 22.

|| "The local traditions of Linlithgow affirm that Mary was baptised in the stately abbey church of St. Michael's, at a point out a small stone eistern or lavatory attached to the wall, in which they pretend the infant queen was immersed. As the time was mid-winter, it is more probable that the office was performed in the beautiful chapel-royal within the palace, which terminates the suite of royal apartments than that the health of the tender babe was imperilled by carrying her into the large, cold church."—Lives of the Scottish Queens, vol. iii. p. 6.

† Keith also mentions Lords Gray and Fleming.

‡ Mr. Tytler mentions that Sir George Douglas preceded the captives into Scotland by two days. This, however, must be an error, for it appears, from a letter of Sir George's previously referred to, that even so late as the 10th of January he had not left England. Both Keith and Buchanan fix on the 1st of January as the day on which the captives quitted London. The same historians also say that the Earl of Angus and the two Douglasses entered Scotland in company.

ceiving from England respecting their bare and unsatisfactory reports, carefully conceal each one of the many dishonourable terms of the projected alliance.

The Douglasses and the released nobles did, indeed, find it necessary to proceed with the greatest caution, and to hold in strict reserve such stipulations as sending the young queen at once to England, giving Henry a share in the government, and filling the Scottish fortresses with English garrisons; for these would have been as indignantly rejected by the Regent and those who had chosen him, though they anxiously sought a fair alliance, as by Cardinal Beaton and the Queen-mother, who strongly reprobated any friendship with England.* Before the council,† which the Regent had summoned on their arrival, they urged the union in such a way as to give no indications of those base conditions which treated Scotland as a mere province of England; and though the project was most favourably and even enthusiastically entertained by the council, Henry's agents had not the courage to hint at his despotic and arrogant terms. There was one man, however, too quick not to suspect their secret aims. Cardinal Beaton, disappointed of the regency, and hating everything that came from England, from its being both English and anti-Popish, as well as because the proposed union was supported by Arran and his party, had at once marked the dissatisfied air of Sir George Douglas and the restored nobles, and apprehended the intrigues which were on foot; and he was fertile in resources to counteract their plots. The late king had, on his death-bed, when hearing of his daughter's birth, remarked despondingly, 'Miseries approach this poor kingdom: King Henry will labour to make it his own by arms or by marriage.†' Beaton had not less sagacity than his dying master; and, on the Earl of Arran's appointment to the regency, opened a correspondence with France, in which he represented the danger both to the church and the state involved in a union between Edward Prince of Wales and the infant Queen of Scots, and strongly urged that France should supply him with money, arms, and soldiers, to carry on a just struggle against the designs of England.§ He also addressed himself to work upon the feelings of various parties at home: the patriotic he filled with jealousy and hatred of England, as seeking to destroy Scottish independence; and he brought before the middle and commercial classes the fact that, during a time of peace between the two countries, the English monarch had not scrupled to seize and detain Scottish merchant-vessels, and to appropriate their rich cargoes. A strong reaction in favour of the Cardinal and his ostensibly patriotic views was beginning to set in; and the Scottish nobles, who had just returned from England, and whose appearance at the Scottish court as delegates from Henry had confirmed the Cardinal's suspicions and pointed the insinuations which he scattered amongst the people, felt that this reaction would be overwhelming as soon as they should fully disclose the conditions which Henry annexed to the proposed alliance. It was, therefore, necessary that a bold step should be taken, and that Beaton should be arrested and imprisoned. The Regent, ignorant of their ulterior designs, and only knowing the fair side of the treaty of marriage, was hearty and ready in sanctioning and executing the resolution to restrain and disarm a man so formidably hostile to an advantageous union between the two countries; and the attempt was farther coloured with justice, and made to wear the aspect of a government prosecution for a treasonable correspondence with France on the part of Beaton.

Accordingly, on the 20th of January the Cardinal was apprehended, and put under Beaton arrested and the custody of Lord Seton, in the imprisoned on the castle of Blackness.* On the 20th January. authority of the Regent regular proclamation was also made that every man, as he would escape the charge and the penalty of treason, should resist to the utmost of his power the landing of any French forces. A fleet seen off Holy Island, and suspected to be under the command of the Duke of Guise, for the overthrow of Arran and of the party favourable to an alliance with England, occasioned this latter proceeding; but the fleet turned out to be several Scottish ships-of-war, that had captured and were bringing to land nineteen English vessels as prizes. It was fixed by the council that a parliament should meet on the 12th of March, both for the consideration of the match between Edward and Mary, and for the trial of Cardinal Beaton; and it was also agreed upon that Henry should be requested to accede to a temporary cessation of war, and to grant a safe conduct to the Scottish ambassadors who might be sent to the English court for the full and final settlement of the proposed union.

But Beaton's summary apprehension and confinement had made a great sensation, and produced serious effects. His clergy throughout the land took a most impressive mode of testifying their sympathy

But Beaton's summary apprehension and confinement had made a great sensation, and produced serious effects. His clergy throughout the land took a most impressive mode of testifying their sympathy

* Sir Thomas Wharton, writing on the 2nd of February, 1542-3, to the Duke of Suffolk, says: "My said arrest sheweth the ordre of the taking of the Cardinal, made after the form as I have writtyn. He may be had the proclamation made after the same at the Cross in Edinburgh, by the governor and the nobles with him, that his taking was for certain treasons against the king, and not for any taking away the funds of the church."—Mrs. Lettis in State Paper Office, quoted by Tytler, vol. v. p. 263.

with him, and their horror at his treatment. They abandoned their functions; they suspended all public religious services, closed all the churches, and refused in all cases to administer the sacraments of baptism and burial—as if Scotland, until purged of the crime against the Cardinal, could have no relations with Heaven, but was wholly reprobate and disowned.* Nothing sacred could be exhibited or done in the presence, or immediate neighbourhood, of a people so awfully guilt-laden. The whole apparatus of priestly mediatorship between God and man had to be taken down, covered up, and hidden. It could not be permitted to stand or to be seen upon a soil so accursed; and on it there could not hang a symbol for the new-born babe, or a decent ceremony for the dead man. And this thorough and tremendous privation of religion—in imitation of the scene of Christ's crucifixion—exclusively on account of Cardinal Beaton having been seized and imprisoned! Reformed doctrines had spread widely enough to mitigate considerably the effect of this clever artifice in the Cardinal's favour, and to teach the people that for the church to lock up her creed, mysteries, sacraments, and ceremonies, was no proof that God was angry with, or hardened against, them. Still, a general gloom prevailed during the period that the Romish worship was suspended.

It may be presumed that the clergy, exercising none of their priestly functions, were yet far from being idle, but would be plying energetically all their forces and arts of agitation in favour of the Cardinal's release and ascendancy; and that his cause would prosper all the more from their attention being turned away from sacred to secular labour. Though unemployed at the altar they had another occupation, for which they were still better trained—that of political faction and intrigue. With means of access to all classes in the nation, they would freely and widely communicate most serviceable sentiments and sympathies; and, doubtless, on this occasion they were not a little instrumental in increasing the dislike for the English alliance. They had reason to fear that if, through that alliance, the Reformation were to triumph in Scotland, their present ecclesiastical feint would become a sad and permanent fact; the functions which they had voluntarily suspended would be taken away from them altogether and finally, and the Popish religion, which they had now theatrically veiled in sackcloth and withdrawn from the public, would be wrapped in its winding-sheet and buried out of sight. The very disuse, though both temporary and artful, of Romish ministrations would suggest to them the compulsory cessation of these under the victorious Reformation; and their leisure would be occupied in taking every measure against the possibility of such a disaster to their church, their order, and their party. At the same time, it probably was true of that particular agitation, as of most of the agitations that were carried on by the Romish clergy, that it looked more general and formidable than it really was; still, a formidable appearance to an agitation often goes far to secure success. At all events, the reaction against the English alliance was becoming stronger. Many of the Scots, jealous of the English monarch's designs, and suspicious of the character of the Douglasses and the released Scottish prisoners, were beginning to regard Beaton as the supporter of national independence, and as having been specially obnoxious on that ground to those who had apprehended and imprisoned him. The Cardinal in prison was a greater favourite than he had ever been when at large. The Earls of Huntly, Bothwell, and Moray demanded that he should be set free, guaranteeing his appearance on the day of trial to confront his accusers. This was denied; and the denial increased the general suspicions. Argyle, one of the most influential nobles in the kingdom, immediately retired to his own feudal territory, to marshal his forces on the Cardinal's side for the struggle which seemed inevitable.

* Sir Thomas Wharton, writing on 1st February, 1542-3, to the Duke of Suffolk, says: "And considering this business that is upon the taking of the Cardinal, whiche at this present is in such a staye that they can cause no priest within Scotland to saye masse syne the Cardinall was taken, neyler to crysten or burye."—Tytler, vol. v. p. 264.

At this critical juncture the English king's proposals were nearly ruined by his King Henry's own precipitate and violent conduct. He demanded that Beaton, to whom he had become furiously hostile, should be delivered over to him for imprisonment in England;* a grosser exhibition of tyranny over Scotland than of persecution against the Cardinal, and an arrogant assertion of his prerogatives as lord-paramount of the kingdom. He also urged upon the Douglasses and the Scottish prisoners that their engagements to procure the surrender of the fortresses should be fulfilled; he being, doubtless, apprehensive that these fortresses might otherwise soon be occupied by strong detachments of French troops, arriving under the command of the Duke of Guise, and also aware that were they in the possession of his own forces the remaining objects of his ambition would be forthwith attained. Constitutionally impatient and sanguine, he appears to have thought that just as easily and quickly as he let loose the Douglasses and the captive Scottish nobles, would these deliver into his hands the infant queen, the government, and the strongholds of Scotland. Sir George Douglas, with the view of influencing the king to a wiser and more cautious policy, sought an interview with Lord Lisle, warden of the English border; and at this interview, which took place at Berwick, he showed how

* "I asked hym whether his broder and he wold deliver the Cardynal to the King's majesty [some words in the document are here illegible from damp] if his highness to have hym. Whereat he [Sir George Douglas] studied a lytell, and said that if they shulde do soo, they [should be] mistrasted as of England's partie, but that he shuld be as surely kept as if he were in England, for neyther governor nor any oder in Scotland shall have hym out of their hands."—Lord Lisle's Letter to the Duke of Suffolk, Feb. 2, 1542-3, quoted in Tytler, vol. v. p. 265.

reforming nobles were overruled by the Catholic party, otherwise those instructions would have been much more, if not altogether, in accordance with the wishes of the English monarch, and of his bribed agents in Scotland. Now, up to this time, and for a short subsequent period, Arran and his party were entirely ignorant of anything dishonourable in Henry's aims; and whilst, therefore, we must regard them as the strenuous supporters of an alliance with England, we must also assign to them a full share in preparing and in giving effect to the patriotic and every way admirable articles and rules of negotiation to which the Scottish ambassadors, when in England, were strictly to adhere. The Regent and the nobles of his party had hitherto been, and continued to be, incorruptible by what was bad in Henry's policy. The honour of their ancient nation and of their infant sovereign was dear to them; and they were determined that it should not be compromised in the proposed alliance. How cordially they must have sanctioned what was done by the parliament will appear afterwards from Sir Ralph Sadler's thorough dissatisfaction at the character of his interviews with them. On the other hand, it is probable that the barons and gentry, the bishops and abbots, who had formed the Perth assembly on the previous week, instead of going to Parliament—as has been too charitably supposed*—'to fetter the marriage with such conditions as should insure the independence of their country,' went to oppose, from party and selfish considerations, that marriage on any terms, and were only deterred by the well-grounded conviction, that, for the present, they would be labouring in vain. Certainly they had no greater share than their opponents in arranging the patriotic and loyal stipulations to be urged by the Scottish ambassadors in negotiating the marriage. It is at this point that party-historians begin to furnish an un candid version of the grand era that was about to dawn upon Scotland. They identify Arran and the reforming barons with the Douglasses and the released nobles: they allege against them the same secret knowledge of Henry's despotic designs, and the same treacherous plots to promote them; and, knowing well the effect of a bad name, they give them a common appellation—the English faction'—whilst their opponents are complimented as the only inheritors, and the only defenders of genuine Scottish patriotism.

The substance of the instructions given by Parliament to the ambassadors was as follows:—The preamble sets forth that the proposed peace and marriage are desirable to Scotland in consideration of the 'adversite of tyme bigane, and of the dangerous apperand of the stait of the tyme instant, and sicklik to cum'—[the adversity of the past, and the dangerous appearance of the state at present and for the future]—and empowers the Regent to make farther conditions, to be submitted to his council, and ratified by the lords of articles, for the guidance of the ambassadors. The conditions are urged in the shape of replies to any demands that might be made by King Henry for security that Scotland would do her part in keeping the 'said contract.' And, first, if he should ask that the infant queen ^{Regarding the queen's person.} be delivered up to him, or sent to England to be reared until the time for celebrating the marriage between her and Edward Prince of Wales, the ambassadors were to answer decisively that this was 'ane ryte hie and ryte grete inconvenient to the realme of Scotland;' and that it 'cannot be grantit be resoun, but that hir grace may remane and be kept in this realme quhill sche may be abill to complete mariage.' It was added that parliament decreed that Mary was to be under the nurture of her mother, and in the charge of four lords of the realm, to be chosen for their loyal character. In the event of the King of England desiring that some Englishmen, or 'Ingliis ladyis,' should form a part of the young queen's court, it was to be answered, that 'honorable knyts of England—ane or twa—with als [as] mony ladyis of honour, with their servandis, men and women,' might wait upon Mary, but entirely at the King of England's expense. In the event either of the decease or of the departure out of the realm of the Queen-mother, some of the most noble and virtuous of the Scottish ladies were to be chosen to be near the person of the young sovereign.

Again, if Henry were to demand, as pledges for fulfilment of the contract, either ^{Regarding fortresses and hostages.} that any of the Scottish fortresses should be put into his hands, or that any of the Scottish nobles should be given up to him as hostages, the same decisive reply returned in reference to the queen's person was to be repeated.

Farther, should the marriage be agreed to, it was provided that the privileges, The independence rights, and liberties of Scotland of Scotland to be should be strictly preserved as ^{preserved.} those of an independent and separate kingdom, and that the government should be held during Mary's minority by Regent Arran, without any interference or 'impediment' from Henry or his successors. The Regent was also to draw and distribute the revenue of the state, without rendering any account to the English monarch. On the queen's coming of age, and after her marriage in England, whether she had heirs of her body or not, Scotland was ever to keep her own name, her old liberties, privileges, and immunities in everything, to be ruled by a native governor, to be under her own laws, to have one seat and college of justice ('sitand in the tolbuith of Edinburgh'), and all her sheriffs, stewards, and other officials. It was stipulated that neither the queen, when also Queen of England, nor her successors, should have the prerogative of summoning any Scottish parliament, unless one to meet within the realm of Scotland. On Mary's marriage and residence in England the Earl of Arran was to become Regent for life, and to be succeeded by his nearest heir. In the event of the queen's becoming a widow without children she was to be delivered up by the English king, unmarried, and without any engagement of her person or obligation upon her kingdom, but altogether free from any relationship to England. If she, however, were to have heirs as successors, and if these were to die, then the nearest heir in Scotland was to succeed to all the prerogatives and privileges of the crown, without any obstruction from the King of England. Some minor directions were added regarding the contract of peace between the two countries.* The commissioners

The ambassadors. appointed by parliament to carry these articles to the English court were Sir James Learmont, of Baleomy, the Treasurer; Henry Balnaves, of Hall-hill, the Secretary of State; and Sir William Hamilton, of Sanquhar.

The parliament next reversed the attainder of other proceedings Angus and the Douglasses, and of the parliament. restored them to their rank and possessions. Eight keepers of the infant sovereign's person were also selected, the choice falling on the Earls Marshal and Montrose, with the Lords Erskine, Ruthven, Lindsay of the Byres, and Seton, and Sir James Sandilands, of Calder, two of whom were, each quarter in succession, to have the special guardianship. The sovereign was not to be removed from one residence to another without the concurrence of the Queen-dowager, Regent Arran, and his council.† Mary's court was to be held at Linlithgow Palace, presided over by her mother. A council was named for the Regent, consisting of the Archbishop of Glasgow, the Bishops of Aberdeen, Moray, Orkney, Ross, and Brechin; the Abbots of Dunfermline and Cupar; the Earls of Angus, Huntly, Moray, Argyle, Bothwell, Marshal, Cassilis, and Gleneairn; the Lords Erskine, Ruthven, Maxwell, Seton, and Methven, George Douglas, the Provost of Aberdeen, Sir William Hamilton, Sir James Learmont, the Clerk-register, the Justice-clerk, and the Queen's Advocate; the presence of not fewer than six of whom was necessary to constitute a regular meeting of council. This important parliament was prorogued on the 17th of March, and the lords of articles were empowered to sit and introduce measures for the general welfare of the nation. Of these, by far the most memorable was one permitting all to read the Holy Scriptures in an approved translation, though the people were still forbidden to dispute about the controverted opinions. This was vehemently opposed by the Archbishop of Glasgow, who entered a protest both for himself and the whole ecclesiastical estate, till the proposition should be discussed by a provincial council. The proposition, however, became law, the Regent publicly ratifying it, and the Bible was soon in many hands.

Sadler, Henry's experienced and subtle ambassador, reached Edinburgh too late for the English ambassador's arrival. This was really unimportant, however much he might regret it; for he could not have operated upon the great majority of the three estates, so as to have gained larger concessions for his master, and his best chances lay in getting at the barons individually or in small groups. He was warmly welcomed by the Douglasses; but if they imagined that his presence in Scotland would in any way or to any extent lessen their responsibility to the English king, or mitigate the character of their failure in what they had promised, they were mistaken, for, in reference to Angus and Sir George Douglas, Sadler came more as a spy than an ally. Indeed, their promises, before leaving England, had been so extensive and unconditional that no assistance should have been necessary—a circumstance with which they were often bitterly upbraided by the royal taskmaster to whom they had sold themselves. Sadler was greatly disappointed with the intelligence which they communicated respecting the progress of the cause, and especially about the proceedings of parliament. He saw that so far from their having gained a strong party to support Henry's plans to obtain possession of the queen's person, the government, and the fortresses, they had not even dared to mention such designs. Sir George Douglas assured him that an alliance on such terms was "impossible to be done at this time, and that there was not so little a boy but he will hurl stones against it, and the wives will handle their distaffs, and the commons universally will rather die in it; yea, and many noblemen and all the clergy be fully against it."* The ambassador saw that no progress had been made, though this crafty and unscrupulous partizan had according to his own statement been so industrious and anxious in the prosecution of his cause, that since coming to Scotland he had not slept for more than three hours each night.† His promises however were renewed, with an assurance that Henry's terms would be fully granted if a little patience were exercised in urging them. The interviews of Sadler with the released Scottish nobles were equally unsatisfactory.

The Earl of Arran, timid, irresolute, and easily swayed by the leaders of contending parties among the Scots, was yet, in his simple honesty, proof against the varied wiles of English diplomacy. Sadler had been counselled by the Douglasses to keep his master's terms in reserve when conversing with the Regent; and Sadler soon had occasion to know that the advice was of little value only from the fact that no disclosure, however well-timed and skilful, and backed too by cogent persuasions, in the shape of both bribes and menaces, could win Arran's concurrence. The Regent praised Henry VIII. highly, and was most gracious to his representative; but though he declared himself warmly in favour of the proposed marriage and peace, he always introduced some qualifying phrase respecting the claims of his own sovereign and of his own country.* He took no offence at the style of the English king's message, though it was addressed to him as only a temporary Regent—'The Earl of Arran, occupying the place of governor,†—not being aware of Henry's designs, which were incompatible with the maintenance of his own regency, and not being told of the reproaches heaped by the English ambassador upon the Douglasses and the restored captives for allowing that regency to be ratified and made permanent by an act of the late parliament. The Regent was well affected to Henry, and hated Cardinal Beaton; yet so exacting and offensive were Henry's aims and the style of his negotiations, that the Regent was far more likely to be drawn into a reconciliation with Beaton, than to continue faithful to the English alliance.

There was, however, one influential person in Scotland who treated Sadler and his errand with the guile of the abundance of graciousness, and Queen-mother. volunteered the largest promises of support. This was Mary of Guise, the Queen-mother,—the very last ally that could have been dreamed of, Cardinal Beaton himself not excepted. But it was only the mask of an ally which she had put on. Her profound dissimulation was more than a match for the diplomatic practice of the English ambassador. She affected to be enthusiastically in favour of the marriage of her infant daughter with Prince Edward, declaring that 'the world might justly note her to be the most unnatural and unwise woman that lived, if she did not heartily desire and rejoice in the same, for she knew not throughout the world any marriage could be found so proper, so beneficial and honourable as this; and that she could not but regard it as the work of God, for the conjunction and union of both their realms, that she, who had hitherto had only sons, should now have brought forth a daughter for the best of purposes.† She even professed a wish that Mary should be delivered into the custody of the English monarch, until she should be of age, and declared that such a measure was necessary, both for the personal safety of the infant queen, and as a security to Henry that the marriage should be completed faithfully on the part of the Scots.§ She expressed her conviction that the Regent was opposed to the match, and would never consent to it, and that his paramount object was to bring about a matrimonial alliance between Mary and his own son.* She declared herself apprehensive of her daughter's safety in the charge of Arran. 'It hath seldom been seen,' she said, 'that the heir of the realm should be in the custody of him that claimeth the succession of the realm, as the governor is now established by parliament the second person in the realm, and—if my daughter fail—looketh to be king of the same.' She represented the Regent as giving out that the infant queen was sickly and not likely to live, as a sort of warning to prepare the nation for what he and his friends might intend; and then this accomplished actress, affecting motherly pride, took the ambassador into Mary's chamber, and had the beautiful babe exhibited naked before him.† The Queen-dowager's aim was to create suspicion and dissension between the English court and the Regent, and also, perhaps, to draw Sadler into a plot for carrying off the infant sovereign, the discovery of which would excite the intense indignation of the whole Scottish nation, and put the project of an English alliance to a violent end. Though Sadler reported her conversation, accompanied with Regent Arran's flat contradictions, yet Henry appears to have believed to some extent in her sincerity.

Still, the favourable statements made by the Queen-mother, though gratifying, did not materially lessen his grievous disappointment and anger at learning that nothing had been accomplished for him by the Douglasses and the captive nobles, and that their presence in Scotland had produced no effect upon the proceedings of the Scottish parliament, since articles were about to be submitted to him which would put a direct and comprehensive negative upon his most cherished aims. He sent an upbraiding message to the leaders of his faction, bidding them give him deeds and not mere words, and assuring them of his determination not to withdraw a single iota of his original demands, and that—gentler means failing—he would use force in compelling the Scottish nation to deliver their sovereign into his hands. In this case, his bargain with them was also to be enforced to the letter, so that they must either prepare to assist him in the subjugation of Scotland, or return to their captivity in England.

ing any alliance between the two countries. He had been in the charge of Lord Seton, who, though nearly related to the Regent, was a staunch Catholic.

* Sadler thus writes to Henry of the Regent's assurances: "Your Majesty had his heart above all princes, and should have him at command in all things reasonable, saving his duty of allegiance to his sovereign lady and this realm. He will in all things shew and declare himself most addicted to the king's majesty, and most willing to satisfy all his lawful desires, not offending the liberty and freedom of this realm."—Sadler's State Papers, vol. i. pp. 66, 120.

* Regent Arran himself acknowledged to Sadler that a marriage between the young Queen of Scots and his own son had once been mentioned by him to her mother, who cordially acquiesced in the proposal, but that he had forborne all thoughts of it on learning the wishes of Henry VIII.

† 'I assure your Majesty,' writes Sadler to Henry, 'it is as goodly a child as I have seen of her age, and as like to live with the grace of God.' In Sadler's next interview with the Regent, he alluded to the fine health of Mary, with a view to ascertain whether or not Arran had spread the report mentioned by the Queen-dowager, and Arran at once assented to Sadler's observation. (Vol. i. p. 91.)

Lord Seton—not without the Regent's consent—had allowed Beaton to remove from Blackness to his castle of St. Andrews, where the Cardinal's men were so numerous as to defy any attempt, if it had been made, on the part of Seton and the small force that had gone thither, to take him back. The Regent alleged that he was not privy to the plot for the liberation of Beaton, but had sanctioned his removal to St. Andrews as likely to secure for him possession of the castle, as well as of the person of the Cardinal, and to induce the clergy again, and more especially at Easter, to exercise their spiritual functions, the suspension of which was still a source of distraction and disquiet to the population.* It is more probable that his consent to the Cardinal's removal was won by Hamilton, Abbot of Paisley, his natural brother, who had recently returned from France, and had begun to exercise a great influence over him.† The Abbot was strongly attached to Beaton, who thus henceforward had an able and subtle mediator, for himself and his policy, with the Regent. Beaton now professed himself a cordial supporter of the Earl of Arran's administration, and even sent a communication to the English ambassador, assuring him that he was anxious to serve Henry VIII., as a prince whom he greatly admired, and to promote any union with England which would not sacrifice the freedom and independence of Scotland.‡ Whilst he had gained the Abbot of Paisley to use his influence with Arran in his behalf, he succeeded in bringing into the field another important ally, with a fear of whose claims he hoped to sway still farther the fickle and timid Regent.

Arrival of the Earl of Lennox, by his advice, and with a message for France.

Regent, from Francis the First, had just returned from France. This young nobleman regarded Arran as both a usurper and an enemy. He was closely related to the royal family; and James V. had once declared that were he to die childless Lennox should be his successor.§ His pretensions as next heir to the crown, and consequently as the proper regent, were considered by the clergy as preferable to those of Arran.|| Lennox also laid claim to the immense paternal property held by the Regent. To show that he was hostile to Arran, and to Arran's administration and policy, he remained at Linlithgow Palace for weeks, instead of repairing to the Regent at Edinburgh, though he was charged with a message for him from the French monarch. By supporting the title of Lennox as the rightful one Beaton had a sure hold upon Arran's fears, and by working upon these he afterwards gained him completely over to his views. The ambition of Lennox was also excited by the prospect which the Cardinal held out that he would obtain the hand of the Queen-dowager: and she in the midst of all her guile practised upon Sadler, the English ambassador, had inclination and skill to coquette both with Lennox and the Earl of Bothwell. Though concocting misrepresentations for Sadler, and plotting with the Cardinal, the royal widow had leisure and tact to bestow flattering but insincere encouragement upon the rival suitors for her love.

Hard plied by these manifold and conflicting influences, the simple Regent was in a state of utter perplexity and distraction. The impressions made on him by one party to-day were on the morrow effaced and superseded by others from the opposing party; but it might even then have been foretold which of the two parties would ultimately gain the ascendancy over him. In all his interviews with the English ambassador the superiority of England was offensively assumed by the latter. Arran was urged to concede to Henry not what was reasonable, but what would satisfy the imperious monarch, and he felt that he and his country were treated as if in vassalage. The opposing party dealt with him in no such humbling way: he was reasoned with, instead of being overborne, and generally soothed and flattered, instead of being insulted.

Meanwhile the Scottish ambassadors had reached London, and had submitted and explained to the English monarch the terms which were propounded in London.

by the parliament for the proposed union. He expressed his utter dissatisfaction. At first, he insisted on the young queen being immediately put into his custody, but afterwards urged a modified demand that this should take place when she had completed the second year of her age. As for the government of Scotland, he peremptorily required that it should be forthwith handed over to him, in virtue of his right as hereditary lord-superior of the realm. The ambassadors firmly adhered to and defended their instructions, and gave it as their opinion that the very request of Henry's conditions would excite indignation throughout Scotland, and prevent any alliance. And so it proved: for, on hearing of the English exactions, the people became furious and the Regent stern. In an interview with Sadler, he characterized Henry's demands as "very sharp, and such as he was sure the states of the realm would not agree unto; and for his part, he could not be induced nor persuaded to condescend unto the same. First, his § Buchanan's History.

|| "Matthew, Earl of Lennox, had to wife a daughter of the Lord Hamilton, by Mary, daughter to King James II. By her he had his son and heir, John, who was appointed a lord of the regency in the minority of King James V., and was slain at the bridge of Linlithgow, by a party headed by the Lord Hamilton, then become Earl of Arran. John was father to Matthew, the present Earl of Lennox, whose pretensions to the crown stood thus: James, Earl of Arran, son to his father, by Princess Mary Stewart, daughter of James II. (by virtue of whom the family of Hamilton have a claim to the regal succession), after he had been divorced from Lady Elizabeth Home [and before her death], had by his subsequent wife, James, the present Earl of Arran. Therefore, the Earl of Lennox alleged that he was but a bastard, and that himself inherited the rights of the family of Hamilton, as being descended from a daughter of Princess Mary."—Keith's History, p. 30.

majesty would have the child delivered and brought into England within two years, and pledges in the mean season for the same, which he thought to be against all reason; for, having her in England, if it should please God to call the prince [Edward] to his mercy, his majesty might marry her to whom he pleased within his own realm, against the will and consent of this realm; besides other inconveniences which might grow of her being out of her own realm. Secondly, his majesty would have them friends to friends and enemies to enemies, by mean whereof they should lose their old friends, as France and Denmark. But to the third part, which touched himself for the place of governour here, he passed not thereupon; for he regarded not so much the authority of the place, as he tendered his duty to his sovereign lady, and the wealth and benefit of the realm.* On Sadler intimating that his master would proceed to extremities, in the event of his terms not being complied with, Arran replied, "He could not see what cause his majesty had to make war upon them, their sovereign lady being an innocent, that never offended his majesty." Sadler observed that "his majesty would direct his proceedings to the war in her quarrel for her surety and defence, and for the wealth of her realm against them who, without consideration, do seem thus to condemn and neglect the same." Arran indignantly asked if the ambassador "called it her benefit to destroy her realm?" It was answered that it was "her benefit and great honour to be made a queen of two realms by a just and rightful title, where she had now scarce a good title to one." The Regent made the sarcastic rejoinder that "he wished to God that every one had his right, and that they were quit of our [the English] cumber."† Nor were his patriotic scruples to be overcome by bribes, any more than by threats. He was not insensible to the honour which Sadler was authorised by his master to offer to him—a marriage between his son and King Henry's daughter, the Princess Elizabeth;‡ but it was pressed upon him in vain.

† Ibid. p. 165.

‡ "Then went I," writes Sadler to King Henry, "to the point touching the marriage to be had betwixt your majesty's said daughter and the governor's son, which matter I handled with him as seriously as my poor wit could serve me, and as near as I could, omitted no point of the charge which your majesty gave me in that part by your said letters. The governor, understanding the great honour your majesty did offer unto him in that behalf, put off his cap, and said, 'He was most bound of all men unto your majesty, in that it pleased the same, being a prince of so great reputation in the world, to offer such alliance and marriage with so poor a man as he is, for the which he should bear his heart and service to your majesty next unto his sovereign lady during his life. He confessed both what honour the same should be unto him, and what advancement of his blood in the reputation of the world; what benefit, honour, and surety it should be to himself and all his posterity; and also what stay and assistance he might thereby have of your majesty, as well in the quieture and continuance of his place, office, and authority of this government, without interruption,' and then the Regent digressed to other subjects of talk. I returned, then," adds Sadler, "to the matter we were in before, and asked him what I should write to your majesty of his answer to

The confirmation, contained in letters to the Regent from the Scottish ambassadors in London, of the report respecting the demands of Henry, strengthened Arran's alienation from the English party, and he made no secret of his resolution to risk war rather than comply with the degrading exactions. He also at this time ordered away his two Protestant chaplains,* probably at the urgent advice of his brother, the Abbot of Paisley, and for the sake rather of their political than of their religious influence.

The popular views and sentiments were still more unequivocally and strongly hostile to Henry, and the feelings of the clergy were expressed in a convention held at St. Andrews, where it was determined that preparations for war should immediately be made, and that the private wealth of the ecclesiastics should be devoted, and the very church-plate should be melted down to defray the necessary expenses, whilst, should there be a lack of soldiers, priests of all ranks were to take the field.†

In this crisis, Sir George Douglas,‡ on whom the whole blame of the failure in the negotiation was cast, prevailed on the inconstant Regent and the

that overture of marriage which your highness hath in such sort made, as I had declared unto him? He put off his cap again, and prayed me 'To write unto your majesty that he most humbly thanked the same a thousand times for the great honour it pleased your highness to offer unto so poor a man as he was, and that he would communicate the same to his most seeret and trusty friends, as to his brother and Sir George Douglas, and not many more; whereupon, or it were long, your majesty should know his whole mind and resolution in that behalf.' I intend diligently to solicit his further answer to this overture of marriage."—Sadler's State Papers, vol. i. pp. 130, 131.

* Sadler's State Papers, vol. i. p. 158. Knox adds, that "The men of counsell, judgement, and godlinesse, that had travelled to promote the Governour, and that gave him faithfull counsell in all doubtfull matters, were either craftily conveyed from him, or else, by threatening to bee hanged, were compelled to leave him. Of the one number was the Laird of Grange, M. Henry Balneuer, M. Thomas Ballenden, and Sir David Lindesay, of the Mount: men by whose labours he was promoted to honour, and by whose counsell he so used himself at the beginning, that the obedience given to him was nothing inferior to that obedience that any king of Scotland of many years had before him. Yea, in this it did surmount the common obedience, in that it proceeded from love of those virtues that were supposed to have been in him. Of the number of those that were threatened, were M. Michael Durham, M. David Borthwike, David Forresse, and David Bothwell, who counselled him to have in company with him men fearing God, and not to nourish wicked men in their iniquity, albeit they were called his friends, and were of his surname. This counsell understood by the aforesaid Abbot, and by the Hamiltons (who then repaired to the court as ravens to the carrion), in plain words it was said, 'My Lord Governour nor his friends, will never be at quietnesse till a doxon of these knaves that abuse his Grace be hanged.'"—Knox's History, p. 40.

‡ Mr. Tytler (vol. v. p. 277) represents Sir George Douglas as paying a private visit to Henry VIII. in the beginning or middle of April, and prevailing on the king to relax the rigour of his demands. Sir George, it is stated, returned to Scotland with more equitable terms which he submitted to the Regent and council in the course of the same month, and which were accepted. Mr. Tytler narrates that then Sir George and the Earl of Glencairn were commissioned to go into England to make the final arrangements. These facts, had they been true, would have been mentioned by Sadler. Sadler, writing to the king on the 26th of April, refers to the visit to England of Sir George Douglas and the Earl of Glencairn, as then first thought of. (Sadler's State Papers, vol. i. p. 164.)

nobles to send a deputation, consisting of Sir George himself, and the Earl of Gleneairn, to the king, with the view of prevailing upon him to be satisfied with fewer and easier conditions.* The visit was successful.

Henry's demands that the principal Scottish fortress should be put into his hands, and that he should have a control over, or a share in, the government of Scotland, were withdrawn; whilst the interval before the infant queen should be delivered into his custody was to be greatly, if not reasonably, lengthened out. Sir George Douglas returned to Scotland, confident that the new and fairer terms of treaty would be adopted, for he could now state them without reserve, and urge them with all his skill and energy. Nor was he mistaken in his expectations. "The Regent," says Sadler, "was most willing and conformable to pass the articles without difficulty. He seeth nothing therein to be sticked at; nevertheless, it hath been thought best to him, and such of the council as be about him, to call the lords of the realm unto it, such as will come, because they shall not say hereafter that he concluded the same privily by himself, without calling them to council in that behalf; and, therefore, he sent forth letters, immediately upon the arrival here of the said Sir George, to sundry lords and noblemen of the realm to be here to-morrow [4th June, 1543] for that purpose, thinking that many of them will come, and he supposeth that none of them will stick at any of the said articles, unless it be at the delivery of the daughter of Scotland at ten years old, which nevertheless he trusteth easily to bring them unto."† At the convention (from which, however, the Cardinal and several influential nobles were absent) the proposed conditions, after some modifications, were agreed to, and in a few days Sir George Douglas was despatched to the English court to complete the arrangements. He, with the Earl of Gleneairn, and the three Scottish ambassadors sent by the parliament, met at Greenwich, with the English commissioners named by Henry,—Lord Audeley (the chancellor), Duke of Norfolk (treasurer), the Bishops of Winchester and Westminster, the Lord St. John (chamberlain), and Sir John Gage (comptroller of the king's household). The treaties were signed by the commissioners of both countries on the 1st of July, and remained to be ratified on the part of Henry within the space of two months from that date by his subscription, seal, and oath; and on the part of the Scottish nation by a confirmation and oath in name of the three estates of parliament, and by the subscription of the Regent and the great seal.*

* Hume of Godscroft, says that Sir George told the Scottish nobles the apologue of the physician, who, to escape the wrath of a tyrannical sultan, undertook to teach an ass to speak within the course of ten years; and justified the hopeless undertaking to his friends, by saying that he had gained a space in which either the king, or the ass, or he himself might die, in any of which events he escaped final punishment, and meantime lived in good estate and favour. "Even so," said Douglas, "we, being unprovided for war, gain by this treaty ten years of peace; during which, King Henry, or his son, or the queen may die; or the parties coming of age may refuse each other, or matters may so stand that the match may be concluded on more equal terms."—Godscroft, vol. ii. p. 113. This shows a good specimen of the able and artful manner in which Sir George Douglas sought to gain over the Regent and the body of reforming nobles.

The treaties were to the effect, that the marriage between Edward Prince of Wales and Mary Queen of Scots should take place as soon as that prince was of age; that Mary, until her tenth year was completed, should remain in Scotland under the care of the guardians who had been appointed by the Scottish parliament, though Henry was to be permitted to send an English nobleman, with his lady and attendants (not exceeding in all twenty persons), to form part of the young queen's household, and to 'oversee her education and diet;† that within a month after Mary entered her eleventh year she was to be delivered at Berwick to the commissioners selected to receive her; that, as hostages for the fulfilment of these conditions, two earls and four barons, or their heirs apparent, should within two months after the date of the treaty be sent to England, though the three estates might change the persons of the hostages once every half-year for other Scottish noblemen of the same rank and importance; that, in the event of Mary having issue by her husband, the kingdom of Scotland should still retain its own name, and enjoy its own laws, liberties, and privileges; and that between the two kingdoms there should be an inviolable peace during the lives of Edward and Mary, and for a year after the decease of the one who might die first. Henry had always peremptorily insisted that the ancient league between France and Scotland should be broken and all friendship forbidden, and that England and Scotland should be 'friends to friends and enemies to enemies;‡ but his commissioners failed in getting this made an article of the present treaty, and could only procure the insertion of a clause to the effect that neither of the two kingdoms should give, or suffer to be given by its subjects, assistance to any foreign aggressor, whatever alliance had been or might be formed.

Had Henry been sincere in acceding to such terms, he must have done so with extreme reluctance, falling as they did so far short of his wishes, both in the extent of advantage to himself and England, and also in the dispatch and certainty of attaining any such advantage. But he never laid aside the imperiousness, unless to exercise the cunning, of his nature; and on the very day that the English and Scottish commissioners concluded and signed the treaties of peace and marriage, his 'secret device' was drawn up—a document to be subscribed by the Douglasses and the Scottish barons taken at Solway, binding themselves to study exclusively the aims of Henry and the interests of England, so that, when any commotion arose in Scotland, "he should attain all the things then pactured and covenanted, or, at the least, the dominion on this side the Firth."* It is certain that the instrument was of no use to Henry, and it is highly improbable that it was signed by more than a small number of the Scottish nobility; but it shows the tenacity with which he adhered to his original proposals, and the dishonourable character of the diplomacy by which he sought to carry them into effect.

On the conclusion of the treaty, peace between the two countries had been proclaimed; and the ambassadors returned to Edinburgh with the full expectation that the ratification by the Regent and the parliament would immediately take place. During their absence, however, the Cardinal and his party had succeeded in organising a most formidable opposition to the alliance with England. Large forces had been concentrated, under the Earl of Huntly, in the north, and Argyle and Lennox in the west, whilst Bothwell, Home, and the Laird of Buccleuch hung upon the Borders with all their feudal strength. The Regent repeatedly acknowledged to the English ambassador the necessity of raising an army to put down this threatened rebellion, and expressed his determination to chastise and humble Beaton and the Earl of Lennox; but his timidity, or his indolence, allowed them daily to become stronger. It was rumoured that they meant to seize upon the person of the young queen, and remove her either to a stronghold held by their own party or to France. Sadler strongly urged that, to prevent this proceeding, Mary should be brought by the Regent to Edinburgh; an advice, the object of which Arran must have suspected, but which he mildly set aside as being beyond his power to adopt, for the sovereign was not to be removed from place to place, unless by the appointment of parliament.†

The Cardinal, however, and his partizan nobles

* This paper was first referred to by Mr. Tytler, who had found it in the State Paper Office. It is entitled "Copy of the Secret Device," and dated July the 1st, 1543. One of its paragraphs is as follows: "Fourthly, if there happen any division or trouble to arise in Scotland by practice of the Cardinal, kyrkmen, France, or otherwise, I shall sticke and adhere only to the king's majesty's service, as his highness may assuredly attayne these noe pactured and covenanted, as, at least, the dominion on this side of the Freythc."—"This," conjectures Mr. Tytler, "explains an obscure passage in 'Sadler's State Papers,' vol. i. p. 237: 'The said Earl of Angus hath subscribed the articles of the devise which your majesty sent unto me with your last letters, and the Lord Maxwell telleth me, that as soon as he received with subscribed the same. The rest I have not yet spoken with, because they be not here, but as soon as I can, I shall not fail to accomplish that part according to your gracious commandment.'"—Tytler's History, vol. v. pp. 281, 282.

were now ready for the bold enterprise of which they had been suspected; and, on the 21st of July, Lennox, Huntly, and Argyle, at the head of ten thousand men, marched to Edinburgh, where large forces, commanded by Bothwell, the Kers and the Scotts, joined them. No resistance which the Regent was capable of making against this combined army, would have been effectual; and Mary and the Queen-dowager (who favoured both the plot and the party executing it) were conveyed from Linlithgow Palace to Stirling castle, where the infant sovereign was put under the charge of Lord Erskine (hereditary keeper of the castle), Lord Lindsay of the Byres, Livingstone, and Graham.* King Henry had meditated a very different arrangement, for, in a letter to Sir Ralph Sadler, dated on the day after the young Queen of Scots had been conducted to Stirling castle, when he was ignorant of what had just occurred, he says: "Our pleasure is, that if this matter grow to such a garboil and extremity, as the young queen shall be removed from Linlithgow, you shall do what you can, by all good means and persuasion, both with the governor, the Earl of Angus, and Sir George Douglas, to get her removed to Temp-tallon [Tantallon]; but whether that shall be granted or no, you shall travel, that the old queen may be secluded from her, and left at Linlithgow, or where it shall please her; which the governor may, and has good cause to do, seeing this conspiracy for her surprise could not be made but by her consent."†

The possession of the queen's person gave Beaton's party new strength and energy, whilst that of the Regent was threatened with utter ruin, unless he were to throw himself entirely into the arms of Henry—a step which honour and patriotism alike forbade, and to which he could not be allured by the offer of Henry to make him king of that part of Scotland north of the Forth.‡ At the same time, the Cardinal's still more splendid bribe of a marriage between Arran's son and the infant queen did not prevail upon the Regent to abandon the open and comparatively fair and advantageous alliance of Scotland with England, or to refuse to ratify the treaty recently agreed upon by the commissioners of both countries. The ratification of the treaty on the 25th of August, in the abbey church of Holyrood, with great pomp, high-mass being sung with shalms and sackbuts;* the Regent, in the name and by the authority of the queen and the three estates of the realm, signing, and swearing to observe all the conditions of the treaty, and appending to it the great seal.

* Buchanan thus narrates the transaction: "Hamilton [the Regent] who had assembled all his friends around Edinburgh, had determined to break through to the queen, but perceiving himself inferior in strength, by the advice of his friends, and being himself more inclined to conciliatory measures, he began to treat about conditions of peace. Men of the most esteemed prudence were therefore sent by both parties to Kirkliston, a village midway between Edinburgh and Linlithgow, who agreed that the queen should be carried to Stirling upon these conditions, that four of the principal nobility, belonging to neither faction, should be chosen to superintend her education, and the following noblemen and chiefs of their families were nominated: William Graham, John Erskine, John Lindsay, and William Livingstone. These being confirmed by both parties, and having received the queen, took the road to Stirling, Lennox remaining under arms with his men until they had got beyond any danger from the adverse party."—Buchanan's History.

We may form some idea of the difficulties and temptations by which the weak Regent was now beset from the following curious coincidences. On the very day of the ratification, Sadler dined with him; and, in his report of the interview, after reciting some talk about five thousand pounds to be sent 'in loan,' by King Henry, for making preparations against the formidable opposition to the treaties just ratified, and after mentioning that the Regent was to depart 'this afternoon' to St. Andrews, for the purpose of 'composing all matters and controversies' with the Cardinal, who, in spite of his past and present proceedings, it was said, 'desired principally his majesty's favour,' Sadler refers to two topics not yet touched upon between them, but reserved by the wily ambassador for more effective treatment on a future occasion: "And touching the two points, for delivery of the strongholds in gage for the five thousand pounds, or delivery of the young queen into your majesty's hands, I moved not to the governour thereof in this conference, the rather because he seemed not now to press or desire the money: and besides that, I know the one part thereof he cannot perform, though he would, which is the delivery of the queen, for she is in such custody as he cannot come by her: and the strongholds, I am sure, he will not deliver, unless his enemies grow so strong upon him as he shall not be able to resist them. In which case, he must needs be enforced to do whatsoever your majesty will require; but if he shall eftsoons make any further request for money, I shall essay him in these two points, according to the propert of your most gracious letters addressed to me in that behalf."† The irresolute Arran left the company of Henry's sagacious and subtle diplomatist, who longed to tempt him to sell his infant queen and the fortresses of his country for five thousand pounds, and thus to break all those articles of that day's treaty, which were really of main importance: and where did he seek to go when escaped from the net of Sadler, as 'a bird from the snares of the fowler?' Into the presence of one possessed of far greater subtlety and daring—a man who had stirred up (and Arran knew it well) all the public odium in which he was now held by stigmatising his recent official proceedings as traitorous, and who would only cease to be his dangerous enemy in order that he might become his tempter and seducer. Why Arran should have been anxious for an interview with the Cardinal is rather mysterious; but Beaton would not grant it: "he neither would meet the governour, nor yet see nor speak with him when he came to St. Andrews, but kept his castle, and desired that Sir George Douglas might come to him into the castle, who having Sir John Campbel of Calder, the Earl of Argylo's brother, laid to the governour as a pledge, went into the castle to the cardinal, and persuaded him to come into the town, and to wait upon the governour according to his promise, which he excused, saying, he durst not for fear of his life. In which case, pledges were offered to be laid into the castle, such as himself would desire. But finally he would not, for no persuasion nor condition that could be offered unto him; insomuch as the governour caused his treason and untruth to be openly proclaimed there in the town of St. Andrews, and therewith pardoned all such of the town, and others, that had before in anywise aided and assisted him, so as from henceforth they do leave him, and, adhering to the governour, having the regiment and authority of the realm, would, by all means, annoy the said cardinal and all his complices and partakers."* The Regent returned to Edinburgh, deeply incensed—as he assured Sadler—at Beaton, and resolved to issue a proclamation against him in all districts of the kingdom. But already something more formidable than such a proclamation was abroad against Arran himself. The rash and imperious Henry, with a view to frighten all dissentients and recusants into submission, and to hasten the sending of the reluctant hostages into England, had seized upon a fleet of Scottish merchantmen that had taken refuge in an English port from a storm. This flagrant breach of the treaty of peace just concluded, raised the most vehement indignation throughout Scotland: the enraged populace of Edinburgh surrounded the residence of the English ambassador, and threatened to keep it in a state of close blockade until the Scottish vessels were restored: and the Regent, known to be at least on the most friendly terms with the English court, came in for a principal share of the storm of public execration, which could not have been directed against a weaker reed. Nor were the Scottish barons, Angus, Glencairn, Cassillis, and others, who had been sworn and pledged to advance Henry's interests, a whit more moderate than Henry himself. They took measures for immediate war, and were urgent that a large army should be sent from England, with which their own forces might be combined for what they themselves described as 'the conquest of the realm.'†

To the Regent the difficulties and perplexities of such a crisis must have been increased a thousand-fold by his constitutional timidity and indecision. The time was now come when he could no longer halt between two parties, and these, unfortunately, alike extreme. He had lost his only opportunities of organising and consolidating a third and moderate party—one that would gladly have accepted international amity and a reformation of religion from England, but not slavery. Another peculiarity (but, indeed, it belongs to almost all irresolute men) which marked Arran, was his hopefulness either that, when two different lines of policy presented themselves for adoption, they might be reconciled before he was actually called upon to decide which he was to prefer; or that, when he had committed himself to one, the other would soon and easily be brought to run into it, and in this way all parties would be harmonized.

On the 3rd of September, he set out ostensibly for Blackness castle, to pay a visit to his apostasy. to his wife, but on reaching Calander House, the seat of Lord Livingston, he met the Cardinal there, and was fully reconciled to the crafty prelate. The rival statesmen rode side by side to Stirling, where the weak and pliant Regent abjured his religious, as he had renounced his political, party, and in the Franciscan convent of that city, in the presence of the Queen-dowager and a large assembly of nobles, received absolution for his apostasy from the Catholic faith.* As a guarantee of his sincerity, his eldest son was committed to Beaton's care. This remarkable change took place little more than a week after Arran's solemn ratification of the treaties between England and Scotland, and only a few days after he had expressed to the English ambassador his detestation of the Cardinal and his supporters, and his determination to proceed against them with the utmost rigour, and had repeated his assurances of fidelity to the treaties, and his devotion to the interest of the English monarch. The causes which operated upon the vacillating Regent, and led to his sudden apostasy, have already been indicated. Beaton's threatened support of the claims of Lennox to the earldom and its vast possessions, to the regency, and, in the event of the death of the infant queen, to the throne itself, could not but seriously alarm Arran; and to obtain the withdrawal of such claims and menaces was far more desirable than any bribe, however splendid, within the power of the English monarch to offer. A pope had granted the special divorce, in virtue of which he held both the government and his paternal estates, and was heir-presumptive to the crown. A question of divorce had induced Henry VIII. to abjure the authority of the Papal See, and it is probable that motives of a similar kind were artfully employed to prevail upon Regent Arran to return to the bosom of the Romish Church. There were also other terrors impressively hung up over his trembling head—the hostility of France, ready to manifest itself in supplies of money and of troops to oppose and crush him; not to speak of the rage of the people, of which a heightened or overcharged picture did not need to be drawn by the Cardinal, as the fact was vividly enough brought home to Arran's own senses. There was yet another class of motives bearing with equal, if not greater, cogency upon the Regent, to which Knox and Buchanan do not allude. Though very much kept in the dark regarding King Henry's real aims, latterly he could not but suspect what these really were; and he must have been grievously offended by the insolent and dictatorial manner in which the demands of the English monarch were urged. As a noble, and as Regent of the Scottish kingdom, Arran must have been incessantly galled and provoked by the English overtures; and though he wanted both the sagacity and the courage to sift out of these all that was fair and good, and to throw aside all that was base, still he was not the man to accept them as they stood, or to be otherwise than irritated at the offensive style in which they were pressed upon him. Henry's seizure of the Scottish fleet of merchantmen, too, must have gone far to detach the Regent from the English faction. Nor was Arran possessed of that religious zeal which then, and afterwards, rendered many of the Scottish nobles and people insensible to the danger of the English encroachments, in consequence of the value which they attached to the reformation from Popery, which these were expected to introduce. Through the art of the Cardinal, the Popish and French faction assumed, at this time, an unwonted air of civil and religious toleration. Beaton himself, the fierce persecutor, appeared in the character of a gentle peace-maker. It would farther appear that, when the Regent's conversion took place, he had deluded himself with the idea that the differences of the two contending parties would be reconciled, and the treaties between England and Scotland faithfully observed. The English ambassador was informed by one of the Scottish barons, that "when he perceived the governour would needs go to Stirling with the Cardinal, he prayed him to consider well what he did, and if he would needs put himself into his enemies' hands, which would surely destroy him at length, though they made him fair weather at first, he, for his part, would leave him and serve him no longer. Whereunto the governour answered, even shortly, that his going to Stirling should be for the best, for he should make all well."* The Regent's natural brother, the Abbot of Paisley, assured Sadler that the Regent's sudden revolt "undoubtedly should be for the best, for now, he trusted, the Cardinal and the other noblemen of that party would concur with the governour and his partakers, in and for the accomplishment of the treaties in all points and conditions; and so he doubted not but good agreement and quietness should follow on all parts."† Arran himself sent a message to the English ambassador to the effect, "that he would do as much as in him was to observe the treaties, and more than he might, he could not do."‡ It may, therefore, be conjectured, that the Cardinal managed Arran's conversion so skillfully as to make the simple Regent believe that the step which he was taking was neither a great nor a final separation from his former friends and allies, but only one slightly in advance of them.

Partly, perhaps, with a view of keeping up this delusion in the minds of Arran and his former associates, and partly from the confidence inspired by the successful tampering with Arran, Beaton, on the 6th of September, sent a letter to the Earl of Angus, signed by himself, the Archbishop of Glasgow, the Bishop of Moray, and the Earls of Huntly and Argyle, in which, after mentioning the reconciliation between their party and the Regent, and their present unanimity of views,* he invites Angus to concur 'with my lord-governour and us and consult on all manner of things concerning the common weal,' and urges him to visit Stirling between that date and the next Sunday (the 9th of September), which was fixed for the coronation of their infant sovereign, so that they might be 'all in one body,' and full of concord as of loyalty at the celebration of that interesting ceremony. Angus and his party, instead of accepting the overtures, repaired to Douglas Castle, where they drew up and subscribed a bond, by which they pledged themselves to keep united and resolute in supporting the interests of the English monarch. That bond was also sent for signature to several nobles and gentlemen at a distance.†

The coronation of the young queen took place at Stirling, on the 9th of September, with the pomp which had hitherto marked such occasions in Scotland, and which Sadler says was 'not very great.'‡ A new council was appointed, consisting of the Queen-dowager, the Cardinal, the Archbishop of Glasgow, the Bishops of Moray, Orkney, Galloway, and Dunblane, the Abbots of Paisley and Cupar, and the Earls of Angus, Huntly, Argyle, Moray, Glencairn, Lennox, Bothwell, and Marischal. It was also resolved that a convention should, in the course of a week or two, be held in Edinburgh, for "the composing of all contentions and variances within the realm, as also for ordering of all matters with the king's majesty [Henry VIII.]"§

The Queen-mother and the Cardinal had thus succeeded in acquiring the authority which they in vain sought for at the late king's decease; and the Earl of Arran was now Regent only in name. Mary of Guise knew well how to associate the exercise of power with splendid court entertainments and amusements,

* "We sent certain articles to my lord-governour, and received fra him certain others, condescending all gladly to his grace's desires, and subscribed the same, with the whilkis his grace being content, came to certain meeting with my lord-Cardinal and Earl of Murray, and agreed so well that his grace came to this town, and has spoken with us all, and knows our hearty mind to all good ways (whilkis are and shall be ay without colour or dissimulation) to bring all discords and dissentions to good friendship and amity sua [so] that we may concur to help and supply the common weal of this realm."—Sadler's State Papers, vol. i. p. 284.

and business and festivity now went hand in hand. The exercises of chivalry and public games enlivened Stirling, and in these Matthew Earl of Lennox, and Patrick Earl of Bothwell, took a prominent part, aspiring (as they had previously been encouraged to do by the Cardinal and the Queen-dowager herself) for no less a prize than her hand. The victory in such chivalrous encounters generally fell to Lennox, "for," says Lindsay, of Pitscottie, "he was brought up in the wars of France, which learned him to exercise his pith to the utmost. He was a strong man withal, well-proportioned, with lusty and manly visage, and carried himself erect and stately in his gait, wherefore he was very pleasant in the sight of gentlewomen. As for the Earl of Bothwell, he was fair and whitely, something hanging-shouldered, and went something forward, with gentle and humane countenance."¶ The important help which he had given to the party of the Queen-mother and the Cardinal, in gaining over the Regent, entitled him, more than his superiority in dancing, leaping, or tilting, to a preference over the rival suitor; but the artful Mary of Guise had never meant to marry either of them, and when Lennox urged his pretensions and his services she dexterously evaded his suit.‡ Cardinal Beaton had also deceived him, both in his matrimonial project and also in his attempt against Arran's legitimacy, and now regarded him with cold indifference. His complaints and reproaches had become exceedingly annoying, and the Cardinal and the Queen-mother assured the King of France that "their greatest desire was that he would be pleased to recall the Earl of Lennox, whom they found very troublesome, and likely to be a breeder of sedition in the realm."§

Enraged at having been thus overreached and deceived, and seeing no prospect of getting any of the rewards which had been so liberally promised, Lennox prepared to join the English party, and withdrew from the court at Stirling. The proposal of a marriage with Lady Margaret Douglas, daughter to the Earl of Angus, by the widow of James IV., had already been in his view; and the scheme was certain to receive the sanction both of the English monarch and of Angus, on his declaring himself no longer 'a good Frenchman,' but a 'good Englishman.' And this he did, only a few days after the infant queen's coronation, in which ceremony he had borne a principal part. "The two factions," says Robertson, "which divided the kingdom were still the same, without any alteration in their views or principles; but by one of those strange revolutions which were frequent in that age, they had, in the course of a few weeks, changed their leaders. The Regent was at the head of the partizans of France and the defenders of Popery, and Lennox in the same station with the advocates for the English alliance and a reformation in religion. The one laboured to pull down his own work, which the other upheld with the same hand that had hitherto endeavoured to destroy it.*

Meanwhile the news of the Regent's desertion of an English herald his cause had stung Henry into despatched. fury; and not only did he send a herald into Scotland to threaten war, if all the terms of the treaties were not immediately complied with,† but he also had the chiefs of the Armstrongs liberated, that they might ravage the lands of those Scottish barons who were opposed to him.‡ Nor was his rage appeased or moderated by the quiet proceedings of the Regent's council, conducted as these were by the artful Cardinal. At a conference held at Edinburgh on the 23rd of September, and in the presence of the Queen-dowager, of the Regent, and of several lords of their party, the English ambassador was required to explain the seizure of the Scottish merchantmen, and to make restitution; compensation was also demanded for 'divers incurses, burnings, and spulzies,' made by the English authorities on the Scottish borders. Sadler's explanations and assurances were not deemed satisfactory; and to the questions put on both sides regarding the ratification and fulfilment of the treaties, the answers were problematical; Sadler declaring that he was unable to say what his master intended, and the council concluding "that the matters were weighty, and they must needs have time to devise upon the same."§ Yet, three days later, Beaton assured the English ambassador "that there was no prince in the world whose favour he desired so much as the king's majesty's, and no man in Scotland should more willingly than he set forth all things to his Majesty's pleasure and contentation, not offending his duty of allegiance; and promised to do as much as in him was, to bring the whole nobility and clergy of the realm to condescend and concur together, in and for the performance of the treaties."||

Towards the beginning of October, a small fleet the arrival of a from France landed, having on board the French ambassador, De la Brouse and Meanaige, and a papal legate, of the name of Grimani, ¶ who was patriarch of Aquileia, ¶ Bishop Lealy calls him Peter Francis Concarrone, the patriarch of Venice; but Mr. Sadler calls the legate, who he heard was coming into Scotland, Mark German. And (which seems to be of greatest authority) the Earl of Arran, in his letter to the Pope, dated the 8th of December, calls him Marcus Grymanus, patriarch of Aquileia.—Keith's History, p. 40.

This legate received splendid entertainments from persons of rank in Scotland. He left in the beginning of March, the following year, "And was," says Keith, "so well pleased with the reception he had met with here, that wherever he and conveying military stores and 10,000 crowns,* to be distributed according to the directions of the Cardinal and the Queen-dowager. The squadron anchored off Dumbarton, and the Earl of Lennox, whose sudden revolt from the French party was unknown to any on board, received and secured the money and part of the munitions, thus diverting the subsidy from its destination, and inflicting a fresh disappointment and mortification on the party he had left. Still, this clever and successful trick did not neutralize the effects intended by the French fleet. The promises made and the pensions bestowed by the French ambassadors, and the religious and political diplomacy carried on by the papal legate, materially strengthened the Cardinal's and the Queen-dowager's party, and increased the general dissatisfaction at the English alliance and the marriage of the infant sovereign with the Prince of Wales. The popular favour for a speedy and close renewal of the ancient league with France was strongly awakened; and Sadler felt that the country was turning itself with abhorrence from England as a tyrant, and with ardent joy to France as a kind and unselfish friend. He now informed his master that farther negotiation was useless, and that what England gained must be by open force.† Henry had already demanded that the Douglasses should have recourse to violence, that they should seize upon the person of the young queen, apprehend the Cardinal, remove the Regent, and take possession of the Scottish fortresses; but these orders could only be executed by an English army, and winter was not the fitting season to undertake the invasion of Scotland. The country thus obtained a brief respite from hostilities. Meanwhile, Sadler was instructed to propose to the provost and citizens of Edinburgh, to whom the merchant vessels and the cargoes, seized and confiscated by Henry, belonged, that their property should be restored, provided they would co-operate with the king in his despotic designs upon Scotland. The merchants indignantly rejected the offer. Sadler says, "They were greatly offended with it;" and they affirmed that they would not only "lose their ships and goods, without making any farther suit of the same, but that went afterwards he still spoke of the magnificent civilities of the Scottish nation, and represented them in a particular manner to the King of France, the State of Venice, the College of Cardinals, and to the Pope."

Lesley particularizes a banquet given to the legate by the Earl of Moray, who obviously meant to display his own wealth and the perfection of native artisans in a manufacture then almost exclusively followed in Italy. Though the Earl was abundantly supplied with silver plate, yet his cupboard was furnished with all sorts of glasses of the finest crystal; and to show his guest what a reserved store he had, he caused one of his servants to pull down, as if by accident, the cloth, so that all the glasses were shattered, on which a second and still more splendid service was brought in. The legate affirmed "that he had never seen better crystal, even in Venice, where he was born."—Lesley's History of Scotland, p. 179.

they would also lose their lives rather than grant that condition and become traitors to their own country.* The noble behaviour of these Scotch merchants presents a most gratifying contrast to the selfish and treacherous conduct of the nobility, and is justly regarded as "a proof that the spirit of national independence, which, in Scotland, had long been a stranger to many of the proudest in the aristocracy, still resided in healthy vigour in the untainted bosoms of the commons."†

In the beginning of November, it was resolved by the Douglases that Lord Somerville should be sent to England with the bond which the noblemen of Henry's party had subscribed, declaring their unconditional allegiance to the king. But, before his departure from Edinburgh, he and Lord Maxwell were seized and imprisoned, by the order of the Regent; and the papers found on the person of Somerville furnished abundant proof of the treasonable practices of Angus and his adherents, whom it was now resolved by the government to impeach and try in the parliament which was to meet early in the following month. The Regent, who had become the mere instrument of the energetic Beaton, took forcible possession of Dalkeith Castle,‡ and the house of Pinkie, belonging to Sir George Douglas; and sent a herald to the Earl of Angus, commanding him to dismiss Sadler from Tantallon (where he had fled for refuge), as one who, from his unjustifiable practices with the Scottish nobility, could no longer be regarded by government as the ambassador of England.§

When parliament met, the proceedings were important, and conducted with great vigour, showing the prompt and firm hand of the Cardinal at the helm of the state. A summons of treason was ordered to be prepared against all who had signed the bond with which Lord Somerville was deputed to the English court. An act of indemnity was passed for all concerned in the removal of the young queen from Linlithgow to Stirling. The treaties of peace and marriage between England and Scotland were annulled, on the grounds that they had been violated by Henry VIII., when, "long before the 1st of September," he had seized upon the Scottish merchantmen, and that he had refused, before the 1st of September, to ratify the peace agreed to.* The French ambassadors, De la Brosse and Mesnaige, attended, and stated the object of their mission—to obtain the renewal of the ancient league between France and Scotland; and promised, in the name of their master, assistance to the Scottish sovereign and nobles to defend the independence of their country against the King of England. This offer was cordially accepted; the contracts of amity between France and Scotland were unanimously renewed and confirmed, and an act was passed empowering Cardinal Beaton, along with a select council, to treat with the French ambassadors, regarding the "making of the saids letters of approbation, ratification, and confirmation, and contracting of new, and novation of all the saids contractes."† An embassy was sent to the French court, and another to Denmark, to solicit assistance in the struggle with England, whilst the intelligence of the war was also to be notified to the Emperor and the Duke of Bavaria, with the request that, on this ground, Scottish commerce should no longer be molested by them. The Lords Fleming, Ruthven, and St. John, and Sir John Campbell, of Calder, were appointed members of the Regent's council, in the room of the Earls of Angus, Lennox, Glencairn, and Marischal, none of whom were likely to act, and the most of whom had at first been chosen entirely with a view to conciliation, which had proved fruitless. The Regent's natural brother, Hamilton, Abbot of Paisley, was made Treasurer, in the place of Sir William Kirkaldy, of Grange; and Cardinal Beaton was raised to the office of Chancellor, formerly held by Dunbar, Archbishop of Glasgow; David Pantar, a zealous and able ecclesiastic, had previously been appointed Secretary. One of the most important decrees of this parliament remains to be recorded; and its cruel character bears the stamp of the Cardinal's influence, no doubt assisted by the papal legate, who had come to Scotland to extirpate the Reformation. All prelates were henceforth commanded to make a rigorous inquisition within their dioceses for persons disseminating opinions opposed to, or differing from, the true faith, and to prosecute these heretics, as the laws of the Church directed; but the impending hostilities with England delayed for a time the execution of this persecuting and bloody decree.

§ Dalkeith Castle was at this time held by James, one of the sons of Sir George Douglas. This son was afterwards the famous Earl of Morton and Regent of Scotland. At present, he long defended the donjon, or great tower of Dalkeith, against Arran. Dalkeith Castle was afterwards his principal residence, and was called the Lion's Den. The deliberations and decisions of the estates were had conducted with the greatest unanimity; but the Queen-dowager was aware of the dissatisfaction which would be felt by the absent nobles, and of the fury into which Henry VIII. would be thrown, by the news of the proceedings of the parliament. She therefore made a pilgrimage to the shrine of the Virgin Mary, at Musselburgh, to sue for peace.

and mutual good-will among the barons of the kingdom, and for amity with England. "The Queen's Grace Drowarie [dowager] past," says the Journal of Occurrences, "on her fute to our Lady Lauriet, praying for peace among her lordis and with the realm of England, and remainit their twentie days in her prayers." The period of her devotion was not, indeed, quite so long as this contemporary chronicle represents, for she spent her Christmas at Stirling in playing at cards and other kindred amusements, as appears from the following entry in the Royal Comptus: "Yule—Delivered to my Lord-Governor, to play at the carddis in Stirling with the Queen's Grace, in ane hundred crowns of the sun. I. C. xli. [£10 10s. *]"

The Earl of Lennox, though he had deserted the Earl of Lennox's unsuccessful attempt, but kept aloof until he should see whether any redress would be given him by the King of France. About Christmas he met a number of his friends in the town of Ayr, to consult what steps should be taken, as the rumour was afloat that the Regent, urged by Beaton, intended to levy an army to compel him to surrender the money which he had taken from the French fleet. It was resolved to assemble all the forces they could command, and to act on the defensive; but so large a body of men flocked to his standard—allured, doubtless, by the French gold—that Lennox decided to act on the offensive, and forthwith led his army to Leith, to give battle to the Regent, in 'the fields between that town and Eðinburgh.' † The forces of the Regent were far inferior in number; but the Cardinal, by artful negotiations, succeeded in putting off an engagement, until the Earl found himself deserted by many of his men, and was obliged to conclude a peace.

Of the numerous and comparatively unimportant intrigues that took place among the factions during the early months of the year 1543-4, the accounts are confused, and, in many points, contradictory. It is certain that, in the middle of January, the Earls of Lennox, Angus, Cassillis, and Glencairn, entered into a bond with Regent Arran, by which they stipulated for "themselves and all others their complices and partakers, to remain true, faithful, and obedient servants to their sovereign lady and her authority, to assist the lord-governor for defence of the realm, against their old enemies of England, to support the liberties of holy church, and to maintain the true Christian faith." † As hostages for the performance of this bond, Sir George Douglas and the Earl of Glencairn's eldest son, the Master of Kilmours, were delivered up. A day or two after (19th of January) the Regent sent a letter to Henry VIII., stating that "all strife and contention, all quarrels and controversies, and movers of debate among the noblemen of this realm, were brought to perfect concord and conformity, and being now all of one mind, were agreed and determined to put in execution such things as appertained to true and faithful subjects of this realm to do for defence thereof." He also asked a safe-conduct for some ambassadors, who were to 'propound matters for the common welfare of both countries.*' It would thus appear that, in the beginning of the year, there was a cessation of the internal feuds by which the country was convulsed, and that the government had, at least nominally, been accepted by all parties in Scotland. Yet, before two months had expired, Angus had secretly renewed his protestations of unlimited fidelity to Henry, as is shown by a letter, dated March 5th, from the Earl to the king; and the nobles of his faction despatched a messenger to England, to prompt Henry to hasten his preparations for the invasion of Scotland, and to give him such hints as might be likely to promote the success of the enterprise. † The Earl of Angus and Lord Maxwell, when on their way to Glasgow to mediate in a fresh quarrel between Lennox and the Regent, were, by the orders of the latter, arrested and imprisoned. ‡

§ Keith says (p. 40): "The chronology of this progress, as delivered by our historians, is so irreconcilable, that I can make nothing of it. Mr. Knox says that the execution at Perth was on St. Paul's day (i. e. the 25th of January), before the first burning of Edinburgh. Now that first burning was in the year 1544, so that, according to him, the Cardinal and governor were at Perth in the month of January, 1543-4. But this is highly improbable, since we have already observed that about that time of that year, the governor was in the west about Glasgow, pursuing the Earl of Lennox: besides that the Pope's legate was then in the country, and they were busy in entertaining him. Mr. Sadler does indeed inform us, that the governor and Cardinal went about the 10th of November, 1543, into Fife and Angus, in order to gain the Earl of Rothes, the Lords Gray, Ogilvy, and Glamis, to their party, either by force or policy, but he says nothing of Perth, or of any execution of heretics. Mr. Fox also assigns this execution to the same year, and time of the year, 1543, with Mr. Knox, ex Registr. et instrumentis a Scotia missis. Mr. Buchanan, that the progress was in the end of the year 1545; and that, after the execution at Perth, and a further progress into the county of Angus, in search of heretics, the Cardinal and governor returned, and kept their Christmas for three weeks together in St. Andrews, the same year, 1545, immediately before the catching of Mr. Wishart. So that neither the certain year, nor season of the year, are clearly accounted for by our public writers. However, that I might afford some light to this matter, I have narrowly observed the rolls of parliament, and do find that the governor and Cardinal were present in the winter parliaments, except in the end of the year 1545, in the months of December and January. 'Tis true there was no session of parliament in the month of January, 1543-4; but that the governor and with the view of giving some demonstration of the Beaton's persecutions. bearings of the recent enactment against heretics, and of furnishing prelates and priests with examples of treatment for imitation. His own zeal for the church would in itself have been sufficient to prompt him to this; and that zeal would be stimulated by the suggestions of the Pope's legate, and still more by his anticipation of being shortly himself appointed the Pope's legate a latere in Scotland.* The doctrines of the reformation obtained many supporters in Perth, and thither Beaton proceeded. Four men—Lamb, Anderson, Ranald, and Hunter—were summarily tried and hanged, though the alleged offence of the first consisted in his having once interrupted an ecclesiastic when preaching, and in his denying that prayer offered up to the saints was necessary to salvation; and the guilt of the other three sufferers consisted, says Knox, in "eating a goose" during Lent.† The wife of one of these martyrs was drowned, because she had refused to pray to the Virgin Mary for help in childbirth—an atrocity which excited deep and general horror.‡

‡ Agreements (January 13 and 14, 1543-4) entered into

It is at this stage of the national history that moderns ought to begin their defence of that subordination of mere patriotism to higher and more essential principles, which marked the leading reformers. Both patriotism and the love of a pure and gracious Christianity urged that the country should be rid of the present government and the existing church; the Scottish reformers, in themselves, were wholly unable to overthrow the gigantic and 'incarnadined' tyranny; and though, in accepting the assistance of the English monarch, their patriotic feelings were necessarily kept in abeyance, yet this appeared to them a less

Cardinal did not make their progress northward in that year I think is very improbable, for the reasons above assigned. Nor was it likely to have been in January or February, 1544-5, Anerum Moor having been fought the 17th of February that year. So that, all these things being duly considered, I rather join with Mr. Buchanan, who places this execution at Perth in the end of the year 1545." We think, on the contrary, that there are sufficiently strong reasons for adhering to Knox's chronology. Beaton was not likely to keep in abeyance for two years an enactment against heretics. The presence of the Pope's legate would excite him to great zeal for the church, and so would the honour, which at this time he was daily expecting, of being himself made the Pope's legate a latere in Scotland. Civil commotions had also been temporarily settled in the beginning of 1544, so that he had leisure to drop the functions of a statesman and take up those of an ecclesiastic. We may mention that Mr. Tytler, though without assigning any reason, makes Beaton's progress to have been in 1543-4.

* "The original bull constituting Beaton legate a latere, is to be seen in the Appendix of Bishop Burnet's second volume of the 'History of the Reformation.' It bears date 30th January, 1543; but this seems to be a mistake in the transcriber or printer for 1544; for I do not remember that by the Roman account the year did commence at any other time than the first of January. That it was in the year 1544, appears, not only by the addition of Pontificatus nostri anno decimo (that Pope being created 12th October, 1534), but also by a letter of the Earl of Arran to the same Pope, dated at Stirling, 30th March, 1544, wherein he takes notice that that jurisdiction was granted the 10th of February, which, doubtless, was the February immediately proceeding."—Keith, p. 45.

evil than submission to the cruel domination of Beaton. The prospect of such ecclesiastical progresses over the land, as the one to Perth was more revolting than an English invasion of Scotland.

The time and energies of the Regent and the Cardinal would have been much better Henry's preparations employed in making adequate preparations to resist that invasion than in putting heretics to death. Henry had set about the execution of his designs with vigour, and was in readiness for the first favourable season of the year. His privy council overruled the Earl of Hertford's advice, that the army should gain possession of Leith, and, after fortifying it, lay waste the country, and reduce Edinburgh to ashes, whilst the fleet should occupy the Forth, sweeping the coast and destroying the shipping. The plan adopted, though less comprehensive, admitted of being more rapidly carried out. That it did not proceed, however, from any mitigation of Henry's wrath, is evident, from the savage directions given to the Earl of Hertford, who had the command of the invading army. He was commanded to make an inroad into Scotland, "there to put all to fire and sword, to burn Edinburgh town, and to raze and deface it, when you have sacked it, and gotten what you can out of it, as that it may remain for ever a perpetual memory of the vengeance of God lighted upon it, for their falsehood and disloyalty. Do what you can, out of hand, and without long tarrying, to beat down and overthrow the castle, sack Holyrood-house, and as many towns and villages about Edinburgh as ye conveniently can; sack Leith, and burn and subvert it, and all the rest, putting man, woman, and child to fire and sword, without exception, when any resistance shall be made against you; and this done, pass over to the Fife land, and extend like extremities and destructions in all towns and villages whereunto ye may reach conveniently, and not forgetting amongst all the rest so to spoil and turn upside down the Cardinal's town of St. Andrews, as the upper stone may be the nether, and not one stick stand by another, sparing no creature alive within the same, specially such as either in friendship, or in blood, be allied to the Cardinal."*

On the 3rd of May† the Regent, Cardinal, and the citizens of Edinburgh were surprised at the sight of a fleet of two hundred sail Arrival of the in- in the Firth, and alarmed when reading boat. they discovered that it bore the royal flag of England. It was commanded by Lord Lisle; and with the naval force was associated an army, under the Earl of Hertford, variously estimated at from 10,000 to 20,000.‡ No preparations for resistance had been made by Arran; § and those which might have been got up in haste for the emergency were wholly neglected. For four days the disembarkation of the English troops and the landing of the artillery took place without any molestation. An attempt by the Regent and the Cardinal, at the head of a small force, consisting chiefly of their own adherents, to intercept the entry into Leith, was unavailing; and Arran and Beaton, along with the Earls of Huntly and Argyle, retreated to Linnithgow—a safe distance from the danger. The English took and plundered Leith at leisure. The Provost of Edinburgh, Sir Adam Otterburn of Reidhall, sought an interview with Hertford, to urge forbearance and a pacific settlement of the differences between the two countries; but the English general returned the haughty answer that he was a soldier and not an ambassador, and that he would withdraw his army only on condition that the young Queen of Scots should be at once delivered up to Henry. The indignant citizens resolved to defend the capital to the last extremity, though Otterburn seized the earliest opportunity to escape; and, after choosing another provost, they proceeded to fortify the city, and prepared to defend themselves to the last extremity. So strenuous was their resistance, that for a while the English general could make no impression on the temporary ramparts, and was at last obliged to bring up his battering artillery from Leith. To hold out longer against the assault was impracticable; and, by night, the inhabitants left the city, taking with them their treasure and what of their property they could carry, much of which was deposited in Craigmillar castle, and afterwards fell into the hands of the English.† The Regent's kinsman, Hamilton of Stenhouse, refused to surrender the castle of Edinburgh, the ordnance of which was so skilfully served against a battery which Hertford sought to construct, that, after considerable loss on the part of the English, they raised the siege, and in revenge set fire to the city. Its conflagration lasted for three days; and Hertford, having received a reinforcement of four thousand borderers, under Lord Dure, employed himself in laying waste and plundering the surrounding country.

In the meantime, Regent Arran, with the help of the Cardinal, and the Earls of Huntly, Argyle, Bothwell, and Moray, had mustered a numerous force, and had set at liberty the Earl of Angus and Sir George Douglas, with the hope of securing their co-operation. He was now making rapid

Some said, it is no doubt but they are Englishmen, and we fear that they will land. The Cardinal skipped and said, 'It is the island flete; they are come to make a shew, and to put us in fear. I shall lodge all the men of warre in mine eye that shall land in Scotland.' Still dittoth the Cardinal at his dinner, eating as though there had been no danger appearing. marches to attack the English; but Lord Lisle, instead of waiting for him, re-em- Departure of the barked many of the English troops, English fleet and leaving the remainder to return and army. by land, under Hertford, set sail; not, however, before he had committed Leith to the flames, seized upon the Salamander and the Unicorn, two large Scottish vessels, and burned all the small craft lying in the harbour. Along the coast he inflicted all the damage in his power. The retreat of the land forces was marked by similar acts of wanton vengeance; Seton, Haddington, Dunbar, Renton, and all the other towns and villages between Edinburgh and Berwick, were successively plundered and burned.

This merciless and short-sighted policy, as might have been expected, utterly failed to gain the object which Henry had in view. It neither compelled nor induced the Scottish nation to deliver up the young queen into his hands. It was only a foray on an unusually large scale, and not a battle between the two countries. It decided nothing; and served only to exasperate the Scots, and to increase their antipathy to the union and their hostility to Henry's demands. His ill-advised instructions to Hertford, that the estates of the Douglasses should not be exempted from ravage and plunder, had also enraged and alienated the mercenary chiefs, who now joined the opposite party, so that the English king had only Lennox and Glencairn on his side in Scotland. On the 17th of May, these two Earls concluded, at Carlisle, an agreement with Henry, in which, after acknowledging him as Protector of Scotland, they engaged to do their best to put into his hands the person of the young queen and the principal Scottish strongholds (including Lennox's own fortified possessions, Dunbarton and the Isle and Castle of Bute), and to serve him against all persons and nations, as if they were English subjects;* for which services Glencairn was to receive a large pension both for himself and for his son, the Master of Kilmaurs, whilst Lennox was offered the regency and the hand of the king's niece, Lady Margaret Douglas. They immediately returned to Scotland to muster their dependents; but the Regent was now ready for them, and led a thousand men to Glasgow, where Glencairn had pitched his quarters, whence he might dash into Clydesdale, 'which all belonged to the Hamiltons alone.† There, on a wide common beside the city, he was met by Glencairn at the head of five hundred spearmen and a number of the citizens; but, after a fierce conflict, in which Glencairn's second son and many of his followers fell, the insurgents were put to the rout and many of them taken prisoners.‡ Arran made himself master of the city; and, as a punishment for its chief magistrate having taken part with the enemy, abandoned it to plunder. The victors, Buchanan narrates, "not satiated with the blood of the citizens who were slain, nor with the miseries of those who survived, and the destruction of their household furniture, carried away their doors and window-shutters, and omitted no kind of calamity, except that, after plundering and destroying their houses, they did not set fire to them.* Glencairn made his escape, with but a few followers, to Dumbarton Castle, which Lennox occupied; and the news of the defeat so much alarmed the latter that he fled from that impregnable fortress and set sail for England, where, as a reward rather for what he had attempted than for what he had achieved, he was married to Lady Margaret Douglas,—a union destined to give an ill-fated husband to the young Queen of Scots, and a long line, direct and indirect, of kings to the British throne. It was not foreseen that a grandson of the fugitive Earl was to wear the united crowns of England and Scotland.

A general council met at Stirling, as summoned, on the 3rd of June, and was attended by all the nobles, except Lennox and Glencairn. There was perfect unanimity of feeling against Henry's encroachments; and, had there been no other question at issue, the proceedings would have been alike harmonious and energetic, and such as would afterwards have been sanctioned by the country. But, apart from many sources of disunion, which had never, during many reigns, been closed among the aristocracy, there was the antagonism between Popery and Protestantism; and to this was added a wide dissatisfaction with the regency of Arran. That dissatisfaction had many and varied reasons and encouragements. The Reformers disliked Arran as an apostate, and they now regarded him as a mere tool in the hands of the bloodthirsty Beaton; by a still larger party he was viewed with contempt for his vacillating character, and on account of his neglect to make due preparations against the recent English invasion; the Douglasses bore him many grudges both of ancient and of later date; the numerous and powerful adherents of Lennox were now without a head, but were totally averse to receive him in the place of the exiled Earl; and, to give consistency and action to this varied opposition to the Regent, there was the ambitious Queen-mother, who, it would appear, now conspired to obtain the chief authority within the realm. At the council, it was first proposed and carried that Mary of Guise should be associated with Arran in the regency as 'egall' [equal], and that a new privy council should be chosen; and Arran's consent to the arrangement was requested.† But, as he delayed day after day to return any answer, and failed to appear at the convention, to which he had been summoned, on the 10th of June, it was decreed that he be summarily deprived of his office, and that the Queen-dowager take his place as Regent of Scotland. Proclamation to this effect was immediately made, and the Earl of Angus was appointed lieutenant-general of the kingdom.

Cardinal Beaton, however, foreseeing that his own authority would be greatly impaired by this revolution in the government, was opposed to the change. In ambition, ability, and cunning, Mary of Guise and he were too equally matched for him to expect that she would passively submit to his dictation; and, moreover, he must have seen that his reputation in her eyes for energy and promptitude had been greatly impaired by the defenceless state in which Arran, under his guidance, had suffered the country to remain to the very hour of the English invasion. He, therefore, gave his utmost support to Arran, who issued a proclamation, denouncing the Queen-dowager's election to the regency as illegal, and prohibiting all persons from acknowledging, in any way, her usurped authority.* Arran summoned a parliament to meet in Edinburgh on the 31st of July, and fortified the city on learning that his rival had left Stirling, and was advancing with a numerous and well-armed retinue to prevent the assembly. The Queen-dowager avoided an encounter, and retreated to Stirling.‡ In this there was no triumph to either party, for the parliament was delayed. Yet, about this time, several of the Queen-dowager's most powerful partizans were compelled to give all their attention and energy to other matters than the support of her cause. A rebellion in their clans, which it was necessary to put down, had called away Huntly and Argyle. Lord Lovat and his son were leading the Frasers against the Macdonalds; and so ferocious was the conflict between the rival sects, when they met at Inverlochy, that they fought in their shirts, and the combat lasted till only two warriors remained on one side, and four on the other.† Perth, also, was the scene of civil strife and bloodshed. Lord Ruthven and Lord Gray were both Protestants, and had hitherto been united in their opposition to the domination of the Cardinal; but Beaton, in his late ecclesiastical progress to Perth, had contrived to sow discord between them, by depriving Ruthven of his office of provost in favour of Charteris of Kinfauns, and by managing to procure the support of Gray for the latter.* The rival candidates and their principal adherents had many friends; and the whole province was quickly drawn into this purely civil contest, which became hotter and more hot, until it was decided by a bloody encounter on the narrow bridge over the Tay, when Ruthven was declared victor.

 † This important transaction was involved in the greatest obscurity, until Mr. Tytler discovered (see his History, vol. v. Appendix) in the State Paper Office a document, entitled, "Agreement of the principal Scots nobility, to support the authority of the Queen-mother, as Regent of Scotland, against the Earl of Arran, declared by this instrument to be deprived of his office." It is signed by the Earls of Angus, Bothwell, Montrose, Lord Sinclair, Robert Maxwell, Earls of Huntly, Cassillis, Marischal, Lord Somerville, George Douglas, Earls of Moray, Argyle, Errol, Lords Erskine, St. John, Malcolm, Lord Chamberlain, Hew Lord Lovat, and Sir John Campbell, of Cawder, knight."

‡ Diurnal of Occurrences, p. 34. Buchanan, speaking of the slaughter of the Frasers, says: "They would have perished one of the most numerous and deserving of the Scottish clans, unless (by divine Providence, as we may believe) eighty of the principal men of the clan had left their wives pregnant, who, in due time, brought forth males, all of whom arrived safely at man's estate." — Buchanan, book xv. chap. 26.

But the appearance of a third regent, and one appointed by the English king, was about to complicate still farther the question of authority in Scotland, and embarrass all parties. The engagements of the Earl of Lennox to Henry VIII. did not allow him to pass more than a few days with his newly-married wife. In the beginning of August, he sailed from Bristol, accompanied by Sir Rise Mansell and Richard Broke, with a fleet of ten ships,† and about five hundred hagbutteers, archers, and pikemen. On reaching the Scottish coast, he spoiled the Isle of Arran, and took possession of Bute and Rothesay Castle. But the principal aim of his enterprise was to put into the hands of the English his own strong and important fortress, Dunbarton Castle, which was now held by one of his retainers, Stirling of Glorat, who, he imagined, would at once yield it up. But Stirling, though he received the earl with all due respect, was not unmindful of his paramount duty to his sovereign; and the proposal to give up the castle to the English was received with such indignation on the part both of the governor and the garrison that Lennox quickly retreated to his ships, which, on the entry of Sir George Douglas into Dunbarton with four thousand men, dropped down the Clyde for safety. In passing Dunoon Castle, which was occupied by a force under the Earl of Argyll, they were fired upon by the garrison, when Lennox landed his men and routed the assailants. He afterwards inflicted considerable damage on Kentire and the coast of Ayrshire, and returned to Bristol, having failed in the main object of his expedition—the capture of Dunbarton—but attributing his failure to the Earl of Glencairn and his son, the Master of Kilmaurs, his fellow-agents and brother-pensioners in Henry's service.

Meanwhile, English vengeance was falling upon the ravages of the Scottish Borders in the most the English upon barbarous forms; and Sir Ralph the Borders. Eure, Sir Brian Layton, and Sir Richard Bowes were, by fire, sword, and rapine, turning the country into a bare and blackened wilderness. From July to November of this disastrous year, as appears from an authentic contemporary document,‡ 192 villages, towers, farm offices, parish churches, and fortified dwelling-houses were sacked, whilst the booty amounted to 10,386 cattle, 12,492 sheep, 1496 horses, 850 bolls of corn, besides much household furniture. These destructive inroads could not be repressed under a disputed regency. The Queen-dowager and her adherents appear to have made greater exertions than Arran and his party for the defence of the country; for, in addition to the fact that the expedition of Lennox had been defeated by her friends, it is recorded that she herself, in the month of October, made a progress to Jedburgh, where the Earl of Angus met her, and where they remained eight days consulting upon the best means to be adopted for protecting the Borders. It is highly probable that the attention of Arran and Beaton was exclusively occupied—and not unsuccessfully—in laborious intrigues for strengthening their own party.

A parliament was summoned by the Earl of Arran to meet at Edinburgh on Rivalparliaments the 6th of November; and its first in November. act was to annul the proceedings of the rival parliament held at Stirling, and to declare of none effect the deposition of Arran from the office of Regent. The next step was to charge two of the Queen-dowager's principal partizans—the Earl of Angus and Sir George Douglas—with treason, the penalties of which—banishment and forfeiture—were to be kept suspended over them. Undeterred, however, by these proceedings, the Queen-dowager held a meeting of the three estates at Stirling, and issued a proclamation prohibiting obedience to the 'pretended regent.' In this unfortunate state of affairs, when the great body of the people were at a loss whom to obey, Cardinal Beaton stepped forward as a mediator, and succeeded in effecting a temporary reconciliation between Arran and the Queen-dowager. The Douglasses—her principal advisers—would readily accede to an agreement which was almost sure to quash the charge of treason against themselves.

It was resolved that the two factions, thus united, should vigorously set about the Unfortunate expulsion of the English and the expedition to protection of the Borders. Arran, Coldingham. knowing that the pretext of the Queen-dowager and her party for attempting to remove him from the regency had been the want of energy in his movements against the English, put on an unusually bold front, and led seven thousand men to Coldingham, then held by a savage and plundering garrison of the enemy. But the siege was abruptly terminated, some historians say, by the cowardice of the Regent; others, by the treachery of Sir George Douglas. It is certain that the former fled; and it is equally certain that the latter—whether intentionally or in ignorance cannot be satisfactorily determined—spread an alarming and false report in the Scottish camp, that the English were ten thousand strong, and expected reinforcements from Berwick, and the whole force fled disgracefully before two thousand English troops.

If this signal defeat was actually brought about by the treachery of the Douglasses, they escaped the punishment which they deserved, for in a numerously attended parliament, which was held at Edinburgh in the beginning of December, they were absolved of all the charges that had been brought against them in the previous meeting of the three estates, whilst forgiveness was also extended to the Earls of Glencairn and Cassillis, and to Sir Hugh Campbell, sheriff of Ayr, for their long-continued treasonable practices. No doubts seem to have been entertained of the sincerity of the Earl of Angus, especially when it was guaranteed by his natural resentment at the ravages wantonly inflicted on his possessions by the English, for he was commissioned by the parliament to undertake the defence of the Borders. It was also attempted to levy a land-tax for the maintenance of a thousand horsemen, to be placed under his charge; but the barons of Lothian had no confidence in his patriotism and honesty, and they declined either to pay the money or to serve under his banner, preferring to make covenants with each other for their mutual protection against the attacks and spoliations of the English.* Their example was generally followed throughout the country, and no attention was paid to the command of the Regent for the immediate muster of the military convoy of the kingdom at Lauder, for the purpose of repelling the incursions of the enemy. Several of the Border clans had even assumed the red cross, the token of entire submission to England, whilst others had come to terms, scarcely less humiliating, with the invaders. The English wardens felt confident that they could easily take, and permanently keep, possession of the whole of the country south of the Forth. To lay a scheme for this purpose before their master, Sir Ralph Eure and Sir Brian Layton repaired to London. The project met with the entire approbation of the English monarch; and to encourage them to prosecute vigorously the plan which they had formed, he is said to have bestowed upon Eure a grant of all the lands he might conquer in the districts of the Mersc, Teviotdale, and Lauderdale, the greater part of which belonged to the Earl of Angus. "This gift," says Buchanan, "they cheerfully accepted, and the king as willingly bestowed, recompensing their vain boasting with a grant as vain.†"

The Earl of Angus, however, was not disposed to submit to this summary arrangement of Angus. Furious that Henry, either as a master or as an enemy, should presume to dispose of the ancient lands of Douglas and should offer these to a stranger as the spoil of an incursion, he swore that "if Ralph Eure dared to act upon the grant, he would write his sasine, or instrument of possession, on his skin with sharp pens and bloody ink.‡" His unpatriotic obligations to the English monarch had, for some time back, hung loosely upon him; and this insult determined him to cast them off altogether, and to rouse himself for the defence, if not of Scotland, at least of his own ancestral domains. Sir Ralph Eure had the hardihood to make a venture for the prize, and led to the borders a force numbering about five thousand men, and consisting of foreigners, English archers, and six hundred Border Scots—the Armstrongs, Turnbulls, and other broken clans—who wore the badge of submission to England, and whose policy it was to side with the stronger party and plunder the weaker. The inroad which then commenced was distinguished by the utmost ferocity and inhumanity, as if the design had been to exterminate, rather than to subjugate, the population, and to turn the land into an uninhabited desert. The ruthless invaders burnt the tower of Broomhouse, when no escape to the unresisting inmates was possible, and its lady, a venerable matron, with all her family, perished in the flames. They then proceeded as far as Melrose, which they sacked and demolished, committing wanton havoc upon the noble abbey and the tombs of the Douglasses.

Angus could no longer restrain his rage and desire for retaliation. He burned to launch not only his own feudal retainers but all the forces of the nation against the savage spoilers. The Regent and the Cardinal might have sat at ease, as usual, until the incursion was approaching Edinburgh, but it had more than passed the line of the Earl's toleration. It had ravaged his paternal estates and disturbed the ashes of his ancestors, and he must meet, punish, and drive back the plunderers. He addressed to the Regent mingled remonstrances, reproaches, and encouragements, describing Arran as alienated from the Scottish nobles, who alone could protect the kingdom, and misled by voluptuous priests who were ready to plot against, but not to fight for, the interests of Scotland; and calling upon him to renounce the advice of insidious churchmen, and summon the barons and their retainers to an immediate expedition against the English; and he promised that, if they would take the field without hesitation, the enterprise would be crowned with the most brilliant success.*

Regent Arran must have lost rather than gained in energy and decision by his alliance with Beaton. The Cardinal himself, at this crisis, appears to have been unconcerned at the ravages and cruelties inflicted by the English, and to have exercised none of his great power in exciting the Regent and the nobles to undertake the defence of their country. Those who palliate his Popish policy by alleging that it was characterised by bold and incorruptible nationality, will find it difficult to account for his state of inaction, at a time when the invaders were conquering and desolating, as Angus said, "the country in detail.†" He neither himself stood forward, nor induced others, who were within the range of his influence, to do so, for the expulsion of the plundering English, and the protection of his oppressed countrymen.

The remonstrances of Angus were backed by the Regent takes several of the barons, and the result was that the Regent, with a small and hastily-gathered force, joined the impatient Earl and his vassals. They marched to Melrose; but the English, having received notice of their movements, made an unexpected attack upon them. The Scots, though driven back, succeeded in preserving their order; and during the evening and night from the neighbouring hills watched the enemy, who were gleaning what little plunder they had formerly left in the town and abbey of Melrose. The Regent expected the arrival of strong reinforcements; for, before joining Angus, he had issued a proclamation requiring the attendance of the barons with all their dependants. Early in the morning of the following day the English were seen retreating to Jedburgh; and the Scots, being comparatively but a handful, followed them at a prudent distance. Sir Ralph Eure, probably unwilling to cross the Teviot with the enemy hanging upon his rear, and eagerly seeking for any advantage that might arise to them from disorder in his ranks, halted upon a moor above the village of Ancrum. Angus directed his men to fall back upon a neighbouring height, painfully undecided as to whether he should risk an engagement with such unequal strength. The arrival, first, of the brave Norman Lesley, at the head of a body of men from Fife, and, next, of Sir Walter Scott, of Buccleuch, who announced that his vassals would join them in the course of an hour, determined the Scots against retreat. Buccleuch, as well as Angus, had many wrongs to avenge upon the English and their leader. In August of the preceding year, a predatory troop, headed by Eure, had ravaged all his lands in West Teviotdale and those upon Kale Water, stormed two of his strongest castles, slaughtered about forty of his men, and carried off immense and valuable booty.* But Buccleuch's military judgment was not turned into rashness by his eagerness for revenge. His experienced eye saw at once the line of tactics to be followed, and he prevailed upon Angus to withdraw his forces from the eminence which they occupied, to draw them up on a piece of level ground behind it, called Peniel-heugh, and to send the horses with the camp-boys to another height in the rear. This stratagem was intended to persuade the English that the Scots were betaking themselves to flight. Eure and the other leaders at once fell into the snare, and eagerly resolved upon pursuit, under the apprehension that the fugitives might escape. Though the English troops were sorely fatigued by their march, and in want both of rest and refreshment, they were instantly launched forward—cavalry and infantry—in rapid chase after the foe. They galloped up the height which the Scots had craftily abandoned,

* Murkin's State Papers, pp. 45, 46.

in the full belief that the terror-stricken fugitives would fall an easy prey into their hands; but, on reaching the summit, they were astonished to perceive in the hollow below the serried ranks of the Scots calmly awaiting their approach. Confident of success, however, from the many months during which they had been unresisted and unchecked, and trusting that their great superiority in numbers would more than make up for their exhaustion, and for the disorder into which they had been thrown by the eagerness of the pursuit, the English leaders resolved on making an attack. At this moment, a heron, disturbed by the tumult, flew up from the marshes between the combatants, and Angus, in a spirit of elated and sportive confidence, exclaimed, "Oh! that I had here my white goss-hawk; we should then all yoke [join to] at once."* The cavalry, of which the English forces were mainly composed, made an irregular and feeble charge. The Scottish spearmen soon repulsed the enemy's van, under Layton and Bowes, and drove it back upon the main body; and this was also soon thrust back in confusion upon the rear. The oblique rays of the setting sun and the smoke of the harquebusses blown by the wind were right in the faces of the English and blinded them. A route was inevitable. Neither leaders nor banners could be distinguished. The ranks were fiercely driven against each other, and were unable to strike at the foe; and each man of the wavering host began to seek an escape for himself from the scene of helpless and fatal disorder. And now the six hundred Scottish Borderers, who had for months served the English, tore off their badge of submission—the red cross—and, making common cause with their already victorious countrymen, turned with unsparing severity upon the broken and flying enemy. The peasantry of the neighbourhood, hitherto only spectators of the short conflict, drew near to intercept and cut down the English; and women, whose hearts had been steeled against the fugitives by their atrocious barbarities, joined in the pursuit,† and, as a spur to more rapid and unsparing carnage, shrieked out to the conquerors to "remember Broomhouse!" †

The battle became a slaughter, which lasted till nightfall. The revenge of the Scots was fully satiated, for of the enemy no fewer than eight hundred were slain, amongst whom were Sir Ralph Eure and Sir Brian Layton, to the great gratification of Angus and his followers, whilst a thousand were made prisoners, and these included many knights and persons of rank, from whom large ransoms were exacted.* The loss on the part of the victors was trifling, amounting, Buchanan says, only to two, and these humble retainers.† The Scots lost no time in following up their victory. The camp-equipage of the English, left at Melrose, was seized; and Coldingham, Jedburgh, and almost all the border districts, were recovered from the enemy. The Earl's recent assurance of success was thus more than verified. The Regent embraced the victorious baron, and carried him off to the Court at Stirling to receive the warm congratulations and thanks of the Queen-dowager.‡ He then issued a proclamation that all who had been compelled to serve the English and wear the red cross, should, on returning to their allegiance, be fully pardoned.

Henry VIII. was infuriated on receiving intelligence of the defeat of his army, and the slaughter of his two trusty barons; and probably his rage was not lessened by the thought that his own impolitic treatment of Angus had led to the disaster and disgrace. Still, the monarch's violent policy was not checked by what had occurred, and he vowed to pursue Angus with his heaviest resentment. The Earl had now, for a little, caught the undaunted spirit of his race, and made this bold reply:—"Is our brother-in-law offended that I, as a good Scotsman, have avenged my ravaged country and the defaced tombs of my ancestors upon Ralph Eure? They were better men than he, and I was bound to do no less: and will he take my life for that? Little knows King Henry the skirts of Kirnetable.§ I can keep myself there against all his English host."||

Shortly after the victory at Anerum Moor and the expulsion of the English from the kingdom, word was sent to the French intervention. Scottish court that the King of France was about to prove himself the formidable enemy of England on her own soil, and the fast ally of Scotland. Francis the First was busy in preparing a large fleet for the invasion of England; and, to give this enterprise a greater chance of success, he intended first to send an army into Scotland, so that the English troops might be § Kirnetable, now called Cairntable, is a mountainous tract at the head of Douglasdale. One of the ancestors of Sir Ralph Eure also held a grant of Scottish lands from an English monarch. "I have seen," says Stowe, "under the broad-seal of the said King Edward I., a manor, called Ketnes, in the county of Forfear, in Scotland, and near the furthest part of the same nation northward, given to John Ure and his heirs, ancestor to the Lord Ure that now is, for his service done in these partes, with market, &c., dated at Lanercest, the twentieth day of October, anno regis. 34."—Stowe's Annals, p. 210. drawn to the north away from the main points of the projected attack. This intelligence was communicated to Henry VIII. by some of his agents in Scotland. In the state of alarm which it produced he began to reflect that his past policy had been injudicious in the extreme, and that for two years he had only insulted and provoked the Scots, instead of subjugating them. His diplomatic and his warlike expedients had alike been frustrated by his own recklessness. In seeking to punish or to frighten his sworn agents the Douglasses for their unavoidably slow progress in the fulfilment of their pledges, he had stung them into active and successful hostility. He now desired, therefore, to fall back upon the treaties of peace and marriage, which his own imperious conduct had annihilated. When Sir George Douglas—who appears to have doubted either that the Scots could permanently hold out against the English, or that the Douglasses could ever regain and keep much influence in a free Scottish Government, and who was, therefore, ready to re-enter, on fair terms, the service of the English monarch—urged upon Henry the adoption of a conciliatory policy for prosecuting the treaties of union and marriage, assuring him that the measures of a different character which he was reported to be contemplating would drive the people 'to desperation,* the monarch resolved to follow the advice. He accordingly commissioned one of his Solway captives Henry VIII.

—the Earl of Cassillis—to enter upon a pacific negotiation. This proceeding must have been suggested by Douglas, for the Earl of Cassillis repaired to the English court on the 28th of February, only three days after Sir George's letter had been despatched—an interval far too brief to allow the King to receive the letter and to send back a summons for the attendance of Cassillis. This nobleman returned to Scotland with minute instructions for the management of his new agency. He experienced no difficulty in getting the Earls of Glencairn, Marischal, and the Douglasses, to act as his associates. Angus himself was profuse in his expressions of loyalty to King Henry; and, as evidence of his sincerity, he threw up the office of Lieutenant, which he held under the Scottish Regent. This step was not so unequivocal as to be incapable of such a construction as would permit him to continue in friendly intercourse with the leaders of the opposite party. The important post resigned was a military one, and he might plausibly allege that it was superfluous, when Henry was anxious for peace and amity. In recurring also to the treaties, all the considerations that had once weighed with the Regent, and been admitted even by the Queen-dowager, continued in force; and to plead these once more had no appearance of treason or disloyalty to Scotland.

* Original letter Sir George Douglas to the king from Lauder, State Paper Office. Referred to by Tytler, vol. v. p. 319. In this letter Sir George mentions the great losses he had sustained by the last English invasion, as a counter-complaint to any charge which King Henry might bring against him.

A more powerful party, however, consisting of the formidable opposition. Queen-dowager, and the Earls of Huntly and Argyle, remained to be won over to the English interest; and private or diplomatic access to these seems to have been thought impracticable, or at least to have been left untried. A convention of the nobility was summoned to be held on the 15th of April, to consider and decide upon the proposals with which the Earl of Cassillis was intrusted from the English monarch. Meanwhile, Henry's Border Wardens received directions to abstain from all incursions and hostilities, and to keep up an appearance of peace, though all the time the Earl of Hertford was engaged—according to the suggestion of Cassillis—in levying on the borders an army of thirty thousand men for the invasion of Scotland, in the event of the rejection of Henry's overtures. Sir Ralph Sadler, who had an intimate acquaintance with the affairs of Scotland, was appointed Treasurer-at-War and political agent.*

On the 17th of April the convention met at Edinburgh, when Cassillis appeared as the ambassador of the English monarch, and urged the nobles to agree to the treaties of peace and marriage; assuring them that their doing so would obliterate from the king's mind the recollection of his recent injuries and every wish to avenge them.† This manner of unfolding and advocating the negotiation was, unfortunately, calculated to neutralise the message of conciliation; and, characteristic as it was of Henry's haughtiness, could not fail to wound the pride of the Scottish nobility. His allusion to 'injuries' displayed a want of candour as well as an offensive tone of superiority, for the Scots had sustained greater injuries at his hands than they had inflicted upon him, the latter having been also in self-defence, whilst the former were those of uncalled-for aggression. But the majority in the convention were influenced by weightier motives than the impolitic and irritating language of Henry's agent. They had obtained satisfactory intelligence that the French auxiliaries had embarked; they were expecting a fleet of merchantmen with ample cargoes of provisions; the Emperor Charles V. had quarrelled with the English monarch, and made proposals of alliance with Scotland; and, in addition to those cheering prospects of great and varied assistance from the continent, the supporters of national independence had gathered strength from the recent victory, whilst the English cause had become more odious. Accordingly, the offer which Cassillis was empowered to make was rejected by Henry's proposals. the convention; the treaties of peace and marriage were again declared to have been dissolved; and a resolution was agreed to that the friendship and aid of France should be cordially accepted.* Of this unwelcome result Henry VIII. was soon apprised by the Earl of Cassillis, who also recommended the immediate invasion of Scotland.

Whenever Henry and his Scottish supporters were thwarted in their policy they threw the blame upon the able and crafty statesmanship of Beaton, who thus became the object of their most deadly animosity. He had again quickly and effectually crushed their rising projects; and Henry, though now resolved upon the alternative of war, encouraged a secret movement for the removal of Beaton by assassination. The conspiracy originated with Cassillis, was known to, and approved of, by the Earls of Angus, Glencairn, Marischal, and Sir George Douglas, and was communicated in the month of May to Sir Ralph Sadler, through whom intelligence of it soon reached the king and his Privy Council. The conspirators sought from the English monarch both protection against the consequences to themselves, and reward for the advantages which Henry would receive from the intended crime. Their first idea in arranging the plot was to send a confidential envoy to Sadler at Alnwick; but this was soon abandoned, and they requested that an English prisoner of the name of Forster, who could enter Scotland without exciting suspicions, should repair to a conference with them at Edinburgh.† The royal sanction was at once given to the despatch of Forster to Edinburgh; but Henry did not wish to appear cognisant of the plot against the Cardinal's life, though vehemently desirous of its sure and speedy execution. "His Majesty hath willed us," was the reply of the Privy Council, "to signify unto your lordship [Earl of Hertford] that his highness, reputing the fact not meet to be set forward expressly by His Majesty, will not seem to have to do in it, and yet, not misliking the offer, thinketh good that Mr. Sadler, to whom that letter was addressed, should write to the Earl of the receipt of his letter containing such an offer, which he thinketh not convenient to be communicated to the king's majesty. Marry, to write to him what he thinketh of the matter, he shall say that, if he were in the Earl of Cassillis's place, and were as able to do his majesty good service there, as he knoweth him to be, and thinketh a right good will in him to do it, he would surely do what he could for the execution of it, believing verily to do thereby not only an acceptable service to the king's majesty, but also a special benefit to the realm of Scotland, and would trust verily the king's majesty would consider his service in the same: as you doubt not of his accustomed goodness to those who serve him, but he would do the same to him."* The two instructions in this message were strictly followed out. Forster visited Scotland, and Sadler sent a communication to Cassillis, applauding the object of the conspiracy against Beaton, but affirming that the king neither participated in nor knew of it. The envoy first went to Dalkeith to Sir George Douglas, who easily procured for him a meeting with the Earls of Angus and Cassillis; but these cautious nobles would not venture to proceed without a written pledge from Henry, which would secure for them indemnity and recompense for the Cardinal's death; and, therefore, whilst welcoming Forster, they abstained from all allusions to the special design of his mission, and satisfied themselves with fervent protestations of their renewed fidelity to the English cause. Sir George, however, was more frank and explicit, and returned by Forster the following message to the Earl of Hertford:—"He willed me," says the envoy, "to tell my Lord-Lieutenant, that if the king would have the Cardinal dead, if his grace would promise a good reward for the doing thereof, so that the reward were known what it should be, the country being lawless as it is, he thinketh that that adventure would be proved; for he saith the common saying is, the Cardinal is the only occasion of the war, and is small beloved in Scotland; and then, if he were dead, by that means how that reward should be paid."† The king's objections against seeming to be connected with the plot, and against mentioning any price to be set upon Beaton's life, were not overcome; and the deed of assassination was left, for the present, unattempted.

In the month of May, and before this wicked project was suspended, a French French fleet with fleet arrived off the west coast, large forces. with a body of three thousand infantry and five hundred horse, under the command of Sieur Lorges de Montgomerie, who, before disembarking at Dumbarton, took precautions against any device similar to that which had been practised on his countrymen by the Earl of Lennox. The French were all the more cordially welcomed on its being known that they brought a considerable war-chest and a body-guard of one hundred archers to attend the Regent's person. The French king, completely unaware of the change that had recently come over the policy of the Douglasses, had sent over to Angus the insignia of the order of St. Michael, in honour of the patriotism and valour which he had shown at the battle of Anern Moor, and of which a flattering account had been transmitted to France by the Queen-dowager.‡

A convention of the nobility of the kingdom was forthwith held at Stirling, to deliberate on the national movements proper to be made for taking full advantage of the powerful aid of the French auxiliaries. It was agreed to maintain the alliance with France, and to concert and execute an invasion of England, their mutual enemy. There was a secret understanding between the English court and the Earls of Cassillis, Angus, Glencairn, and Sir George Douglas, that no formal or public opposition should be offered to these resolutions carried by the majority in the convention, but that apparent acquiescence and unanimity should be preserved, in order that better opportunities and means might be found for treacherously frustrating, at the most important crisis, the attempt upon England. Sir George Douglas, referring to the preparations that would be made by the Scots, when assisted by the French, for marching across the borders, gave the following declaration to Forster:—"By reason of the encouragement of the Frenchmen and the fair largeness that the French king hath promised them by Lorges Montgomerie, they are fully bent to fight. But he [Sir George Douglas] saith, though that he must needs be also there with them, he will do them no good, but will do all that he can to stop them; and saith, that if they may be stopped since they have made so gret braggia and avant to Lorges Montgomerie, it would, as he thinketh, put away all the Commons' hearts from them."*

On the 9th of August, the Scottish host, assembled by the Regent, presented a truly formidable appearance; and great expectations were entertained of what would be achieved by thirty thousand men, with three thousand and upwards of the finest infantry and cavalry of France. But both the van and the rear were under the command of the Douglasses and their partizans, who were secretly pledged either to inaction or retreat. The Earl of Hertford had also been vigilant in providing for the defence of the English Borders; and, in such circumstances, the operations of the Scottish army were likely to be feeble and desultory. On the 10th of August, the Scots marched into England, and set fire to a few villages and fortified places, but shrunk from more serious attempts; and, two days after, commenced a rapid and most inglorious retreat. "Upon the 13th day of August," says an old chronicle, "the Scottish men come home, thro' the deceit of George Douglas and the vanguard."† The sudden and disgraceful close of

In the text we have taken the dates of the invasion from the "Diurnal;" but Buchanan (book xv. chap. 29) represents it as having lasted for ten days. This is, perhaps, the more probable account, and we wonder that Mr. Tytler should not have seen that it would agree perfectly well with the date of a letter (25th August) from the Scottish king who wrote to Sadler, announcing that they had been the means of stopping the invasion. The ten days of an invasion would bring the period down to the 20th of August, and the letter referred to was written on the 25th, so that this account corresponds as well with ten days as with three.

this expedition was greatly disheartening to the people, and indicated what a slight resistance would be offered to the army of Hertford, which was about to make a fierce and desolating campaign in Scotland.

The Anglo-Scottish nobles, having thwarted

The Earl of Hertford's preparations. Regent Arran's incursion into England, urged that the Earl of Hertford's invasion of Scotland should immediately be commenced with an overwhelming force, equipped for a war, and not for a mere inroad. The Douglasses could not openly take part in the movement which they recommended; and with the view, probably, of securing themselves against Henry's vengeance for such neutrality in the field, they advised the leader of the invading army to declare by proclamation that he 'came not to injure the kingdom or any subject in it who sought to promote the treaties of peace and marriage between the two countries.' Hertford had enough of enthusiasm as a soldier to have preferred a regular and decisive war to a hasty incursion; but his royal master was both too impetuous and too parsimonious to be pleased with the idea of maintaining, for months, a large army fighting in the barren North. Preparations for an expedition, both by land and sea, were far advanced. A naval descent, to be undertaken by the Earl of Lennox, on the west coast of Scotland, had been arranged with Donald, Lord of the Isles, and Earl of Ross, who, on the 18th of August, passed over to Knockfergus in Ireland, with a fleet of a hundred and eighty galleys carrying four thousand men, who are described, in a despatch from the Irish Privy Council, as 'very tall men, clothed for the most part in habergeons of mail, armed with long swords and long bows, but with few guns.' To co-operate with these auxiliaries, the Earl of Ormond was instructed to levy ten thousand kerns and gallowglasses. Lennox was appointed to the chief command of the whole force; but this naval expedition was ordered to be delayed, and he was summoned by Hertford to the English camp. †

Hertford having notified to Cassillis, Glencairn, and the Douglasses, his expectation that they would

Buchanan's version, whilst coinciding so far with the "Diurnal," and with documents in the State Paper Office, as not to praise the conduct of the Douglasses, does not represent the invasion as such a disgraceful failure. "From this station [the neighbourhood of Wark Castle] they made almost daily incursions with colours flying, and drove away great booty. The enemy in vain endeavoured to prevent their fields from being plundered. Meanwhile, Montgomery and George Hume sedulously urged the Regent to move his camp beyond the river Tweed, that they might have a freer range, and spread the terror further; but the Regent and his council opposed the measure, as they were destitute of artillery for besieging places, and, disbanding the army, they returned home. The other nobles withdrew to wherever they found it most convenient for the winter. Montgomery went to the court."

join him with their vassals, began his march on the 5th of September, and having Hertford's invasion, 5th of September. rapidly crossed the Borders, sat down before Kelso. The town, which was entirely open, was speedily captured; but the abbey was bravely defended by the monks and their vassals, and held out against the Spanish mercenaries until Hertford's ordnance effected a breach, through which the troops entered and put the garrison to the sword. The army advanced in its desolating progress. The Scottish earls had declined to join the invaders before obtaining more minute information respecting the course and results of the expedition; and Hertford, prepared for such a contingency, proceeded to lay waste, with fire and sword, the extensive territories of the neutral barons. The lands of the Douglasses were ravaged with special severity, and the poor dependents of the soil massacred or reduced to beggary. Melrose, Dryburgh, and Jedburgh, with all the neighbouring villages, castles, and farm-granges were pillaged, and then given to the flames, and the wretched inhabitants who escaped with their lives were left to perish of cold and hunger.

Hertford assured King Henry that he had far outstripped all his predecessors in devastation and that it was the opinion of the Border gentlemen that so much damage had not been done in Scotland for the last hundred years.* Even those of his men who were familiar with the barbarities which had been inflicted in the beginning of the year by Sir Ralph Eure shuddered at Hertford's revolting orders, and were so reluctant to execute these, that he—suspecting their lenient tendencies—placed a body of more hardened savages—hundred wild Irish soldiers—to glean behind them in the harvest of desolation, and to make barrenness more bare and ruin more ghastly.

surprise from Lennox and the Lord of the Isles contented themselves with guarding their own provinces. Angus now tamely bore injuries which some months before, had stirred his wrath and prompted the most sanguinary retaliation. He indeed, made a show—not of resistance—but of reprisals, and accompanied a body of ten thousand Scots, levied by the Regent, into England, where after burning a single village, he advised an immediate retreat on the first appearance of a small force of English Borderers. † As often happened with those who want the resolution to defend themselves, the Scots were also deserted by some of their French allies, who went over to Hertford. He waited for instructions from the king as to whether or not he should receive them; and Henry, through his Privy Council, after dwelling on the general impolicy of putting any trust in Frenchmen, characteristically suggested that any future deserters should be urged to prove their sincerity by some important achievement, which would cause a 'notable damage or displeasure to the enemy'—such as 'trapping or killing the Cardinal, Lorges, the Governor, or some other man of estimation, whereby it can appear that they bear hearty good will to serve, which thing,' adds the king, 'if they shall have done, your lordship may promise them not only to accept the service, but also to give them such reward as they shall have good cause to be therewith right well contented.'*

The English commander soon saw that his troops Hertford's began themselves to suffer from retreat. the famine which their savage inroad had spread over the richest districts of Scotland. Provisions and plunder alike were failing them, and a retreat was inevitable. This, at every step, was signalized by acts of the most wanton destruction; and towers and villages, in which there was nothing to pillage, were burnt down. Home Castle was impregnable and defied all assaults, but other towers and forts were razed to the ground; and as, on entering the Merse, he had robbed the inhabitants of their property, so now, on leaving it, he sought to deprive them of all means of safety and security. On the 23rd of September he reached Horton, and on dismissing his forces placed his Italian and Spanish mercenaries in the Border garrisons. The campaign had only lasted fifteen days; but its merciless character, and the energy with which it was conducted, are attested by the fact that, during that short period, the English army burnt seven monasteries and religious houses, sixteen castles and towers, five market-towns, two hundred and forty-three villages, thirteen mills, and three hospitals. †

At a parliament, summoned by the Regent and Meeting of parliament at Stirling. held at Stirling immediately after the Earl of Hertford's retreat, the Earl of Lennox and his brother, the Bishop of Caithness, were proclaimed traitors. As this proceeding had been expected, and as it involved the forfeiture and division of the extensive and valuable estates of the earl, and the appropriation of his brother's bishopric, the meeting of the three estates was very numerously attended, probably because the nobles were all equally anxious to obtain their share of the forfeited estates. Argyle, in acknowledgment of his eminent fidelity to the interests of the government, received the largest portion; and Huntly obtained some of the possessions for himself and the bishopric of Caithness for his brother. ‡ The defenceless condition of the country also came before parliament, and it was resolved that a thousand horsemen should be raised for the protection of the Borders, to be commanded by the ablest and bravest of the Border barons, and to be supported by a tax of sixteen thousand pounds payable by the three estates.* An additional force of a thousand men was also ordered to be levied, and to be maintained at the expense of France. To procure larger subsidies for resisting the encroachments of England, Cardinal Beaton, it was reported, was about to accompany Lorges to France.

News of the Cardinal's intended journey, and of his having also gained over many of the Scottish nobles to consent to a marriage between their young sovereign and the Regent's son, who was kept by Beaton as a hostage in the castle of St. Andrew's, and trained under his own immediate superintendence, reached Henry VIII., and roused him to new efforts. His captive, Lord Maxwell, was owner of three important and almost impregnable castles—Caerlaverock, Lochmaben, and Thrave; and the king was bent on laying hold of these fortresses and garrisoning them with English soldiers, that they might become convenient rallying-points for his partizans who were scattered over the country. He was equally anxious that the postponed descent upon the west coast by the Earl of Lennox and the Lord of the Isles should now be set about vigorously. The former project miscarried. Lord Maxwell had, from first to last, in the course of the negotiations for peace and marriage, temporized between the rights and liberties of Scotland and the tyrannical pretensions of England; and, for his want of fidelity in supporting the latter, Henry had violently threatened him with close confinement in the Tower of London. The baron's humble offer to prove himself a 'true Englishman,' by serving under Hertford against Scotland, and wearing the red cross on his armour, was not satisfactory to the monarch, who, at last, succeeded, in extorting from him the delivery of Caerlaverock, as the price of his liberty. † This was an acquisition which promised the speedy realization of the monarch's design to maintain several English garrisons in the enemy's country. In the beginning of November, ^{Caerlaverock recovered by the Scots.} however, Regent Arran besieged and took Caerlaverock and the other two fortresses belonging to Maxwell, who, with his English confederates, was captured and imprisoned in Dumfries. Those important strongholds were thus not only recovered from the English, but also alienated from a family of, at best, doubtful loyalty. Mortified at this unexpected and signal failure of a scheme from which he had confidently expected great advantages, Henry turned all the more resolutely and energetically to his other project—the invasion of the west coast by the Earl of Lennox. But in this, too, he was destined to be disappointed. Donald, Lord of the Isles, having tarried in Ireland for some time, in vain looking for the arrival of Lennox, whose presence had been required in Hertford's camp, had returned with his powerful fleet to his own dominions, and died quietly in his bed. His successor, James Macconnell, Lord of Dunyveg, inherited his bitter hostility to the Scots, and hoped also to earn his English pension. Lennox, having been informed by the Earl of Glencairn that circumstances were propitious to an enterprise for the recovery of Dunbarton Castle, set off in haste to Ireland, and despatched his brother, the ex-bishop of Caithness, to employ all his craft to prevail upon the keeper of the castle to surrender. He also put himself in communication with the new Lord of the Isles. Taking the command of the two thousand men who had previously been levied by the Earl of Ormond, he sailed from Dublin on the 17th of November with a larger squadron than had left Ireland for the last two hundred years. Precipitate as this movement unquestionably was (for he had not waited for the return of the envoy whom he had sent to the Lord of the Isles, and could not therefore be sure of early enough co-operation from that distant quarter), it was anticipated by the Regent and Cardinal Beaton, who, with unusual alertness, adopted prompt and vigorous measures to defeat it. They had been apprized of the visit of the deposed bishop and his admission into the castle of Dunbarton, and at once conjectured the object of his visit. They lost no time in besieging the fortress, which, however, maintained its old reputation for strength, and, for a time, resisted all the assaults made upon it by the forces of Arran, Huntly, and Argyle. Force having failed, the besiegers tried the more potent influence of bribes, which, at length, overcame not only the ecclesiastic, but also the Governor, Stirling of Glorat, who, it will be remembered, on a former occasion had shown himself incorruptibly honest, and who but recently had declared that he would hold out the castle against all parties alike until his mistress, the Queen of Scots, should be of age to demand it for herself.* Intelligence of this important capture must have reached Lennox in time to warn him that his maritime expedition would be useless, for the squadron never approached the coast, and it is uncertain whether it returned to Dublin or made for Bristol.

The reckless haste of Lennox had deprived him of the assistance of the Lord of the Isles, whose zeal, however, for the English cause, and anxiety to co-operate with the earl on its behalf, was not diminished: for in the beginning of the following year he sent proposals to Henry, urging that Lennox should be despatched with an army to the Isle of Sanda, near Kentire, where all his own forces and those of his numerous kinsmen and allies would be ready to join him.* This communication reached Henry in the middle of February 1545-6; and, important as it would then be held, the attention of the English monarch must have been soon diverted from any decision relative to it by the startling events which took place in Scotland.

Cardinal Beaton had become widely obnoxious. The nation at large was as yet by no means fully imbued with the doctrines of the Protestant faith; yet the simplicity and truthfulness of its principles were appreciated by great numbers of the Scottish people, and their feelings were shocked by the intolerance and cruel persecutions of the hierarchy. Beaton had long sought with unrelenting severity to extirpate heresy; and Regent Arran's conversion had greatly increased his power, and whetted his desire to preserve the dominancy of the old religion, and to crush every attempt at innovation. He was fast rising above control; and, when free to carry out his ecclesiastical tyranny, what appalling scenes might be enacted! In proportion as open resistance to his policy had been punished and overawed did secret fear and hatred increase and spread throughout the kingdom. The Cardinal was specially odious to those of the Scottish barons who were engaged to support the schemes of Henry VIII. His subtle and vigorous statesmanship had frustrated their designs and countermined all intrigues until they were weary of plotting; whilst Henry was infuriated at the consequent delay in the fulfilment of their pledges. From the castle of St. Andrew's there swiftly and surely glanced forth detection and ruin upon the deliberations that had engrossed the most anxious attention and care of the English court and Privy Council, with all their agents and abettors. The Scottish barons, unpatriotic as they were, did not wish to establish Henry's unrighteous claims otherwise than by diplomacy. They had, indeed, occasionally advised armed inroads; but they shrunk from the prospect of Scotland being placed under English rule by conquest. As long as Beaton lived, all diplomacy, which had for its object the realization of the designs of the English court, seemed to be utterly vain; and the barons had, for some time back, entertained a scheme for getting rid of their dreaded foe by assassination.

Henry was more than favourable to this nefarious project, but was unwilling to have his name associated with its execution. It was followed, as it had also been preceded, by the conspiracy of Crichton, the Laird of Brunston. In the month of July, 1545, this baron opened communication with Sir Ralph Sadler 'touching the killing of the Cardinal;' and passages in Sadler's reply deserve quotation, as showing the shrewd Englishman's opinion of the strangely-mixed character of his correspondent. Sadler hints at a 'reward' for the deed; but also notices, with emphasis, the 'glory to God' that would accrue. "In one part,"

* Privy Council of Ireland to the Privy Council of England, 16th February, 1546, with the Lord of the Isles' letter inclosed. State Paper Office. Tytler, vol. v. p. 338.

writes Sadler, "of your said letters, I note chiefly that certain gentlemen, being your friends, have offered, for a small sum of money, to take him out of the way, that hath been the whole impediment and let to all good purposes there, so that they might be sure to have the king's majesty their good lord, and that his majesty would reward them for the same. Of this I judge that you mean the Cardinal, whom I know to be so much blinded to his own affection to France, that, to please the same, he seeth not, but openly contemneth all things tending to the weal and benefit of his own country; and, indeed, hitherto he hath been the only cause and worker of all your mischief, and will, if he continue, be undoubtedly the utter ruin and confusion of the same. Wherefore, I am of your opinion, and, as you write, think it to be acceptable service to God to take him out of the way, who in such sort doth not only as much as in him is to obscure the glory of God, but also to confound the common weal of his own country. And albeit, the king's majesty, whose gracious nature and goodness I know, will not, I am sure, have to do with this matter touching your said Cardinal, for sundry considerations: yet, if you could so work the matter with these gentlemen, your friends, who have made that offer, that it may take effect, you shall undoubtedly do therein good service both to God and his majesty, and a singular benefit to your country. Wherefore, like as if I were in your place, it should be the first thing I would earnestly attempt, thinking thereby for the respect aforesaid chiefly to please God and to do good to my country. And if the execution of this matter do rest only upon the reward of the king's majesty to such as shall be the executors of the same, I pray you advertise me what reward they do require, and if it be not unreasonable, because I have been in your country, for the Christian zeal that I have to the common weal of the same, I will undertake it shall be paid immediately upon the act executed, though I do myself bear the charge of the same, which I would think well employed. Thus I write to you mine own mind in this matter, as one that would be glad to give you such advice, as whereby you should do that service to God, the king's majesty, and your own native country, as might also be to your own profit and good fame."* In October of the same year, Brunston sent several communications to England, with the intention of drawing forth the pledge of protection and reward from the king. In this, however, he, like the Earl of Cassillis, failed, and the enterprise was abandoned. In consequence of this reluctance on the part of Henry to give a definite promise of a reward, the Scottish barons in the interest of England allowed the matter to drop; and the few persons of rank, who, loathing Beaton's persecuting character, sought to remove him by assassination, appear to have determined not to attempt the unjustifiable deed, unless under the express sanction of the English Privy Council, as a sort of substitute for that legal condemnation of the Cardinal's crimes, which it was hopeless to obtain in Scotland.

There is no evidence whatever of what is repeatedly alleged by Mr. Tytler, that Beaton ignorant Beaton was aware of the various ^{of the plots} undeveloped plots against his life, ^{against him} against him. far less that he had been made acquainted with the names of the hesitating conspirators. The allegation is intended as an apology for his trial and execution of the celebrated George Wishart, who, as being in some degree personally intimate with the Laird of Brunston, is, with almost as little evidence, alleged to have known and approved of the plots against the Cardinal. It is sufficient to indicate here, that no proof is extant for the pretext that the persecutor was informed of the existence of such plots, or suspected that Wishart was in any way connected with them; and it will afterwards be seen that this connection, unsuspected by the Cardinal, is now and ever incredible, unless by those who will hang, on a mere thread of the weakest circumstantial evidence, a judgment which in itself would require the very strongest testimony, and which is repudiated by every characteristic of Wishart's memorable career.

George Wishart, of Pitarrow, in Mearns, kept a school for some time in Montrose, where he taught his pupils to read the New Testament in the original language. On account of the persecution to which this exposed him, he was compelled to take refuge in England, and prosecuted his studies at the University of Cambridge, where he was distinguished for his learning and his gentle and amiable disposition. He had early embraced the principles of the Protestant faith; and it was their religious, not their political, bearings, which engrossed his study in youth, as they subsequently formed the absorbing theme of his preaching. He returned to Scotland in the summer of 1543, in the company of the commissioners who were sent by Henry VIII. to arrange the treaties of peace and marriage. The eloquence and zeal which he displayed in preaching the doctrines of the Reformation soon rendered him an object of jealousy and dislike to the Romish priesthood, and he twice narrowly escaped assassination. For a time he was protected by a trusty band of armed followers, who watched assiduously over his welfare; but he was ultimately obliged to take refuge in West Lothian, where some of the Protestant lairds concealed him by turns in their houses. In the beginning of 1546, Beaton—to whom Wishart was particularly obnoxious—hearing that the preacher was at Ormiston, determined on his apprehension. The Earl of Bothwell, who was then devoted to the interest of the Cardinal, submitted to become the instrument in his hand for entrapping the gentle and laborious martyr, and suddenly surrounded the house of Ormiston under cover of night, while the Cardinal himself remained at a short distance with a body of five hundred men. Wishart surrendered upon a solemn assurance that his life would be spared; but Beth-will soon after treacherously delivered him up to Beaton, who conveyed his prisoner to St. Andrew's, and cast him into a dungeon in his castle. The Regent, who was averse to bloodshed, refused to grant a commission to a civil judge to try Wishart;

Martyrdom of Wishart. but the unscrupulous Primate was not on that account to be balked of his prey. He summoned a council of the bishops and abbots at St. Andrew's, and, on his own authority, brought Wishart to trial as a heretic. He was, of course, found guilty and condemned to the stake—a sentence which was carried into execution on the following day, 28th March, 1546.

The execution of Wishart was as impolitic as it is effect on the public mind. was barbarous, and the cruel fate of the martyr excited deep and general indignation against his murderer. The clergy, indeed, warmly applauded the deed, and declared that if the same severity and vigour had been shown at an earlier period, the evils which now affected the church and the realm would have been averted. But the reforming party naturally regarded the death of Wishart as a murder committed under the forms of law. Some, at least, of their number were not slow to conclude that it would be an act of lawful vengeance to cut off his wicked persecutor and destroyer; and there can be no doubt that the conspiracy against the life of the Cardinal derived great strength from the popular feeling which the execution of Wishart had excited.

Meanwhile, Beaton, confident in his position, and apparently quite unconscious of his danger, was engaged in strengthening himself by forming family alliances, and procuring bonds of 'manrent' from many of the most powerful nobles. Soon after the death of Wishart, he went into Angus, and was present at the marriage of Margaret, one of his natural daughters, to David Lindsay, Master of Crawford. The nuptials were celebrated with great magnificence at Finhaven Castle, the Cardinal who gave away the bride in person bestowing upon her the princely dowry of four thousand merks.* In the midst of the marriage festivities, a rumour reached him that King Henry meditated an invasion of the east coast of Scotland; and, fearing lest his own castle of St. Andrew's might be unprepared for resistance, he returned home in haste, and immediately set about the erection of extensive fortifications. He also summoned a meeting of the barons, whose estates lay near the coast, to co-operate with him in making preparations for the defence of the country. Nor did he, in the midst of his exertions to repel the attacks of foreign enemies, overlook his domestic foes. Knox mentions that the purpose of the Cardinal at this time was to put to death or imprison the Master of Rothes, John Lesley, the Lairds of Grange father and son, Sir James Learmont, of Darsie, Provost of St. Andrew's, along with several other leaders of the reformed party.* His blood-thirsty schemes, however, were destined soon to be terminated. Norman Lesley, Master of Rothes, had, until very lately, been one of the Cardinal's most powerful supporters, and had even granted to him a bond of 'manrent.' But a private quarrel which now occurred rendered them mortal enemies. Beaton, on the pro- the Cardinal and mise of a valuable equivalent, had Norman Lesley.

obtained from the young baron the estate of Easter Wemyss, in Fife.† In the meeting at St. Andrew's, when reminded of his promise, and requested to fulfil it, he gave an equivocal reply, which led first to remonstrances and then to an angry altercation. Norman declared that he had been circumvented by fraud, and the prelate complaining that his dignity had been insulted by a raw stripling.‡ They separated with expressions of mutual hatred. Norman immediately repaired to his uncle, John Lesley, who had already threatened vengeance for the blood of the martyr Wishart, and complained to him of the injury which he had received from Beaton. The uncle and nephew called into their counsels Kirkaldy of Grange, James Melville, and several other associates, and, after a secret consultation, it was determined that the Cardinal should be put to death without delay.

On the evening of Friday, the 28th of May, the conspirators proceeded quietly to St. Andrew's; and though forming Cardinal Beaton, in all but a small band, they 29th of May, 1544. travelled in three detachments, and at different hours. Kirkaldy of Grange was the first to enter the town. He was followed by Norman Lesley, who arrived in the evening, with only five followers. John Lesley, whose hatred of the Cardinal was well known, did not make his appearance at the rendezvous until after nightfall. The conspirators were only sixteen in number—a band strong enough, perhaps, to waylay and seize the Cardinal's person, on one of his short journeys, as had been at one time proposed, but apparently quite inadequate to surprise him in his own well fortified and carefully guarded castle. But stratagem made up for the want of force. Next morning at daybreak, the conspirators assembled in the churchyard of the cathedral, and, after completing their arrangements, broke up into small, detached groups, and approached the castle. For weeks the erection of the additional fortifications had been energetically carried on, the masons and other artisans labouring as long as daylight lasted, and resuming their operations at earliest dawn. The drawbridge had been lowered to admit the work-

* Keith says,—“I have seen a copy of the contract of marriage in the hands of David Beton, of Balfour. It is dated at St. Andrew's, the 10th of April, 1546, and subscribed by the Cardinal, who expressly calls the bride my daughter, with whom he gives 4,000 merks in dowry, a great sum at that time. The King of England gave but 1,000 merks with his niece to the Earl of Lennox.”—Keith's History, p. 42.

men; and Kirkaldy of Grange, with six men, entered, and inquired if the Cardinal was yet awake. Whilst the porter was thus held in conversation, Norman Lesley, Melville, and their company, passed the gates without attracting notice; but, on perceiving John Lesley, who followed, the porter instantly suspected treason, and, rushing to the drawbridge, unloosed its fastening, and had nearly succeeded in raising it, when Lesley, by leaping across the gap, secured an entrance.* In a moment the porter was knocked down, robbed of the keys of the castle, and thrown into the moat, before he could give the alarm. With equal despatch and quietness, the separate groups of workmen on the ramparts were led to the gate and dismissed. Kirkaldy of Grange, who was familiar with all the passages and communications of the castle, immediately placed himself as guard at a private postern, through which alone the Cardinal could now escape, whilst the other conspirators went to the chambers occupied by the gentlemen forming the household of the prelate, awoke them, and, threatening them with instant death if they made any outcry, put them one by one out at the gate. In this manner the handful of conspirators expelled more than a hundred workmen and fifty domestics, and were complete masters of the castle. Their triumphant shouts awoke the Cardinal from his slumbers, and, putting on a night-gown, he hurried to the window, and inquired what the bustle meant. On learning that the castle had been taken by Norman Lesley, he rushed to the private postern; but, finding it guarded, he fled back to his bed-chamber, seized his 'two-handed sword,' and, with the help of his page, barred the door with chests and other heavy articles of furniture. John Lesley now approached the chamber and demanded admittance. 'Who calls?' said the Cardinal. 'My name is Lesley,' was the reply. 'Is that Norman?' farther inquired the unhappy prelate, probably hoping to awaken in Norman's breast the kindly and reverential feelings which the young baron had once cherished towards him. 'Nay,' said the conspirator, 'my name is John.' 'I will have Norman,' exclaimed Beaton, 'for he is my friend.' 'Content yourself,' returned Lesley, 'with such as are here, for other you shall have none.'

Norman appears to have stood aloof, probably from an unwillingness to take part in, or to witness the murder of, a defenceless priest, with whom he had formerly been united in the closest alliance.†

* This is the order of entrance given by Knox and the old historians. It was in keeping with the sagacity with which the plot was laid and executed, that the least suspected of the conspirators should first enter the castle. Mr. Tytler (vol. v. p. 353) makes Norman Lesley the first to pass the gates. There is no authority for this change.

† A dagger, said by family tradition to have been worn by Norman Lesley on this occasion, is preserved at Leslie House. The sheath is of silver, richly chased, and the handle of ivory, studded with star-like silver nails. The blade is somewhat raised in the centre, and is altogether a deadly looking weapon. Though Norman did not actively assist in the murder of Cardinal Beaton, it is possible that, when the deed was done, he may have struck his dagger into

Two of the band—James Melville and Peter Carmichael—united with John Lesley in attempting to force open the door, which, being massive and strong, resisted all their efforts. Beaton, after concealing a box of gold under a heap of coats which lay in a corner of the room,* began to beg hard for a promise that his life should be spared. 'Will ye save my life?' asked he. 'It may be that we will,' was the equivocal reply of Lesley. 'Nay,' returned the unsatisfied Cardinal, 'swear unto me by God's wounds, and I will open the door unto you.' 'It that was said is unsaid,' exclaimed John Lesley, infuriated at the delay, and withdrawing even the very ambiguous pledge which he had just given. He then called for fire to be brought and applied to the door, when it was unlocked by the Cardinal, who perceived that admittance could no longer be denied. John Lesley, with Carmichael and Melville, rushed in, and Beaton sat down on a chair crying out, 'I am a priest, I am a priest, ye will not slay me!' His priesthood, however, afforded no protection from the assault of his implacable enemies. It was associated in their minds with the harshest intolerance and the most cruel persecution, and especially with that 'burnt-offering' which, but two months previously, had been seen smoking within a few yards of the spot where they then stood. Disregarding his entreaties for mercy, Lesley and Carmichael repeatedly struck at him; but Melville, whom Knox describes as a man 'of a nature most gentle and most modest,'† rebuked them for their violence and impetuosity, and drew them back from the wounded prelate, whose life he wished to take with sacrificial solemnity. 'This work and judgment of God,' said he, 'although it be secret, ought to be done with greater gravity;' and presenting the point of his sword to the wounded prelate, with judicial sternness thus addressed him:—'Repent thee of thy former wicked life, but especially of the shedding of the blood of that notable instrument of God, Mr. George Wishart, which, albeit the flame of fire consumed before men, yet cries it for vengeance upon thee, and we from God are sent to revenge it. For here, before my God, I protest, that neither the hatred of thy person, the love of thy riches, nor the fear of any trouble thou

Norman Lesley subsequently distinguished himself in the French service against the Emperor, and his gallant bearing in an engagement fought near Cambray, in 1554, is thus described by Melville, a contemporary:—"With thirty companies he rode up the hill on a fair, grey gelding. He had shone his coat of black velvet his coat of armour, with two broad white crosses, the one before and the other behind, with sleeves of mail. He charged sixty of the enemy's bowmen armed with culverins, followed by only seven of his own. He struck five from their horses with his spear before it broke, then drew his sword and ran in among them, not regarding their continual shooting, to the admiration of all beholders. He slew several of them, and at length, when he saw a company of spearmen coming up against him, he rode up to the Constable of France, whom his horse had died of his wounds, and he himself, being shot in divers places, was carried to the king's own tent, and died in fifteen days after."

couldst have done to me in particular, moved or moveth me to strike thee; but only because thou hast been and remainest an obstinate enemy against Christ Jesus and his holy Evangel.* Having thus spoken, he passed his sword twice or thrice through the body of the Cardinal, who fell down and expired, exclaiming, 'I am a priest, I am a priest; fie, fie, all is gone!'—words as prophetic of the downfall of the Romish Church as if they had come from the lips of saint or martyr.

Meanwhile, the workmen and domestics, who Alarm of the townsmen. had been expelled from the castle, were raising an alarm in the town.

The inhabitants, startled out of their slumbers by the ringing of the common bell and the unusual shouts in the streets, rushed out of their houses, and were appalled by the news that the castle was taken. The prosperity of St. Andrew's was closely connected with its ecclesiastical superiority, and the princely magnificence of the primate's expenditure had, no doubt, rendered him popular with the inhabitants of the city.† On hearing of the capture of the castle, several hundreds of the townspeople, headed by the provost, hurried to the side of the moat, crying out, 'What have ye done with my Lord Cardinal?' 'Let us see my Lord Cardinal.' Some insisted on scaling-ladders being brought that an entrance might be forced. The conspirators, appearing at the windows and battlements, advised them to disperse immediately and quietly, for 'he, whom they called the Cardinal, had received his reward, and, in his own person, would trouble the world no more.'‡ But the

The Cardinal's corpse shown to the mob. townsmen cried out the more angrily, 'We shall never depart till that we see him.' Norman

Lesley then taunted them bitterly as 'unreasonable fools,' who wished to speak with a dead man; and, dragging the Cardinal's bleeding body to a window, hung it by a sheet over the wall. 'There,' said he, 'is your god; and, now that ye are satisfied, get you home to your houses!'—a command which was instantly obeyed by the terror-stricken multitude.§

Knox adds, "Now, because the weather was hot (for it was in May, as ye have heard), and his funeral could not suddenly be prepared, it was thought best to keep him from stinking, to give him great salt enough, a cope of lead, and a corner in the bottom of the sea-tower (a place where many of God's children had been imprisoned before), to await what exequies his brethren the bishops would prepare for him."||

† At this time, the town of St. Andrew's afforded employment to sixty or seventy bakers and as many brewers. At the Senzie fair, which was held annually within the Priory and lasted fifteen days, the harbour was filled with from two to three hundred vessels from Flanders, Holland, France, and other continental countries.

Thus perished Cardinal David Beaton in the fifty-second year of his age, while at the height of his vast power and in the full vigour of his great abilities. At no previous period of his career had he been so formidable, though, even if his assassination is not to be regarded as a proof that his recent accession of power involved danger to himself, it may be conjectured that his increasing oppression would ere long have been felt to be intolerable, and that many hostile weapons, grasped by men sorely wearied with the burden of his tyranny, and, indeed, driven to madness by his cruelties, would have stopped his persecuting course, and dealt out the vengeance which Lesley's dagger anticipated. It may be doubted whether the complete ascendancy which he had recently gained, and which he was certain to have used despotically against the obnoxious nobles and the whole body of Reformers, could have lasted more than a few months, in the event of his having escaped the conspiracy to which he fell a victim. Had the first attempt against his life failed, many others would have been made to rid the country of his insatiable cruelty towards all who dared to thwart his schemes or to think for themselves in matters of religion.

That the deed which gave deliverance to Scotland must be stigmatized as murder no one can doubt; at the same time, in passing sentence of condemnation on the murderers, we must not forget the situation in which they were placed. Some at least of their number had not only grievous wrongs to redress, but precautions to take for the protection of their lives; and it is certain that the law, which was entirely under Beaton's management and control, would have given them no satisfaction for the past, and no assurance of safety for the future; and that, at any moment, their unscrupulous adversary could pervert that law for their destruction. They and the Reformers (who appear, however, as a body, to have had no knowledge of, or share in, the deed which was the means of delivering them,) felt that he was an enemy who would hesitate at no means to destroy them, and that they and he instead of being like rival parties in the same country, who could appeal for adjudication to an impartial authority, were like two hostile nations, which must not only settle their quarrel by force of arms, but be each ready, in self-defence, to anticipate the movements of the other. The sixteen conspirators did to Beaton just what he would have done to them under cover of law. It is not wonderful, then, that the Scottish Reformers, though not implicated in the conspiracy, should

After the surrender of the castle, the Cardinal's body was privately interred in the convent of the Blackfriars, St. Andrew's. have gladly hailed its successful result. A bloody persecutor had been taken away, and that at a time when his enmity was becoming every day more inveterate, and its indulgence more easy. It was natural for men who lived in almost hourly dread of his machinations to feel relieved on hearing the news of his death, and not to investigate very minutely the morality of the conspiracy by which he had fallen. It has been justly said, that when he who uses the sword to maintain his opinions perishes by the sword, there is certainly no great occasion for sorrow or regret among good men. The sentiments of the great majority of the Scottish people, in regard to the murder of the Cardinal, were probably in unison with those expressed by Sir David Lindsay:—

“As for the Cardinal, I grant,
He was the man we weel could want,
And we'll forget him soon!
And yet I think the sooth to say,
Although the loon is weel away,
The deed was foully done.”

As might have been expected, the murder of Consternation of Beaton produced the greatest consternation among the clergy and the faction which favoured an alliance with France. Its consequences, rather than its character, occupied their attention; and the removal of the man, on whose energy and skill they rested all their hopes of maintaining both the ancient faith and the ancient leagues, filled them with indescribable alarm. They felt that a terrible crisis had been brought about by this untoward event; and, engrossed with its probable results, and with the measures which ought to be adopted for their own protection and the security of the church, they left to modern sentimentalists the duty of lamenting the cruel fate of the Cardinal, and denouncing his murderers.

The Queen-dowager had, for many months back, been personally estranged from the Regent and the Queen-dowager. Beaton, through his successful exertions to oppose her claims on the regency of the kingdom; but his death was such a blow to the interests of their common party, that she was ready to sanction and encourage active proceedings against the conspirators. The Regent, though, perhaps, not greatly displeased at being freed from an imperious dictation which, if it spared him the trouble of thinking and deciding for himself on national affairs, must have subjected him to considerable mortification, knew that decency required him to express his horror at the deed of assassination, whilst the fact that his youthful son and heir was in the castle of St. Andrew's and at the mercy of Norman Lesley and his associates, furnished him with a powerful motive to take prompt and vigorous steps for the reduction of the fortress.

There seems, indeed, to have been such moderation in the policy both of the Convention of the nobility and Regent and the Queen-dowager, at the clergy, 10th of June. This time, for the promotion of public order and quiet, that the representatives of the various parties in the State were strongly disposed towards a reconciliation.

The absence of Beaton's violent spirit had already produced a salutary effect. A convention of the lords, spiritual and temporal, was held at Stirling on the 10th of June, and was numerously attended by the leaders of the long-contending factions. There were present, the Bishops of Orkney and Galloway; the Earls of Angus, Huntly, Argyll, Bothwell, Glencairn, and Sutherland; the Commandator of Kelso, the Abbots of Melrose, Paisley, Dunfermline, Cupar, Crossregal, Dryburgh, and Culross, with the Lords Fleming, Ruthven, Maxwell, Somerville, Hay of Yester, Innermeith, Elphinstoun, Livingston, Erskine, Sir George Douglas, and Sir William Hamilton. Concessions were made by both parties for the purpose of promoting unanimity. On the one hand, to conciliate the Douglasses and those barons who had been in favour of the English alliance, Regent Arran renounced the contract of marriage between the young queen and his son, to which he had been advised by the late Cardinal, and annulled the 'bands,' or feudal engagements, by which many of the barons were pledged to see that contract carried into effect, whilst the written obligations, under which other nobles had come to the Queen-dowager, to oppose such a marriage, were cancelled.* On the other hand, the Earl of Angus, Lord Maxwell, and Sir George Douglas professed their cordial approval of the late act of the Scottish parliament, which had dissolved the treaty of peace with England; declared their opposition to any proposal of marriage between Prince Edward and the young Queen of Scots; and solemnly repudiated for ever all the promises of loyalty and service which they had made to Henry VIII. At the same convention the office of chancellor, formerly held by Beaton, was conferred upon the Earl of Huntly.† The Lords Erskine and Livingston were confirmed in their charge of the person of the infant queen; Lord Maxwell was appointed warden of the west marches, and his strong castle of Lochmaben was once more restored to him. Twenty lords were nominated, four of whom in succession were to remain for a month at a time with the Regent, and form his secret council. To conciliate Angus and those who had hitherto acted with him, and to mark the confidence reposed in them, it was arranged that there should always be one of the party in this important council.‡ A clause in the treaty of peace which had lately been concluded between England and France, stipulated that Scotland might, if she chose, be comprehended in its provisions, and it was determined by the convention, that the 'comprehension should be accepted without prejudice to the queen, her realm, and its liberties.' A mild and apologetic reply was also

At the same time, a summons of treason was issued against the persons concerned in the assassination of Beaton, ordering them to appear before a parliament to be held at Edinburgh on the 30th of July;† and a proclamation was made prohibiting all persons, under the penalty of death or confiscation, from corresponding with the assassins, or furnishing them with provisions and implements of war.

Meanwhile, Norman Lesley and his associates had concluded that the castle of St. Andrew's, of which they still held possession, was likely to be by far the most secure refuge which they could find against the vengeance of the Government, and they determined to remain within its walls. It was strongly fortified, and well stored with ammunition and provisions to sustain a protracted siege. It also afforded, by sea, an easy communication with England, so that the English fleet might at any time furnish the garrison with supplies. They were joined by no fewer than a hundred and forty persons, some of whom approved of the Cardinal's murder, whilst others, dreading that a period of even fiercer persecution against the Reformers was about to commence, entered the castle for shelter from the coming storm. Amongst these were the Laird of Grange, Henry Balnaves, a senator of the College of Justice, Henry Primrose, the Laird of Pitmillie, Sir John Auchinleck, the Barons of Ormiston and Lang-Niddry, and various other persons of considerable note, who were soon after joined by the celebrated Reformer, John Knox. A powerful, though irregular, garrison was thus at the command of the conspirators, who were well able, out of the deceased Cardinal's chests of plate and money, to reward the bravery and skill which might be shown in the defence of the fortress.

A period of more than six weeks was spent by the Government in complete inaction, probably in the vain hope that the conspirators would comply with the summons, and surrender themselves for trial on the day named by the Privy Council. On the 29th of July a Parliament was held, in which they were declared guilty of high treason, though the summons was prolonged, first, until the 4th, and, afterwards, until the 14th day of the following month.* Norman Lesley, Peter Carmichael, James Kirkaldy, and John Lesley, had, with the view of obtaining delay, offered to make a full confession regarding the murder of the Cardinal, and to deliver up both the Regent's son and the castle of St. Andrew's, on condition of receiving a pardon duly ratified and attested by the Great Seal. To this the Regent and the majority of the three estates were willing to assent; but the Archbishop of Glasgow protested against granting any remission, unless it were preceded and sanctioned by an absolution from the Pope. The proposal, however, was agreed to, with a modification introduced by the Chancellor—that the pardon should be held null and void if the promises made by the conspirators were not fulfilled.† Both parties suspected each other of a want of honesty in the agreement; and Lesley and his associates delayed their surrender.

When Parliament assembled on the 14th of August, the pardon was ordered to be cancelled, and all the minutes relative to the proposal, if inserted in the Books of Parliament, to be "reven and tane furth thairroff (torn and taken out) swa that na memoir be of the samyn in time to cum."‡ On the same day an Act was passed, by which the Regent's eldest son, who was heir-presumptive to the crown, was excluded from all right of succession so long as he was detained a prisoner, and his younger brother was appointed in his place. At this meeting of the estates, on the summons against the conspirators being called, and none of them appearing, they were formally declared guilty of treason, and sentence of forfeiture was passed against them.§

* Keith's History, p. 51.

† Ibid. p. 61.

‡ Acts of the Scottish Parliament, vol. ii. p. 474.

§ The sentence against Norman Lesley was delayed for two days, it being expected that he would either comply with the summons or fulfil his former promises. It was, however, pronounced on the 16th of the same month.—Keith's History, p. 51.

On the 21st of August, the Privy Council issued an order that 'all fencible men, of whatsoever rank, within the sheriffdoms of Lothian, Haddington, Linlithgow, Stirling, Perth, Strathearn, and Monteith,' should appear at St. Andrew's, on the 29th of the same month, to begin the siege of the castle. * The Regent went in person to conduct the operations. In that age, however, the Scots were very imperfectly acquainted with the art of besieging fortified places, and the forces under Arran failed to make any impression on the walls of the castle. The besieged had lost no time in opening communications with Henry VIII. Kirkaldy of Grange, Balnaves, and John Lesley, who had been sent as envoys to that monarch, returned, with an assurance of his prompt and powerful assistance, on condition that they would pledge themselves to retain the Regent's son in their custody, and to promote the treaty of marriage between their young queen and Prince Edward.† The difficulty felt by these messengers in disembarking at the castle, on their return, led to the construction of an iron gate and a secure passage to the sea, 'which,' says Knox, 'greatly relieved the besieged, and abated the besiegers, who then saw that they could not stop them of victuals, unless that they should be masters of the sea, and that they clearly understood they could not be.‡'

The siege had lasted several months without any perceptible progress in the reduction of the fortress. Panter, secretary to the Queen-dowager, was sent to France to procure assistance, and remonstrances were addressed to England, against granting any succour or countenance to the Castilians, as the conspirators were now called. The assistance promised by the English monarch, and the conditions which he required, were known to the Regent and the Privy Council, and excited great alarm lest the castle and the Regent's son should be delivered up to the English. Thinking that a temporary truce might lead to a discontinuance of such dangerous communications with Henry, and expecting that, ere long, aid would arrive from France for the reduction of the castle, the Council, on the 17th of December, passed an Act empowering the Regent to conclude an armistice. The besieged readily accepted the proposal, for reasons which were at the time unknown to the Regent. Their principal defences had been greatly injured by his artillery; and sickness and scarcity of provisions were also beginning to affect the garrison.§ Had Arran been aware of the feeble and half-famished condition of the garrison, he might easily have made himself master of the place; but, ignorant of the straits to which they were reduced, he consented to a truce which afforded them an opportunity of recruiting their exhausted strength, and re-victualling the castle. They agreed to deliver up the fortress on the following conditions:—First, That the terms of the armistice. That the Government should procure a 'sufficient absolution' from the Pope for the slaughter of the Cardinal, and that they should not be 'pursued by force until the said absolution be obtained.' Secondly, That neither the besieged nor any individuals connected with them, should ever be prosecuted at law for the 'slaughter aforesaid;' and thirdly, That they should give pledges to surrender the castle whenever the absolution arrived; and that, 'for surety of those pledges, they should, in the meantime, retain the Regent's son and heir in their custody.' It is probable that neither of the contracting parties meant to keep this treaty, but that the real design of both was to gain time for the arrival of help from their respective friends in England and France. At the moment that the terms were agreed to, the conspirators despatched a messenger to Henry VIII., informing him of the armistice, and assuring him that their only object was to gain time to procure a supply of provisions. They disavowed all intentions of fulfilling any other engagements than those which they had entered into with himself. And, further, they requested Henry to write to the Emperor, and procure his intercession with the Pope 'for the stopping and hindering of their absolution,' that they might thus have longer time to carry out their designs.*

The conduct of the Regent was not less artful. As already mentioned, Panter had been sent to the French court as ambassador, to urge the fulfilment of the ancient treaties of alliance between the two kingdoms; to induce France to declare war against England; if Henry VIII. should refuse to maintain peace with Scotland; and to obtain a supply of money, ammunition, artillery, and the help of some engineers, experienced in the attack and defence of fortified places, and intimately acquainted with 'the ordering of battles.†' Knox also states that a plot was formed for the betrayal of the castle, by surprising some of the leading conspirators, 'in which design,' says he, 'was the Abbot of Dunfermline principal, and for that purpose had the Laird of Montquhary (who was most familiar with those of the castle) laboured with foot and hand, and proceeded so in the traffique, that from entering in daylight, at his pleasure, he got licence to come in, in the night, whenever it pleased him.‡'

The Regent, having disbanded his forces, returned to Edinburgh, to be present at a Parliament which had been summoned to meet in February, and to wait for the arrival, not of the Pope's absolution for the conspirators, but of French auxiliaries to assist in bringing them to condign punishment. His anxiety for the general security of the kingdom, and his fears of English intrigues and encroachments, were increased, rather than abated, by the death of Henry VIII., which took place on the 28th of January, 1546-7; for Henry's successor, Edward the Sixth, being only in his tenth year, his uncle the Earl of Hertford, Scotland's remorseless enemy who had been created Duke of Somerset, was appointed to the protectorate of England. The deceased monarch had, on his death-bed, enjoined a resolute continuance of the war, until the Scots should be compelled to accept of the treaties of peace and marriage which he had so earnestly prosecuted by force and craft for four years; and the schemes and passions of Somerset had been too much engrossed with the execution of Henry's policy to require any stimulus to follow it out with fresh energy in the new reign. Accordingly, one of the first acts of his government denoted the resumption of the oft-baffled enterprise, and of the old policy for carrying it into effect. On the 6th of February, he—as Protector of England and guardian of the young king—granted an interview to Balnaves, who had been sent by the Castilians to the English court, and confirmed the annuities promised to the conspirators by the late monarch. He also gave a favourable answer to the proposal that the garrison of St. Andrew's should be strengthened by troops raised and maintained at the expense of the English Government; whilst, with the view of facilitating communications with the Castilians, he retained at court John Lesley, one of the principal assassins. Balnaves was despatched home, with urgent orders to use every endeavour to seduce the Scottish barons from their allegiance to the government.*

Whilst Scottish affairs thus remained unaffected by the decease of Henry VIII., and the prospect of hostilities with England was unaltered, the death of another monarch, with whom Scotland was closely connected, took place at the interval of only a few weeks; but neither did this occasion any material change. Francis the First died on the 30th of March; and his friendly policy towards Scotland was continued by his son and successor, Henry the Second, who was ready to send all necessary help from France to the party of the Regent and the Queen-dowager.† Thus, the change of monarchs produced no change of policy on either side; for, if the enmity of England was to be continued, so was the friendship of France. As soon as the ceremony of his coronation was over, the new French king sent M. D'Ossell, who had formerly been on confidential terms with Mary of Guise, as ambassador to the Scottish court, with instructions to confirm the ancient leagues between the two countries, and with assurances of liberal assistance against the murderers of the Cardinal and the designs of England.*

The preparations of the Regent for the defence of the kingdom were prompt and energetic. He induced his council, which met on the 19th of March, to issue a proclamation, summoning 'all the lieges to be in readiness, on forty days' warning, to come with victuals for one month, to whatever place shall be assigned for the rendezvous.† On the 25th of May, he published an order that 'fires should be lighted as beacons on all the high hills from the coast towards Stirling,' where the court was, 'how soon any fleet from England should appear; and if the fleet happened first to be seen in the day-time, that post-horses should be in readiness for advertising the Governor; and that all fencible men between sixty and sixteen be charged at the market-crosses of the towns of Dunbar, North Berwick, Haddington, Edinburgh, Linlithgow, Stirling, Lauder, Selkirk, and Peebles, to repair to the city of Edinburgh,' fully equipped for war, at the first notice of the English ships, to assist the Governor in the defence of the realm, who, on his part, declares that he will 'wair his life thairupon, with the help of God, the noblemen, and subjects of the same.‡ Arran also strengthened the border defences; and, for the purpose of training the whole population to military exercises, he revived those armed musters called 'weapon schawings,' which had of late become nearly obsolete. To compensate for the want of a national fleet, he gave every encouragement to the equipment of privateers and armed merchantmen. Nor was he less sedulously engaged in seeking to extinguish feuds and quarrels between the leading barons, and to attach the nobility to himself and his government. In these various efforts he had the cordial and energetic co-operation of the Queen-dowager, whose favour for him and his policy had greatly increased ever since the murder of the Cardinal. In this crisis the Regent had thrown off his constitutional indolence, and, as is generally the case with men who are industrious and energetic in their habits, he found time for recreation as well as for business; and, while ordering and superintending the national defences, he did not fail to accompany Mary of Guise in hawking and hunting expeditions. §

† Henry, in a letter, assures the Queen-dowager, "that no one can be better satisfied than he is of the goodwill she has for his service, and that, knowing full well the great need she has of his assistance, he will instantly attend to her affairs, and take care that succours shall be sent very soon, as the expedition, he hopes, will be ready to sail by the middle of April." § There is an entry in the Royal Comptus for the expenses of 'removing the falcons and horses from Edinburgh to Peebles, on the 13th of June, the time of my Lord Governor and the Queen's Grace passing to hunting.' (Treasury Records in the Register Office, Edinburgh. Miss Strickland's Lives of the Queens of Scotland, vol. ii. p. 90.) On the previous month (May, 1547), a guerdon is recorded to have been given by the Regent to 'certain minstrels of the town of Dumbarton, and their Robin Hood,'—a popular hero imported, Miss Strickland suggests, by the English Queen Consorts from merry England. On the 13th of May, the day of Arran's return to Edinburgh, the Robin Hood of that city was also rewarded.—Treasury Records

Widely different were the occupations and amusements of the motley band which held possession of the castle of St. Andrew's. There were amongst them a few pious and zealous Reformers; but the greater part of the garrison seem to have given themselves up to all kinds of licentiousness; and so revolting were their excesses that Rough, the eminent preacher, who, on account of his zeal for the Reformation, had been dismissed from the situation of chaplain to the Regent, and, on the murder of Cardinal Beaton, had sought refuge among the conspirators, was compelled to quit the castle in disgust, and to take up his residence in the town.*

In the midst of these scenes, an event occurred which was destined to exercise a most momentous influence on the future history of Scotland. In the month of April, the famous John Knox, accompanied by his two pupils—the sons of the barons of Ormiston and Lang-Niddry—sought admittance into the castle. He was then in the forty-first year of his age, and known only to a very small circle for his learning and his attachment to the doctrines of the Reformation. The quiet and retired manner of his life, until he had reached middle age, must have confirmed the naturally strong individuality of his character, its stern and inflexible resolution, and its undeviating rectitude. A long and earnest study of the sacred Scriptures had rendered him not more antagonistic to the Romish Church than intolerant of a slight or partial reformation. He was for a 'root and branch work,' and that not by means of insidious intrigue, but by open and vehement attack. Divine principle, and not human, much less court policy, had been his study, and was henceforth to be vividly embodied in his life. He had, for some time back, been marked out by the popish clergy as a future victim, and had formed the design of escaping to Germany, but was dissuaded from the attempt by the parents of his pupils, who urged him to take shelter in the castle of St. Andrew's, where he might continue to give instructions to their sons. The lateness of his entrance upon public life, and the circumstances in which it took place, go far to explain the stern gravity that marked, more or less, all his subsequent appearances. His singular qualifications for preaching the Gospel, and for maintaining a controversy with the clergy of St. Andrew's, were soon apparent to the few Reformers in the castle, who urged upon him to assume the sacred office, to which, after a long and distracting mental conflict, he assented. In the castle chapel and in the town church he attracted large and eager audiences. His public disputations with some of the friars converted a great number of the inhabitants to Protestant views. His denunciations, however, of the shameful excesses in which the garrison indulged, were without effect. Knox has been sneered at by several historians,* for 'lifting his awful voice,' and 'commencing his predicating labours,' as minister of 'this hopeful congregation.' It is enough to reply that it was a proof of his courage and of the thorough honesty of his character. And it cannot be doubted that the reviling would have been far more copious and just if he had suffered the wickedness of the garrison to pass unnoticed and unrebuked. When, afterwards, his stern reproof drew tears from the eyes of a beautiful woman, and that woman his sovereign, the fact that he had spared the licentious Castilians, and not directed, against their debaucheries and impieties, his most vehement condemnations and solemn warnings, would have been perpetually adduced as a proof of unfaithfulness or insincerity. It is certain that, at this time, when the scope of his activities was necessarily limited, and he was under strong temptation to moderate the vehemence of his rebukes, his eloquence had a fiery energy, which he never afterwards surpassed, and was brought to bear, day after day, with unsparing severity, upon the abominations practised by those to whom he was indebted for protection against his enemies.

In the beginning of the month of June, the absolution from the Court of Rome reached the Regent, who now called upon the Castilians to fulfil their stipulations. But they alleged that the Papal pardon was insufficient, because it contained these words: 'We pardon this unpardonable crime; 'for,' said they, 'if our crime be unpardonable, then we have no security by this absolution, since it is in itself null, if the crime committed by us cannot be pardoned.' They were told that the clause had been inserted only to aggravate the character of the crime, and neither to put it beyond the Pope's prerogative of forgiveness, nor to weaken the validity of the actual absolution which he had granted. Still, the besieged professed to be dissatisfied, and to dread circumvention, and, complaining that the promises made to them had not been kept, they resolved to retain possession of the castle, and to defend it to the last extremity, in the hope of receiving speedy assistance from England.

In the midst of these internal troubles and distractions, an incident occurred which led to a renewal of the irregular war with England. A Scottish privateer, named the 'Lion,' had been seized by an English vessel; and the Queen-dowager's remonstrances against the act were met by the allegation that it had been committed in self-defence.† This outrage was followed almost immediately by the incursion across the western borders of five thousand English, who ravaged the country, captured the Laird of Johnston and several of his kinsmen, and took possession of many of the strongholds upon the marches. Regent Arran might not have regarded this

The Regent meets aggression as a declaration of war the aggression. on the part of the English Government, but Maxwell and other border barons, on whom the brunt of the predatory expedition had fallen, repaired to Edinburgh, and, by urgent representations that their estates had been laid waste, the important fortresses occupied by English garrisons, and the cultivators of the land driven from their dwellings, and reduced to the alternative of beggary or a change of allegiance, they succeeded in rousing Arran to lead his army to the borders, for the purpose of avenging this aggression. He attacked and captured the castle of Langhope, which he razed to the ground. But, before he could follow up this success, the Regent was suddenly recalled by the welcome news that the expected fleet from France had arrived, and that his presence and co-operation were required at St. Andrew's for the bombardment of the castle.* On reaching the scene of action, he found a squadron of sixteen galleys, † commanded by Leon Strozzi, Prior of Capua, and a knight of Rhodes, of great military skill and reputation, who, without waiting for Arran and the Scottish land-forces, had commenced an assault upon the outworks towards the sea. The castle was, however, almost impregnable in this quarter; and though Strozzi directed against it the fire of his fleet for several days, yet the fortifications sustained no damage, and the besieged no loss; whilst many of his rowers had been shot by the garrison, and one vessel, approaching too near, had been disabled, and, but for timely succour, would have been sunk. ‡ As soon as the Regent arrived, preparations for an assault by land were vigorously made. Pieces of heavy artillery were landed, raised by engines, and planted on the steeples of the cathedral and St. Salvator's College, which commanded the inner court of the castle. Large battering mortars were also placed in the street to play against the gates and walls, whilst trenches were cast up, from which musketry might bear upon the defenders who ventured to appear on the battlements. With such celerity was the fortress beleaguered and all communication cut off, that, according to Buchanan, 'a number of the garrison were shut out, and a number who had not engaged in the conspiracy, but were in the castle, were shut in.' § On the 23rd of July, the Siege vigorously cannon of the besiegers began to resumed on the play upon the fortress. Mean- 23rd of July. while, the besieged, though closely environed, and so completely overlooked by the artillerymen mounted on the steeples of the college and the abbey that it was dangerous to appear in any even of the recesses of the court yard, and though suffering severely from a very deadly kind of plague,* were as arrogant and infatuated as ever. John Knox's prophetic voice in vain seconded the roar of the assailing ordnance. "When they triumphed of their victory (the first twenty days they had many prosperous chances) he lamented and ever said—They saw not what he saw: when they bragged of the force and thickness of their walls, he said they should be but egge-shells. When they vaunted, England will rescue us, he said, ye shall not see them, but ye shall be delivered into your enemies' hands, and shall be carried into a strange cuntry." † The predictions of the Reformer were soon verified. During the night of the 29th of July, Strozzi completed his plans and dispositions for carrying the castle. A battery, mounted with thirteen large cannons, 'whereof,' says Knox, 'four were cannons royall, called double cannons,' had been erected, and at four o'clock in the morning (Saturday, 30th July), a storm of heavy shot began to beat upon all parts of the fortress. In the course of six hours, the strongest of the battlements, new and old, had fallen, and wide breaches were made in the walls. The garrison could no longer hold out, and William Kirkaldy of Grange was sent with a flag of truce to agree upon terms of surrender, not with the Regent ('because they would not acknowledge any lawful magistrate within the kingdom, being a native'), ‡ but with Strozzi, the Italian commander. At this moment a fearful tempest burst forth, which even drove the French gunners from the battery: and some of the Castilians suggested that a sally should be attempted, with the hope of seizing upon the deserted ordnance of the besiegers, or at least of making their escape.§ But the proposal was abandoned, and the surrender of the castle took place. Authorities differ respecting the stipulations; some affirming that Strozzi The surrender of engaged for the safety of the be- the castle 30th sieged, their conveyance to France, July, 1547. their freedom if they should assent to the conditions which might be proposed to them by the French King, and, in the event of their declining to enter the French service, for their removal to any country they might choose, except Scotland. Others contend that Strozzi would listen only to an unconditional surrender, and reserved their lives as well as their liberties for the will of the French monarch. || Regent Arran had his son safely restored to him; but the rest of the inmates

|| Knox and Buchanan mention distinctly the conditions to which Strozzi assented, and which he subsequently broke. But Lesley (p. 194) and Anderson (MS. History, vol. ii. pp. 94, 95) affirm that the surrender was unconditional. Anderson says, 'At length he [Strozzi] was content to pardon them their lives, if the king of France should think it good, else to stand to his pleasure.' Knox, however, must have had the best means of knowing what, or if any, terms were agreed on; and there was nothing in his character to detract from the value of his testimony.

of the fortress were conveyed on board the fleet as prisoners. A large portion of the booty found in the castle, and which amounted in all to the value of a hundred thousand pounds, had been the personal property of the Cardinal, and consisted of plate, copes, vestments, and jewels. The valuables of many of the Fife barons, who held reforming doctrines, had also, in the course of the fourteen months that the fortress had been occupied by the conspirators, been conveyed thither as to a place of safety; and these along with the plunder which the garrison had accumulated, became the prize of the captors. The castle itself was demolished, as some allege, in obedience to an injunction of the canon law, which ordains that any house in which the blood of a Cardinal has been shed shall be laid in ruins; but others are of opinion that the fortress was dismantled to prevent it from falling into the hands of

The garrison carried the English. The prisoners were tried to France. conveyed to France, where some of them were consigned to various dungeons in Brittany, while others, including John Knox himself, were kept in chains on board the galleys, and treated with great indignity and cruelty.*

The English Protector, Somerset, had been for some time past busily engaged in collecting an army for the invasion of Scotland, and, on the 27th of August, he reached Newcastle at the head of fourteen thousand two hundred men, of which four thousand were men-at-arms, two thousand light horse, and two hundred mounted Spanish carabineers. A fleet of thirty-four ships of war and thirty transports, under Lord Clinton, appointed to co-operate with the land forces, at the same time anchored off that port. Meanwhile, the position of the Regent was exceedingly critical. On the capture of St. Andrew's, a register-book had been found

Treachery of the in the chamber of Balnaves, containing the signatures of two hundred of the Scottish nobles and barons who had secretly bound themselves to promote the designs of England. The most prominent among these infamous traitors were the Earls of Bothwell, Cassillis, and Marischal, Lord Kilmaurs, the eldest son of the Earl of Glencairn, Lord Gray, and the notorious Sir George Douglas. Bothwell had promised to transfer his allegiance to the English Government, and to surrender to them his strong castle of the Hermitage, on condition that he should receive the hand of the Duchess of Suffolk, aunt to the young English monarch.† The Earls of Athol, Crawford, Errol, and Sutherland, had been tampered with by Gray, and had intimated their willingness to join the English faction, provided they were honestly entertained.‡ Glencairn—a veteran in treachery and state-craft—had secretly made overtures to the Protector, offering to co-operate in the invasion of Scotland with two thousand of his friends and vassals, and assuring Somerset that, if furnished with money to equip a troop of horse, he would hold the Regent in check till the arrival of the invading army.

These traitorous intrigues were only partially known to Arran, but he had learned enough to make him aware by the Preparations made of the perplexing and perilous the Regent for the defence of the country. position in which he was placed.

He seems to have thought that it was not expedient to inflict summary punishment on the traitor nobles, at the moment when the country was on the eve of a foreign invasion; and, therefore, though he threw the Earl of Bothwell into prison, he delayed farther proceedings against the rest of the conspirators. His military preparations, however, manifested greater vigour and resolution than his political measures. A continuous line of beacons was established from St. Abb's Head to Linlithgow, in order that immediate intimation might be given of the approach of the enemy; and the Fiery Cross—a warlike symbol hitherto peculiar to the Highland districts—Fiery Cross sent through the country. was, on the present emergency, sent throughout every part of the realm, summoning all the lieges who were capable of bearing arms, to repair to the place of rendezvous in defence of their native land.*

* "When a highland chieftain designed to summon his clan, upon any sudden or important emergency, he slew a goat, and, making a cross of any light wood, seared its extremities in the fire, and extinguished them in the blood of the animal. This was called the 'Fiery Cross,' also 'Cross Tarigh,' or the 'Cross of Shame,' because disobedience to what the symbol implied, inferred infamy. It was delivered to a swift and trusty messenger, who ran full speed with it to the next hamlet, where he presented it to the principal person, with a single word, intimating the place of rendezvous. He who received the symbol was bound to send it forward, with equal dispatch, to the next village; and thus it passed with incredible celerity through all the district which owed allegiance to the chief, and also among his allies and neighbours, if the danger was common to them. At sight of the Fiery Cross, every man, from sixteen years old to sixty, capable of bearing arms, was obliged instantly to repair in his best arms and accoutrements, to the place of rendezvous. He who failed to appear, suffered the extremities of fire and sword, which were emblematically denounced to the disobedient by the bloody and burnt marks upon this warlike signal." (See Appendix to The Lady of the Lake, note F.) The progress of the Fiery Cross is thus strikingly described by Sir Walter Scott in the above-mentioned poem, Canto III., Stanza XIV. :—

"Fast as the fatal symbol flies,
In arms the huts and hamlets rise;
From winding glen, from upland brow,
They pour'd each hardy tenant down.
Nor slack'd the messenger his pace;
He show'd the sign, he nam'd the place,
And pressing forward like the wind,
Left clamour and surprise behind.
The fisherman forsook the strand,
The swarthy smith took dirk and brand;
With changed cheer, the mower blithe,
Left in the half-cut swathe the scythe,
The herds without a keeper stray'd,
The plough was in mid-furrow staid;
The falc'ner toss'd his hawk away,
The hunter left the stag at bay,
Prompt at the signal of alarm,
Each son of Alpine rush'd to arms."

* Lesley, p. 195. A rude song was made on this event, of which the burden was—

"Priests content ye, now, now,
Priests content ye now,
For Norman and his companie
Have fill'd the galleys fou'." (full).

‡ Ibid.

On the 2nd of September, 1547, the English Somerset enters army entered Scotland, and advanced along the coast till, on the 5th, they reached the celebrated ravine called the Peaths, which Hayward has well described as "a valley stretching towards the sea, six miles in length, the banks of which were so steep on either side that the passage across was not direct, but by paths leading slope-wise, which, being many, the place is for that reason called the peaths or paths."* If proper advantage had been taken of this perilous defile, where, as Cromwell afterwards said of it, 'one man to hinder was better than ten men to force a way,' the further progress of the invading army might easily have been arrested; but the neighbouring barons were all attached to the English interest, and the enemy was allowed to pass through without molestation. After crossing this rugged ravine, which occupied them the greater part of a day, the invaders sat down before the neighbouring castle of Dunglas, a stronghold belonging to Sir George Douglas. The captain, who was a nephew of Lord Home, finding resistance vain, speedily surrendered, and "brought with him," says an eye-witness, who has left a most interesting description of the English castle. "his band to my lords grace, which was of twenty-one sober (poor) soldiers, all so apparelled and appointed that so God help me (I will say it for no praise), I never saw such a bunch of beggars come out of one house together in my life." Six of these 'sober soldiers' were detained; the rest were allowed to 'gae their gate,'—that is, to go their way—with a warning that they would be hanged the next time they were caught. Patten, who happened to be one of the party that went to rifle the castle, says, "the spoil was not rich sure; but of white bread, oaten cakes, and Scottish ale, whereof was indifferent good store, and soon bestowed among my lords' soldiers accordingly. As for swords, bucklers, pikes, pots, pans, yarn, linen, hemp, and heaps of such baggage beside, were scant stooped for, and very liberally let alone; but, yet sure, it would have rued any good housewife's heart to have beholden the great unmerciful murder that our men made of the brood geese and good laying hens that were slain there that day, which the wives of the town had penned up in holes in the stables and cellars of the castle ere we came." The fortress was afterwards blown up with gunpowder, together with the neighbouring strongholds of Thornton and Innerwick, the former belonging to Lord Home, the latter to Lord Hamilton.

Somerset, continuing his march close to the German sea, left Dunbar within a gunshot on the right, and proceeded onward to east Liuton, where his army crossed the Tyne. Here a brief skirmish took place between a body of the Scottish prickers and a squadron of the English cavalry under the Earl of Warwick. On the 7th of September the invaders reached Lang-Niddry, where they encamped for the night. Here a communication was opened with the fleet, which lay over against Leith, and the admiral having come ashore, it was arranged that the ships of war should leave their present station and cast anchor beside the town of Musselburgh, for the purpose of co-operating with the land forces. On the evening of Friday, September 8, the English encamped in the neighbourhood of a town called Salt-Preston—now Preston-pans—within sight of the Scottish army, which lay at Edmonstone Edge, about three miles distant. Midway between the two camps, facing the west, rose an eminence called Faside Brae, which was at this time surmounted by 'a sorry castle and half a score houses of like worthiness by it.' Early next morning the Scottish light-horsemen were seen 'pranking' up and down this hill, whooping and shaking their lances at the English vanguard, evidently with the view of provoking a contest. In the afternoon they were charged by Lord Grey, at the head of a thousand men-at-arms, and, after a sharp Cavalry skirmish, confict, which lasted for three hours, the Scottish prickers, who were mounted on slight, though hardy hackneys, were unable to sustain the attacks of the heavy-armed English troopers with their barbed steeds, and the greater part of them were cut to pieces. The Scots lost in this disastrous affair about thirteen hundred men. Lord Home, the leader of the cavalry, was severely wounded, and his son, the Master of Home, was taken prisoner.

After this affair, the Protector, accompanied by the Earl of Warwick and other captains, together with a guard of three hundred horse, proceeded to the eminence on which stands the church of Inveresk, for the purpose of examining the position of the Scottish camp. It consisted of four long rows of white tents, running from east to west, and about an arrow-shot asunder 'not unlike to four great ridges of ripe barley.' The ground which they occupied was very strong, and had been chosen with great skill. Their left was protected by the Firth, and by a turf wall defended by two field-pieces and some musqueteers, an extensive morass covered their right flank, while their front, looking eastward, was defended by the steep and rugged banks of the river Esk, which flowed between them and the English. Over this river, about twelve score paces from the sea, was the old bridge of Musselburgh, which the Scots had taken possession of and 'kept well warded with ordnance;' and, as their army was almost double to that of the enemy, it was evident to the English general that if they chose to keep their advantageous position, they could not be dislodged without great loss.

 † Diary of W. Patten, reprinted in Dalzell's Fragments of Scottish History. Patten was conjoint judge-marshal of the English army along with the celebrated Wm. Cecil.

As Somerset and his attendants were on their way back to their camp, they were overtaken by a Scottish herald and a trumpeter, the former of whom, in the name of the governor, proposed an exchange of prisoners, and offered to permit the English to retire to their own country without molestation and upon honourable terms; while the latter informed the Protector that his master, the Earl of Huntly, eager to avoid the unnecessary effusion of blood, was willing to decide the contest either by single combat with the English general, or to encounter him with ten, or twenty more, on each side. Somerset, as was doubtless expected, declined both propositions. He informed the herald that since the governor had already refused fair and honourable conditions, their quarrel must now be decided by an appeal to arms; and then, turning to the other messenger, he proceeded,—“And thou trumpeter, say to thy master he seemeth to lack wit to make this challenge to me, being of such estate, by the sufferance of God, as to have so mighty a charge of so precious a jewel—the government of a king’s person and the protection of his realm—whilst there are yet many noble gentlemen here his equals in rank, to whom he might have addressed his cartel without fear of a refusal.” The Earl of Warwick here eagerly expressed his willingness to accept Huntly’s challenge, and offered the trumpeter a hundred crowns if he should bring back a favourable answer from his master. But Somerset would not permit this, alleging that “Huntly was not equal in rank to the English Earl.” “But, herald,” he said, “tell the governor and the Earl of Huntly also, that we have now spent some time in your country; our force is but a small company, yours far exceeds us; yet bring me word they will meet us in a plain field, and they shall have fighting enough, and I will give thee a thousand crowns for thy pains.”*

On the return of the Protector and Warwick to the camp, a counsel of war was held, and it was agreed to address a letter to the Regent, offering to withdraw the English troops from the country, if the Scots would consent to retain their youthful queen in her own realm, and free from any marriage contract with France, till she was of age to decide for herself whether she would fulfil the original engagement with the English monarch. But such was the exasperation which was now felt at the unjustifiable aggressions of England, that these moderate proposals were at once rejected by the governor, who appears to have been under the impression that they were dictated rather by the difficulties of Somerset’s position than by any sincere desire of peace. In this opinion he was confirmed by his brother, the Archbishop of St. Andrew’s, and it was agreed between them that they should keep this proposal a secret, and give out that Somerset had imperiously demanded that the Scots should surrender their queen, and submit themselves to his mercy.*

This effort to avert hostilities having proved unsuccessful, preparations were made for an immediate appeal to arms. The Scottish camp was partially commanded by the eminence on which stood the church of St. Michael’s, of Inveresk, and by the higher part of a lane which led from the church to Faside-hill; and the English general resolved to occupy these places with his ordnance, for the purpose of annoying the enemy, and forcing them to remove from their strong position. He, therefore, broke up his camp early on the English order of morning of Saturday, the 10th of September, long remembered in Scotland as the ‘Black Saturday,’ and began to advance towards Inveresk. His force was divided into three battles. The vanguard was led by Dudley, Earl of Warwick, afterwards Duke of Northumberland, the main body by Somerset in person, and the rear by the veteran Lord Dacre. The cavalry was under the command of Lord Grey, of Wilton, high marshal of the army, with whom were Sir Francis Bryan, Sir Peter Mewtas, Sir Francis Fleming, Master of the Ordnance, and Don Pedro de Gamboa, the leader of a body of mounted Spanish carabineers. On coming in sight of the ground which they intended to occupy, they were greatly surprised to find that it was already in possession of the enemy. It would appear that the Foolish conduct of the Regent had so strangely mis- the Regent. taken the movements of the English army, as to adopt the preposterous notion that they intended to seek refuge on board their fleet, which lay in Musselburgh bay. Afraid, therefore, that the enemy would escape from him by flight, he had precipitately quitted his strong position, in opposition to the advice of his best officers, and was now in full march to attack Somerset in his camp. The Scottish army advanced in three great bodies. The vanguard, consisting of four thousand of the men of Fife, Mearns, Angus, and the West country, was led by the Earl of Angus; the main battle, which was commanded by the Regent in person, contained the military array of Lothian, Strathern, and Stirlingshire, with the great body of the Scottish barons, having on the right four thousand Western Highlanders, under the Earl of Argyle, and on the left the Macleods and the Macgregors, with the men of the Isles. The men of the north—twelve thousand strong—led by the Earl of Huntly, formed the vanguard. The flanks were protected by some pieces of artillery, drawn by the soldiers themselves, ‘for, in all this enterprise,’ says Patten, ‘they used for haste so little the help of horses that they plucked forth their ordnance by draught of men.’ Along with the army there marched a numerous body of priests and monks, with a white banner displayed, on which was painted a female, with her hair dishevelled, kneeling before a crucifix, and underneath was the motto, ‘Afflicta ecclesia ne obliviscaris.’

* Patten intimates that these messages were not sent by the Regent and Huntly but by Sir George Douglas, in their name, without their knowledge.

After passing the church of Inveresk, that portion of the Scottish forces which was nearest to the Firth was severely galled by the fire of one of the English galleys, which slew the Master of Graham and twenty-five others, and threw the Highland archers under Argyle into such confusion 'that,' says Patten, 'they could never after be made to come forward.' In consequence of this check, the army quitted their exposed position and moved away to the right, with the object of gaining Faside Brae and attacking the enemy from the high ground. They advanced at so round a pace 'that it was thought of the most part of us,' says Patten, 'that they were rather horsemen than footmen.' But the English were on the hill before them, and had succeeded in planting several pieces of artillery on the summit, so as to be enabled to fire over the heads of their men drawn up below. As soon as Somerset perceived the movement of the Scots towards Faside Brae, he directed Lord Grey, with the cavalry and the mounted carabineers, to attack the right wing of the Scots, and, if they could not break their array, at least to keep them in check till the other divisions should have time to take up their proper positions on the side of the hill. Observing the English men-at-arms advancing to execute this manœuvre, the Scottish vanguard halted in the midst of a ploughed field, and prepared to receive the threatened attack by forming in their usual impenetrable phalanx. "They were well furnished," says the English judge-marshal, Scottish mode of "with jack and skull, dagger, fighting. buckler, and swords, all notably broad and thin, of exceeding good temper, and universally so made to slice, that as I never saw none so good so think I it hard to devise the better; hereto every man his pike (eighteen feet long), a great kercher wrapped twice or thrice about his neck, not for cold, but for cutting. In their array toward the joining with the enemy, they cling and thrust so near in the fore-rank, shoulder to shoulder together, with their pikes in both hands straight afore them, and their followers in that order so hard at their backs, laying their pikes on their foregoers' shoulders, that if they do assail undiscovered no force can well withstand them. Standing at defence they thrust shoulders likewise so nigh together, the fore-ranks stooping low, and almost kneeling, held their pikes in both hands, their bucklers on their left arms, the butt-end of their pike against the right foot, the steel point inclining towards the enemy breast high; the second rank stooped a little, crossing their pikes over the shoulders of those in front; those farther back stood upright, presenting their lances over the heads of their comrades, so that it were as easy for a bare finger to pierce the skin of an angry hedgehog as for any one to encounter the brunt of their pikes."*

Undeterred by the formidable array of the infantry, Lord Gray boldly led his men to the attack; and though many of them stuck in the broad muddy ditch or slough which lay between them and the enemy, and their progress was also impeded by the cross ridges of the ploughed field, they charged full upon the Scottish spearmen, who stood ready to receive them, "striking their pike-points and crying, 'Come here, loons (rascals), come here, tykes (dogs), come here, heretics,' and such like." "Herewith," continues Patten, "waxed it very hot on both sides with pitiful cries, horrible war, and terrible thundering of guns; beside the day darkened above head with smoke of shot; the sight and appearance of the enemy in front, the danger of death on every side; also the bullets, pellets, and arrows flying each where so thick, and so uncertainly lighting, that nowhere was there any surety of safety; every man stricken with a dreadful fear, not so much perchance of death as of hurt, which things, though they were but certain to some, yet doubted of all, assured cruelty at the enemies' hands without hope of mercy—death to fly and danger to fight." "The whole face of the field, at this moment," he adds, "was both to the eye and the ear so heavy, so deadly, lamentable, furious, outrageous, terribly confused, and so quite against the quiet nature of man, that if to our nobility the regard of their honour and fame, to the knights and captains the estimation of their worship and honesty, and generally to us all the natural motion of bounden duty, our own safety, hope of victory, and the favour of God, that we trusted we had for the equity of our quarrel, had not been a more vehement cause of courage than the danger of death was cause of fear, the very horror of the thing had been apt to make any man to forget both prowess and policy."* The finest cavalry in the world would have failed to make an impression on the impenetrable phalanx of the Scottish infantry; and in the first encounter two hundred of the English horsemen were overthrown, including Edward Shelley, lieutenant of the Bulleners, † Ratcliff, Clarence, Preston, and other veteran officers, their horses being stabbed in the belly with the spears and the riders despatched by the 'whingers,' which the Scots carried in their belt. Sir Andrew Flammock, who carried the English standard, with great difficulty saved the colours, leaving, however, a part of the staff in the hands of the enemy. Lord Gray himself was severely wounded in the mouth and neck, and "so great was the tumult and fear among the English," says an old historian, ‡ "that, had not the commanders been men both of approved courage and skill, or haply had the Scots been well furnished with men-at-arms, the army had that day been utterly undone." Unfortunately, however, the Scottish cavalry had been destroyed in the engagement of the previous day, and the main body and rear of the army were still at a considerable distance, so that the victorious vanguard were unable to follow up the advantage which they had gained. Meanwhile, the Earl of Warwick exerted himself to restore the ranks of the English cavalry, assuring them that if they would only behave themselves valiantly the day would be their own. By his advice a body of mounted carabineers were brought forward to the brink of the broad ditch, and discharged their pieces full in the faces of the Scottish spearmen. This attack was supported by the foot hagbutteers and the archers, while, at the same moment, the artillery, which was advantageously placed on the summit of the hill, began to play upon their serried ranks with great effect. The horse-men having rallied, prepared to renew their charge; and the main body of the English infantry, which had as yet taken no part in the engagement, were seen advancing in close order. The Scottish van, perceiving that they were about to be surrounded by an overwhelming force, began to withdraw from their forward position and to retire in good order to the main body. But the Panic of the Highland archers, who were all Highlanders and ready dispersed over the field burgh troops. stripping the slain, unhappily mistook this movement for a flight, and began to disperse in all directions. The panic spread to the centre, which was mainly composed of the burgh troops; and though still a quarter of a mile distant from the enemy, they threw down their weapons and fled in the utmost confusion. Arran himself is said to have been one of the first to put spurs to his horse. The vanguard, finding themselves thus deserted by the rest of the army and exposed to the overwhelming attack of the English, who began to hem them in on every side, became infected by the panic, and followed the other fugitives.

Complete defeat "Therewith then," says Patten, of the Scots. "turned all the whole rout, east down their weapons, ran out of their wards, off with their jacks, and with all that ever they might, betook them to the race that their governor began. Our men had found them at the first (as what could escape so many thousand eyes), and sharply and quickly, with an universal outcry, 'They fly! they fly!' pursued after in chase amain; and thereto so eagerly and with such fierceness that they overtook many, and spared indeed but few. But when they were once turned, it was a wonder indeed to see how soon, and in how sundry sorts they were scattered; the place they stood on like a wood of staves strewed on the ground as rushes in a chamber, impassable (they lay so thick) for either horse or man. Here, at the first, had they let fall all their pikes; after that everywhere scattered swords, bucklers, daggers, jacks, and all things else that either was of any weight, or might be any let to their course."* The fugitives fled in three several ways; one mass took the road to Leith by the sands, another made direct for Edinburgh, either by the high road, or through the Queen's Park, while the most numerous body turned towards Dalkeith, in the hope that the morass which had defended the right of their camp would interpose an obstacle to their victorious pursuers. The English cavalry, enraged at their previous defeat, and at the sight of the dead bodies of their companions who had fallen in the action, and had been stript by the Highlanders, showed no mercy, and crying to each other to remember Panierheugh (Penielheugh), where Sir Ralph Eure had been defeated and killed, in 1546, by the Earl of Angus, they spurred after the fugitives, who had now no means either of defence or of safety, and cut them down on all sides. The description which an eye-witness has given of this merciless slaughter is horribly graphic.

"Sundry shifts—some shrewd, some sorry, made they in their running; divers of Merciless slaughter them, in their courses as they of the fugitives. were ware they were pursued but of one, would suddenly start back, and lash at the legs of the horse, or foin him in the belly, and sometime did they reach at the rider also; whereby Clement Paston in the arms, and divers other otherwise, in this chase were hurt. Some other lay flat in a furrow as though they were dead, thereby past bye of our men untouched; as I heard say, the Earl of Angus confessed he couched till his horse happened to be brought to him. Other some to stay in the river lowering down his body, his head under the root of a willow tree, with scarce his nose above water for breath. A shift, but no succour, it was to many that had their skulls on, at the stroke of the follower, to shrink with their heads into their shoulders, like a tortoise into his shell. Others again, for their more lightness, cast away shoes and doublets, and ran in their shirts; and some also seen in this race all breathless to fall flat down, and have run themselves to death. . . . Soon after this notable showing of their footmen's weapons, began a pitiful sight of the dead corpses lying dispersed abroad; some their legs off, some but houghed, and left lying half-dead, some thrust quite through the body, others the arms cut off, divers their necks cut half asunder, many their heads cloven, of sundry the brains passed out, some others, again, their heads quite off, with other thousand kinds of killing. After that, and farther in chase, all for the most part killed either on the head or in the neck, for our horsemen could not well reach them lower with their swords. And thus, with blood and slaughter of the enemy, this chase was continued five miles in length westward from the place of their standing, which was in the fallow fields, Underesk, until Edinburgh Park, and well nigh to the gates of the town itself, and unto Leith; and in breadth nigh four miles from the Frith sands up toward Dalkeith southward. In all which space the dead bodies lay as thick as a man may note cattle grazing in a full-replenished pasture. The river ran all red with blood, so that in the same chase were counted, as well by some of our men that somewhat diligently did mark it, as by some of them taken prisoners, that very much did lament it, to have been slain above fourteen thousand. In all this compass of ground, what with weapons, arms, hands, legs, heads, blood, and dead bodies, their flight might have easily been traced to every of their three refuges. And for the smallness of our number, and shortness of time (which was scant five hours, from one till well nigh six), the mortality was so great, as it was thought the like aforetime not to have been seen.”

The narrator seems to have felt that this merciless slaughter required some apology; and he alleges in justification of it the cruelty of the Scots at the battle of Penielheugh, and ‘a tyrannous vow’ they were said to have made before the engagement, that ‘if they overcame, they would kill many and spare few.’† Besides, he adds, a thing well done is twice done; and this indiscriminate slaughter of men who had ceased to offer any resistance, prevented the Scots from assembling again in any force. He expresses his regret, however, that so many of the nobles and barons were slain in the pursuit; but this, he affirms, could not be helped—“their armour among them differing so little, and their apparel so base and beggarly, wherewith the lurdin was in a manner all one with the lord, and the lord with the laird; all clad alike in jacks, covered with white leather doublets of the same, or of fustain, and most commonly all white hoseen. Not one with either chain, brooch, ring, or garment of silk, that I could see, unless chains of latten, drawn four or five times along the thighs of their hoseen and doublet sleeves, for cutting; and of that sort, I saw many. This vileness of port was the cause that so many of their great men and gentlemen were killed, and so few saved. The outward show, the semblance and sign, whereby a stranger might discern a villain from a gentleman, was not among them to be seen. As for words and goodly proffer of great ransoms, they were as common and rife in the mouths of the one as of the other. And, therefore, hereby it came to pass, at the examination and counting of the prisoners, we found taken above twenty of their villains to one of their gentlemen: whom no man need to doubt we had rather have spared than the villains, if we could have known any difference between them in taking.”‡

About fifteen hundred prisoners in all were taken, the most distinguished of whom were the Earl of Huntly, the Chancellor, Lord Yester, the Master of Semple, the Laird of Wemyss, a brother of the Earl of Cassillis, and the Captain of Dunbar; while no fewer than fourteen thousand fell in the battle and the pursuit, which lasted for five hours.

† The cruelty displayed by the English throughout the whole of this campaign was worthy of Edward I. himself. There was a small fort on Faside Brae, the garrison of which, during the engagement, fired on such of the enemy as came within reach. Patten complaisantly mentions that, after the battle, “the house was set on fire, and they for their good will burnt and smothered within.” Ibid. p. 74.

Great numbers of the priests were found among the slain, together with the Lords Fleming and Lochinvar, the Masters of Graham, Erskine, Ogilvy, Avondale, and upwards of two thousand barons and gentlemen. In Edinburgh alone, this disastrous day made three hundred and sixty widows.
